"Fortunately there is no play to-night. I want you to go to London by the very next train. I cannot rest till I have some information which otherwise might not reach me for days. A newspaper, which came by this morning's post, contains intelligence of a dreadful shipwreck. The vessel is the very one in which I know Mr. Trevor Sefton had engaged a passage; and though the names of the passengers are given, and his is not included, you may believe the torturing anxiety I am enduring, for there has been considerable loss of life." And now that poor Susan had shared her sad knowledge with another, she found relief in a burst of tears. The kind-hearted manager, too, gave her his sorrowing sympathy.

"A train will start in half an hour," he exclaimed, "and be assured, my dear young lady, that I will neither sleep nor rest till I have gained you positive information. It is noble of you to keep this intelligence from your sister; but only what might have been expected from Susan Clifford."

"Do not give me more credit than I deserve," she replied. "I have told you my fears, and now I must tell you my hopes. I am quite certain that the vessel is the one in which Mr. Sefton engaged his passage, but I am also sure that among the names of the passengers who are unhappily lost is that of a gentleman who was to have returned in another ship, and with whom, for certain private reasons, I think it very unlikely Trevor would have sailed. I think I should be positively cruel to fill Margaret's mind with the harrowing fears, which my fortunate first peep at the newspaper has enabled me to keep from her. Better a thousand times that she thinks me selfish, unkind, ill-tempered, what she will, for the next four-and-twenty hours."

The reader is already aware of the circumstance which detained Trevor at Madeira, and how, had he yielded to the "rich man's first temptation," he would have been in the ill-fated ship. Strange was the destiny that for once spared the young and the good and the gifted and the happy; and engulfed, instead, let us hope, a repentant sinner, but one for whom the world had no bright promises, and life apparently no future sunshine. After a tedious passage, partly owing to the incapacity of the captain, the vessel struck one stormy night on a hidden reef of rocks, when absolutely in sight of the English coast. Geoffrey Smith was one of those whom a heavy sea had swept from the wreck, and the next morning the murderous waves laid his lifeless body on the beach.

Meanwhile, Trevor Sefton had really embarked in a fine fast-sailing packet, which arrived off Gravesend the very day that Susan's friend was busy at "Lloyd's," enquiring the particulars of the lost merchantman; and learning from some of the officials that the packet was coming up the river, his own sagacity prompted him to go on board, hoping, what proved the truth, that Trevor might be there; or, at the worst, that some sure intelligence might be gained.

It would be in vain to attempt a description of Trevor Sefton's feelings on learning the fate of Geoffrey Smith; and, while deeply grateful for his own preservation, his heart yearned and softened towards the dead even more than it had done at their parting. His first impulse was to accompany the manager to M——, without the delay of an hour, but wealth has its penalties as well as its privileges, and there were some urgent reasons to induce a few hours' stay in London. Finally, he wrote a few lines to Margaret, and also a short note to his mother, and entrusting them to Mr. C——, happy messenger!—shook him warmly by the hand, more as if he were parting with an old friend than the acquaintance of a couple of hours.

"This is Saturday," he exclaimed; "tell them to look for me on Monday."

It must surely be one of the penalties of wealth to have a "man of business" to help take care of it! or, rather, to be obliged, not unfrequently, to listen to the (except to the initiated) unintelligible jargon of a lawyer's discourse! Trevor was already in correspondence with the solicitor of his late friend and benefactress, who, though a shrewd lawyer, was, to do him justice, a strictly honourable man. A novice, like his new client, to whom the absolute possession of tens of thousands of pounds seemed still to ring in his ears like the voice of a dream, could scarcely have been in better hands.

Trevor reached Lincoln's-inn about five o'clock, and the result of his self-introduction and ten minutes' discourse was, that he accepted his lawyer's impromptu invitation to share a family dinner in Guildford-street, Russell-square, whither, in company of a certain portentous-looking tin box, the pair were conveyed as quickly as a jaded cab horse was disposed to take them. The wife and daughter had a hint from "Papa" not to sit very long after dinner; coffee, sent into the dining-room, followed quickly on dessert, and yet the tête-à-tête of the gentlemen continued till midnight.

It was as Trevor Sefton suspected. He had become the holder of certain securities to which his brother's name was attached, to the amount of ten thousand pounds, which, if not redeemed in three days, would become forfeit. Moreover, he learned from those reports which circulate in a given circle, long before they reach the ear of the general public—much as in the physical world there are signs which precede the great convulsions of nature—that Charles Sefton was on the brink of ruin—that his engagements trebled the means he could possibly have at his disposal!

It was the following day—Sunday morning; and, in choosing for the time of his visit the hours of morning service, Trevor Sefton knew the habits of his brother too well to have any doubt about finding him at home.

The house was strange to him; he had never crossed its threshold; but, if one might aver such a contradiction, he had grown used to strange things lately. He was unknown to the servant; but, announcing himself "Mr. Trevor Sefton—your master's brother," he followed on the heels of that functionary without hindrance or denial. Consequently, the brothers stood face to face, without there having been a moment's preparation for the interview on the part of the elder. And they had never met since that summer-day on which the One had been turned penniless adrift! Both looked older; but Time, which had somewhat bronzed the cheek of Trevor, had ennobled his expression, and matured his form. With his brother it was very different. Not only common cares, but anguish of mind, had furrowed his face, and set its impress there; and his thick, dark hair was assuming an iron-grey tinge. He was attired in a loose dressing-gown; and, though writing materials were before him, and papers strewed the table, at the moment Trevor entered he was intently studying an anatomical figure. As the door opened he threw a silk handkerchief across a chair which was near him; but the very action pointed that he did it to conceal a brace of pistols.

Charles Sefton had sunk to the last refuge of the Infidel Coward—he contemplated Suicide!

A half-defined suspicion of the truth crossed Trevor's mind; and, it might be, rendered his voice a little tremulous. The host had risen, and had received his visitor with a slight inclination of the head. His face had changed to a deathlike paleness, and he seemed literally unable to speak.

"Brother," said Trevor, holding out his hand, "it was GOLD that parted us, let IT make atonement and bring us together again."

"What do you mean?" gasped the wretched man, but he had given his hand, and Trevor had not relinquished the grasp.

"I mean" returned he "that I am the holder of these securities; but that I give them up to your possession, trusting to your honour to discharge the debt should a day of brighter fortunes arrive. I add this clause because I look upon the property I have inherited as a solemn trust, by no means to be devoted to selfish gratifications, and it would be one were I to ask you to accept as a gift what I now offer as a conditional loan." As he spoke Trevor laid the papers on the table. Charles Sefton had recognised them in a moment, and while he staggered back to his chair, he clutched them up as if they were a prize which might yet escape from his hands

"What is it all about?" he exclaimed, "The fortune you have inherited! What do you mean?"

And Trevor briefly told the story; at least as much of it as the world had a right to know. It seemed the strangest tale the Usurer had ever heard. "Well, people can't take their money out of the world" was a truism he repeated more than once, though whether he thought the fact a subject for rejoicing or regret he did not specify.

Though his heart was cold and selfish to a degree beyond the imagining of the generous, it had some leaven of humanity, and having such was not insensible to a nobility of conduct he could never have imitated. It is not too much to say either that his unhappy but deep and sincere attachment to Catherine Joyce had humanized him in a manner no other sort of affliction would have been likely to do. Perhaps he best showed his gratitude to Trevor by explaining to him truthfully the state of his affairs, by which it appeared that this generous aid would give him the time he wanted to meet the losses of a gambling speculator. Trevor did not extract promises from him for his future safety, but he hoped strongly that so worldly a man would profit by so worldly a lesson. It is not to be supposed that the brothers can ever be Friends in the dear and rich acceptance of the word, but they are no longer Foes or Strangers!

(See La Presse passim.)

LET Albion, our country, yclept the "Perfidious,"
Hide her diminish'd head under her shield;
Snap her old spear, and discharge that poor hideous
Lion, which dared to the Gallic Cock yield.
We are nicely "used up," not a question about it
Fair Honour is trapp'd in the springes of Gaul;
Yet, Peace at all price; for we can't live without it—
So fancy the men of L'Entente Cordiale.

Yes! yes! We are "priates," and "brigands," et cetera;
"Tyrants who trample the rights of the seas!"
"Russia's alliance to France is far better." Ah!
Catch your bear first, Madame Grasse, if you please.
The Navies of Russia, Spain, France, and America,
Join to precipitate England's dire fall!!!!
This grand parti carré will strike up the very key
Set to the tune of L'Entente Cordiale.

L'Entente Cordiale!.... Nay, let us remember
When th' Orleans mounted a forfeited throne,
While smouldering yet was red Anarchy's ember,
And hopeful the cause of Henri de Bourbon;
When Europe denied the new dynasty's title,
And France with her Monarch looked out for a squall,
Then England stood forth in the exigence vital,
And gave her true hand to L'Entente Cordiale.

Spain is the left wing that guards our position;
'Tis turn'd! And Belgium is so on our right.
Still England shall march on her good and great mission,
With banner unblemish'd in glory and might;
Both have been gain'd and retain'd by true honour,
And a million brave hearts can arise at her call.
Yet, let us despise the poor ruse put upon her,
And bid long adieus to L'Entente Cordiale.

THE QUESTION OF OPENING THE PORTS.—On Tuesday afternoon, a deputation, consisting of Mr. Charles Cochrane, Mr. Ramsey, Mr. Jones, and other gentlemen appointed at the public meeting recently held in Castle-street, Oxford-street, waited by appointment on Lord John Russell, in Downing-street, for the purpose of presenting a memorial to the Lords of her Majesty's Treasury, praying their Lordships to open the ports for the admission of corn duty free. The deputation having been introduced to the noble Lord, Mr. Charles Cochrane informed his Lordship that the memorial had been unanimously adopted at a crowded public meeting of inhabitants of the borough of Marylebone, recently held. Lord John Russell replied to the deputation to the following effect:—"Gentlemen, I do not think it necessary to make any remarks on the memorial which has just been read. But I cannot forbear observing that it seems to proceed on the assumption that there is now a prohibitory duty on the admission of foreign corn. That is not a correct representation of the facts of the case. Sir Robert Peel last session brought in and carried a measure which very considerably reduced the duty on corn, and under this new measure 3,000,000 quarters have already been let in, and a very large quantity more may be soon expected. Sir Robert Peel, seeing the impossibility of carrying the total abolition of the duty at once, proposed such a measure as he thought he could carry; and I, feeling also that total and immediate repeal could not be carried, accepted and supported Sir Robert Peel's measure. If I find it necessary that the ports should be opened, I will consult with my colleagues as to the propriety of the step." Mr. Cochrane said he could inform his Lordship that arrangements were now making for a vigorous agitation in the metropolis on the subject. Perhaps an energetic agitation would have th[illegible] effect of prevailing on his Lordship to listen to the prayer of the memorial which had just been presented. Lord John Russell (smiling).—No, that would not induce me to take the step you suggest. But if I deem the measure necessary, if I see a probability that prices are about to rise, I will not, in that case, hesitate to advise my colleagues to order the immediate opening of the ports. The deputation then withdrew, after thanking the noble Lord for the great courtesy with which he had received them.

Mr. Berkeley Lionel Scudamore Stanhope, B.A., of Baliol College, and Mr. Francis Compton, B.A. and Post-Master of Merton, were elected last night to the vacant Fellowships at All Souls.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

THE GARRICK THEATRE DESTROYED BY FIRE

On Wednesday morning, between four and five o'clock, the Garrick Theatre, Leman-street, Goodman's Fields, was discovered to be on fire. The flames spread very rapidly. The Brigade engines were speedily brought, and set to work, under the direction of Mr. Fogo, the foreman of the district. By this time, however, the whole tier of boxes, together with the gallery, were wrapped in fire, and the flames communicated with the pit and magazine floors, so that by five o'clock, or a little after, the theatre was on fire from the basement to the roof. The great number of scenes and other combustible articles in the building proved such a powerful auxiliary to the flames, that when the roof fell in, the fire mounted several yards above the level of the house tops in the surrounding streets. Other engines of the London Brigade arrived in rapid succession. The mains of the East London Works afforded an abundant supply of water, which was scattered over the fire and the several surrounding habitations. This had the desired effect of cutting off the progress of the fire just as it had communicated with the Jews' Orphan Asylum, in the Tenter-ground, and the gun factory of Mr Scott.

No sooner had the firemen succeeded in dumping the fire in the direction before spoken of than their endeavours were directed towards saving the Garrick Tavern, which they accomplished by leading the hose through the theatre, and directing the branches against the back front. The damage, however, done to the three latter buildings is very considerable. By nine o'clock the firemen succeeded in getting the flames entirely extinguished; by that hour the theatre was entirely consumed, and the valuable wardrobe destroyed. The whole of the scenery and stage appointments are likewise burned, by which calamity we regret to state that about fifty performers will be thrown out of employment. It is thought that the fire was caused from some of the gun wadding lodging in the flats during the firing of cannon at the performance of "The Battle of Waterloo" on the previous evening.

Whilst the firemen were directing the water on the theatre, the outer wall in the Tenter-ground fell with an awful crash—the police and firemen having barely sufficient time to get out of the way. One of the police-constables was severely injured, and was obliged to be removed to the London Hospital, where he at present remains. Although the lessees of the theatre are insured, we understand that their loss will far exceed the amount of their policies, to say nothing of the serious destruction of property belonging to the actors.

A POLICEMAN MURDERED BY A WOMAN AT BRISTOL.—A horrible murder was committed in Lion-street, in the parish of St. Philips, Bristol, on Sunday evening, by a woman cutting the throat of a policeman belonging to the city force. About five o'clock a fly drove up to the St. Philip's station, from which a female alighted, and immediately rushed into the station-room, exclaiming to the inspector who was on duty, "Take me into custody—take me into custody!" On asking her upon what charge, she stated that she had cut a man's throat at her lodgings in Lion-street, and begged Inspector Webb immediately to proceed to the spot. She appeared greatly excited, and she being recognised as the step-daughter of one of the sergeants of the police force, and her face appearing flushed with drink, her assertion was at first disbelieved, but Webb subsequently proceeded to Lion-street, where he found that policeman Patrick White had had his throat cut by her from ear to ear, and was lying dead in the house. He was informed that the female who had given herself into custody was called Ferris, and that she and deceased had been drinking together during the greater portion of the day, it being Ferris's birthday. An attachment, it is stated, existed on the part of the female for White, and in the latter part of the afternoon a young woman named Jones came into the room, and they all drank together. On Jones going to her bed-room, she was followed by White, a circumstance which excited the jealousy of Ferris. Mrs. Ferris went down stairs, and was soon followed by White, who sat down in the room with her, and lighted his pipe, and almost immediately afterwards White was heard to utter some expressions in an indistinct manner, and it was then observed that his throat had been cut in a shocking way, the blood pouring from the wound in a large stream. The unfortunate man contrived to crawl out of the room into the street, where he was picked up by a person who was passing, and a surgeon was instantly sent for, but the poor fellow gradually sunk, and expired shortly after being taken into the house. All the parties in the house where the occurrence took place have been taken into custody.—An inquest was commenced on Monday, and continued on Tuesday. The evidence did not disclose any new fact; and the Jury returned a verdict of "Wilful Murder" against Louisa Ferris, who was committed upon the Coroner's warrant.

FATAL RAILWAY ACCIDENT.—On Saturday evening last, a fatal accident occurred on the midland line of railway between Nottingham and Derby. A young man, about twenty-five years of age, named Thomas Mallen, servant to the Rev Mr Curzon, of Weston, near Derby, left that town intending to go to Nottingham. On arriving at Sawley, seven miles on the line, he perceived that he had got into the Leicester instead of into the Nottingham train, and without waiting till he got to the next station, he opened the carriage door and jumped out, while the train was in rapid motion. He fell upon the line of rails with his left leg, which was instantly run over by three carriages, and it was so smashed that on being conveyed to the General Infirmary at Nottingham, his leg was obliged to be amputated immediately, and he died at half-past one o'clock on Sunday morning.

THE MARKETS.

[illegible] Friday).—The present week's arrivals of English wheat have been on a very limited sca[illegible] the show of samples—most of which were left over from Monda[illegible] market—was large. All descriptions were a very dull inquiry, at a further decline i[illegible] quotations of quite 1s per quarter. With foreign wheat we were fairly supplied, whil[illegible] little was doing in it that the prices were almost nominal. In grain under lock no sales took place. The quantity of English barley was small—that of foreign good, and of excellent quality. That article was very dull, and 1s per quarter cheaper. The show of malt was v[illegible] trifling, yet, as the large brewers kept out of the market, the sale was heavy, at [illegible] late rates. Oats, beans, peas, and flour were obtainable on easier terms.

[illegible] wheat 2840, barl[illegible]y 3330 oats, 210 Irish Wheat [illegible] barley, 1000; oats, 2860. Foreign wheat, 3590; barley 4230; oats, 14,800; flour, 2370 sacks, malt, 1980 quarters; foreign flour, 7640 barrels.

[illegible] 55s to 66s; ditto white, 60s to 71s; N[illegible] folk, red, 55s to 60s, ditto white, 60s to 68s; rye, 42s to 44s, grinding barl[illegible] [illegible]ting, 39s to 41s; malting ditto, 43s to 46s; Lincoln and Norfolk malt, 68s to 72s; brown ditto, 70s to —s; Kingston and Ware, 70s to 74s; Chevalier, 72s to 74s. Yorkshire and Lincolnshire [illegible] ditto, 31s to 33s; Youghal and Cork, black, 25s to 26s, ditto [illegible] tick beans, new, 40s to 44s; ditto old, 48s to 52s; gray peas, 45s to 46s, [illegible] white, 56s to 60s; boilers, 58s to 61s, per quarter. Town-made flour, 51s [illegible] 48s to 50s: Stockton and Yorkshire, 42s to 50s, per 280 lbs. Foreign. Free [illegible] quarter. In Bond.—Barley [illegible]s; ditto, [illegible] to —s; and pe[illegible] to —s per [illegible] Flour, American, 34s to 36s; Baltic, [illegible] to —s per barrel.

The Seed Market.—On the whole, a fair avera[illegible] business has been do[illegible] in this market yet we can notice no alteration in value.

Linseed, English, sowing, 55s to 60s Baltic, crushing, 44s 0d to 48s; Mediterranean and [illegible] 48s. Hempseed, [illegible] per quarter. Coriander, 12s to 15s per cwt. Brown [illegible] Tares, 4s 6d to 6s per bushel. English [illegible] Linseed cakes, English, £13 to £1[illegible] [illegible] seed cakes, £5 15s to £6 per ton. Canary, 56s to [illegible] English Clover-seed, red, 45s to 50s; extra, 25s to 55s; white, 60s to 62s [illegible] Foreign, red, 40s to 48s; extra, 50s; white, 60s to 62s, extra, 75s per cwt. [illegible]ices of wheaten bread in the metropolis are from 9½d to 10d; of household ditto, 8d to 9d per 4lb loaf.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 61s 9d; barley, [illegible]s 6d; oats, 27s 0d; rye, 41s 1d; beans, 46s 1d; peas, 50s 8d.

The Six Weeks' Average.—Wheat, 57s 9d; barley, 38s 6d; oats, 25s 3d; rye, 37s 6d, beans, 41s 6d, peas, 47s 3d.

Duties on Foreign Cor[illegible] Wheat, 4s 0d; barley, 2s 0d; oats, 1s 6d; rye, 2s 0d; beans [illegible]s 0d.

[illegible] moderat[illegible] ness has been transacted in raw [illegible] we have [illegible] materia[illegible] alteration to report [illegible] Brown lumps are selling at 65s to 65s 6d, and standard do., 66s per cwt.

Coffee.—A fair amount of business has been passing in most kinds of coffee, the prices of which [illegible] about stationary.

[illegible] There is more doing in this article, and the quotations are somew[illegible]

Provisions.—There is a steady demand for Dutch butter, at full prices [illegible] land is selling at 100s to 105s; and the inferior kinds, 94s to 98s per cwt. The supply of Irish butter being large, the quotations have further declined 1s to 2s per cwt. Fine Carlow and Clonmel, landed, 98s to 100s; and Cork and Limerick, 94s to 95s per cwt. For future delivery, very little is doing. Carlow, on board, has sold at 94s to 98s; Carrick, 95s to 97s, Waterford, 96s to 94s; Cork, 92s to 94s, and Limerick, 89s to 92s. English butter is very dull, and again cheaper. Prime Dorset, 108s to 110s; middling, 100s to 104s per cwt. fresh 11s to 13s per dozen pounds. Bacon is heavy, and 1s to 2s per cwt lower. Prime sizeable Waterford, 58s to 62s, and heavy, 50s to 56s per cwt. Tierce middles have given way 1s to 2s per cwt, with a heavy demand. All other kinds of provisions are very dull, and easier to purch[illegible]

Tallow.—Owing to the large arrivals from Russia, buyers are very cautious, and th[illegible] have declined 6d to 9d per cwt. P. Y. C. on the spot, 49s to 49s 3d; and for delivery up to the end of the year, 49s per cwt. Town tallow is steady, at 50s net cash.

H[illegible]—M[illegible] H[illegible] £2 8s to £[illegible] 18s; clover ditto, £3 8s to £5 0s; and straw, £1 6s to £1 [illegible]s per load. Trade very dull, at the above quotations.

Coals (Friday).—Eden Main, 20s 3d; Kelloe, 20s 9d; Tees, 21s; Hasting's Hartley, 19s 3d; New Tanfield, 15s 6d, and Townley, 17s per ton.

Hops (Friday).—As most parties are now waiting for the official announcement of the Duty which to-day is calculated at £[illegible]00), this market continues in a very stagnant state, and prices rule almost nominal. New Sussex pockets, £3 15s to £4 8s; Weald of Kent d[illegible] Mid and East Kent ditto, £4 10s to £6 6s per cwt.

Smithfield (Friday).—More than a moiety of the supply of beasts on sale here to-day (the number of which was 1052 head, a large arrival, even the time of year considered) was derived from abroad. All kinds of that description of stock met a very dull inquiry, at a further decline in the quotations of 2d per 8lb, and at which a clearance was not effected. We had on offer 540 oxen and cows, 1440 sheep, and 19 calves from Holland, and other [illegible] ports. Although the numbers of sheep were small, the mutton trade was in a very depressed state, at, in some instances, an abatement in value of 2d per 8lb. In calves, comparatively little was doing, at barely stationary prices. The pork trade was heavy, at our quotations. M[illegible] £16 to £19 each, including their small cal[illegible] [illegible]nd inferior beasts, 2s 6d to 2s 8d; second quality ditto, [illegible]d to 3s 4d, prime Scots, &c., 3s 0d to 3s 10d; coarse and [illegible] 10d to 4s 0d; second quality ditto, 4s 2d to 4s 4d; prime coarse-woolled ditto, 4s 6d to 4s 8d; prime South Down ditto 4s 10d to 5s 0d; large [illegible] 4s 2d, prime small ditto [illegible] kers, 4s 6d to 4s 8d. Suckli[illegible] each. [illegible]

[illegible]:—Inferior beef, 2s 4d to 2s 6d; middling ditto, 2s 8d to 2s 10d; prime large ditto, 3s 0d to 3s 2d; prime small ditto, 3s 2d to 3s 4d, large pork, 3s 4d to 4s 0d, inferior mutton, 3s 4d to 3s 8d; middling ditto, 3s 10d to 4s 2d; prime ditto, 4s 4d to 4s 6d, veal, 3s 4d to 4s 4d; small pork, 4s 2d to 4s 6d. ROBERT HERBERT.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

The Discount Market continues easy at about former rates, but a tendency upwards is apparent. Some apprehension is felt with regard to the state of the Foreign Exchanges, which has had the effect of causing great wariness on the part of capitalists, who are limiting the time for advances, in order to be prepared for any alteration which the Directors of the Bank of England may make in the rate of Discount. That a change in the value of money will occur if the Foreign Exchanges do not improve, is a probability almost amounting to certainty.

The English Market was heavy at the beginning of the week, Monday having been a close holiday in the House, and many of the members extending the period till Wednesday. Consols, on Tuesday, closed at 94⅝ to ½ for Money, and 94⅝ to ¾ for Account. Wednesday's prices were a trifle wider, but no advance ultimately occurred on quotations. On Thursday, however, a better tone prevailed, and the Market closes firmly at 94⅜ to ¾ for Money, and 94⅞ for Account. Exchequer Bills have undergone great depression, a large amount having been unsaleable at 6s premium; at present they quote—for small, 13s; for large, 9s. Bank Stock is 204½ to 205; Long Annuities, 9⅞; New Three-and-a-Quarter per Cent[illegible] Reduced, 93⅝; India Bonds, 18 to 23 premium.

The operations in the Foreign House continue on the same limited scale, the only fluctuating stocks being Spanish and Mexican. The latter quoted 22 on Monday, but closed flatly. The price has scarcely varied since, and it is the closing quotation. Spanish has been tolerably firm, at about ½ per cent. improvement upon the opening quotation of the week. Portuguese continues heavy, without any material alteration, but the tendency is rather upward. The last quotations of the Stocks at which business had been really done at the close of the week, are, for Mexican 5 per Cents, 1846, 21⅝; Ditto, Account, 22½; Ditto Small, 22⅜; Portuguese Bonds, 4 per Cent., 39½, Ditto, Account, 40; Spanish 5 per Cents, for Account, 26½, Dutch 2½ per Cents, 59⅜.

The Share Market at the commencement of the week was active, with improved prices. The old lines have been in good demand. Caledonians have improved; and North British, Aberdeens, and Eastern Counties are better. The latter propose to change the present shares of £14 16s. each into £20 shares, upon a payment of £1 4s. per share. Great Westerns and South-Westerns have been exclusively dealt in, particularly the smaller shares. At the close of the market Aberdeens quoted 19½ ex new; Ambergate, Nottingham, Boston, and Eastern Junction, 2⅞; Birmingham and Gloucester, 129; Birmingham and Oxford Junction, 8½; Bristol and Exeter, 81; Ditto New, 9, Caledonian, 24; Ditto Half Shares, 2¼; Direct Northern, 1⅝; Eastern Counties, 22½; Ditto New, 7⅝ pm.; Ditto York Extension, 3⅝; East Lancashire, 18½; Ditto New, 8¾; East Lincolnshire, 1; Edinburgh and Glasgow, 76½; Ditto Half Shares, 20½; Ditto Quarter Shares, 19½; Ely and Huntingdon, [illegible]; Exeter, Yeovil, and Dorset, 3¼; Great Southern and Western (Ireland) [illegible]; Great North of England New, 20½; Great Western Quarter Shares, 19½; Ditto Fifths, 30¾; Ditto New, 7½; Hull and Selby Quarter Shares, 23½; Lancaster and Carlisle New, 10⅝; Leeds and Bradford, 74, London and Blackwall, 9⅛; London, Brighton, and South Coast, 59⅝; London and N West, 198; Do. New Shares, 16½; London and South Western, 67¾ xin; London and York, 2; London, Salisbury, and Yeovil, 1⅝; Lynn and Dereham, 16; Manchester and Leeds, 106; Ditto Quarters, 6; Ditto Fifths, 8½, Manchester and Birmingham, 74½; Ditto Quarters (A), 12¾; Ditto Quarters (B), 12⅝; Ditto Quarters (C), 8; Manchester, Buxton, and Matlock, 1⅛ p; Midland, 133; Ditto, New, 7; Newcastle and Berwick, 33 xin; Newmarket and Chesterford, 5½; North British, 37½; Ditto Half Shares, 16½; Ditto Quarters, 3⅞; Ditto Extension, 1⅞, North Staffordshire, 2⅝ p; Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton, 6⅝; Scottish Central, 20¾; South Wales, 4; West Riding Union, 1½ p; York and Newcastle, 44; Ditto New, 18½; Ditto Preference, [illegible] York and North Midland Half Shares, 48½; Ditto, Selby, 86½, Ditto, Extension, 41¾; Ditto, Preference, 10⅝; Ditto East and West Riding Extension, 20½; Boulogne and Amiens, 14⅞, Demerara, 2⅞; East Indian, ¾; Great Western Bengal, ⅛; Luxembourg, 1⅛; Namur and Liege, 3⅜; Northern of France Constituted 11½; Orleans and Bordeaux, 7½; Paris and Lyons Constituted, 5; Paris and Rouen, 35⅜.

SATURDAY MORNING.—Consols opened buoyantly yesterday, touching 94⅞ for money, but closed a shade flatter, quoting 94⅝ for money and time. Exchequer Bills were better, closing at 14 pm. The Foreign Market was inactive. M[illegible] was scarcely affected by the suspension of the agency, who, notwithstanding, are proceeding with the conversion. Shares were good. Great Westerns improved a point upon the news of the arrangements being concluded with the South Wales Company. The terms are regarded as the most equitable of all the arrangements made by the Great Western Board, being free from that extravagance which has too often marked former proceedings.

FIELD most respectfully states to the Public that he will COMMENCE his MUSICAL ENTERTAINMENTS at the CITY CONCERT and LECTURE [illegible], Milton-street, Finsbury-square, on TUESDAY EVENING, the 17th Instant, when he will be assisted by his Daughter and three of his Sons. The members of nearly all the London Literary Institutions have highly applauded Mr. FIELD'S Lectures on "the Military and Naval Services," in which he sings some of the best songs of Dibdin, and other National Pieces; and the Press has always noticed these Lectures in the most flattering manner; as they are not mixed up with any political f[illegible] nor do th[illegible] that can give offence to a foreigner, with whose native country England, in years gone was at variance, but, while speaking of England's Commanders frequent mention is made of the officers of other nations, remindi[illegible] audience th[illegible]t was a Foe the noble, the brave, the generous Marshal Soult that raised a monument to the memory of our distinguished countryman, General Sir John Moore!...—After the 17th, Mr FIELD will be at the City Theatre every Monday and Wednesday Evening He will commence with Moore's "Evenings in Greece," the music by his favourite composer, Sir H. Bishop, in which Miss Field will sing the beautiful Songs, "Sappho at her Loom," and "Weeping for Thee, Love;" and between the parts will play as a Duet, with her Brother, on one of Tomkinson's patent Grand Pianofortes, the Overture to "Massaniello" Mr G. Bennett, the Con[illegible]ger, from the Theatre Royal, Norwich, whom Mr. Field has engaged expressly for these entertainments, will sing some of the most popular Comic Songs

ROYAL NURSERY.—"DELCROIX'S MACASSAR OIL," imported under the sanction of the "Lords of the Treasury," for the use of her Majesty and the Royal Nursery, is protected by two elegantly-executed correct likenesses, in embossed medallions, of her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert. It produces beautifully flowing curls and, by the transcendant lustre it imparts, renders the hair truly enchanting. No Nursery, where personal advantages are considered important, should be without it. All [illegible] should be sent to Messrs. Delcroix, 158, New Bond-street, as hairdressers, not being appointed agents, for the sake of gain, vend the most spurious trash as the genuine.

ANOTHER DEATH from DOCTORS' PHYSIC—(Mor[illegible] Times newspaper of Friday last, the 30th ultimo, it app[illegible]ster at Washington has died in that city from an over-dose (as it is called) of morphine. It was only last week that a poor child was poisoned in London with half a pill of morphine! The public are always told it is either an "over-dose" or "a mistake." In the name of common sense, we ask, is it not monstrous that such deadly poisons should be used in medicine? Let the public bear in mind that there can be no mistake in such cases, since death follows so soon after the deadly drug is taken. If half a pill of morphine can poison a child on the instant, as it were, surely it is an abuse of common sense to say that such a poison can be useful in any case. Let the public compare Morison's Pills (the medicine of hygeists, which can and has been taken thousands of times in all quantities, with the best results) with these poisons of doctors, and the public will understand the real difference between a medicinal preparation and a poisonous one. Call morphine, arsenic, prussic acid, &c., medicines indeed! We blush for those who have the face to hold them out to a confiding public as such.—British College of Health, New-road, London, Nov. [illegible], 1846.

NEW POOR-LAW WORKHOUSES.

A PUBLIC meeting was held on Thursday, at the London Tavern, for the purpose of taking into consideration Mr. B. B. Cabbell's plan to remedy some of the evils of the New Poor-Law. A brief notice of the objects and proceedings of the meeting appears in another part of our paper. Such a meeting, numerously and respectably attended, and presided over by the Chief Magistrate of the Metropolis, is indicative of the popular dissatisfaction which prevails against the Poor-Law Commissioners.

The startling disclosures before the Andover Union Committee have made the present system of Poor-Law Administration a common topic of conversation. The Poor-Law Commissioners, abandoned by all parties, hold their offices in suspense and disgrace, till the sentence passed on them by universal acclamation is executed. The Act which gives them official existence expires next year; and, in this particular juncture of affairs, rather complicates the political considerations which the subject involves. "What," say the advocates of the present system, "will Lord John do with the Commissioners?" "What new plan for the relief of the poor," ask its opponents, "will Lord John devise?"

The Poor-Law Act, though conferring unlimited power on the Commissioners, is based on a sound principle, viz., that labour ought to be given in return for lodging, clothing, and maintenance. Like the statute of Elizabeth, it is essentially humane; but, like that statute, it has been abused by those whose peculiar duty it is to enforce its principles in a spirit of kindly feeling to the poor. The spirit in which it has been administered may be gathered from official papers.

In the earliest days of the Commission, plans for Workhouses were arranged, under the immediate superintendence of the Commissioners themselves. Sir Francis Head, who was then an Assistant-Commissioner, has the merit of designing one for 500 inmates, who were to be confined in two yards. He describes his design to be "founded on the principle that, in the construction of a rural Workhouse, the height of the rooms, the thickness of the walls, &c. &c., should not exceed the dimensions of the cottage of the labourer; well-built, substantial rooms being a luxury as attractive to the pauper as food and raiment." The other designs, which are also published in the 1st and 2nd Annual Reports of the Commissioners, have the name of an architect attached to them, but, in fact, are tracings from designs for American prisons. The young and inexperienced architect who appropriated these prison plans to a purpose for which they were never intended, was not, it may be supposed, overmuch startled when Cobbett denounced the new buildings as "Bastilles."

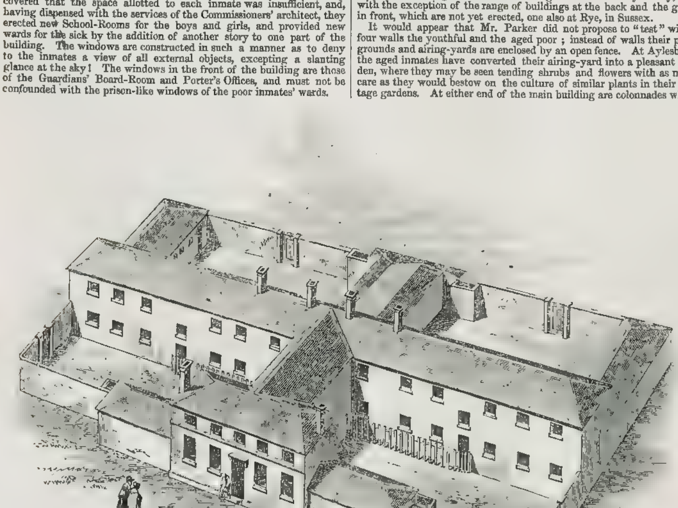
Mr. F. Lewis, one of the Commissioners, when a member of the House of Commons, asserted that the statute of Elizabeth meant "to inflict compulsory labour by way of punishment, not to afford labour for the mere purpose of maintenance." The man who put such an odious interpretation on that Act, who regarded poverty as a crime, was not likely to approve of plans for Workhouses which did not bear all the external appearances of Bastilles.

The Andover Union Workhouse is constructed after the design which we have copied from the second Annual Report of the Commissioners. It was erected under the immediate superintendence of the Commissioners' own architect, and, when completed, was estimated to be capable of accommodating a greater number of inmates by one-third than the medical attendant ventured to recommend the Guardians to admit into it. It will be perceived that there are only four yards: these yards mark the number of classes into which the inmates are to be formed. The space allotted to each boy or girl in the dormitories was 77 cubic feet, and it was proposed by the Commissioners that the beds should be arranged in tiers, like berths in a ship. The Chapel and Dining Hall was the only day-room for the women, young and old; and there was only one day-room for the boys and girls, which was intended to be Day-Room, School-Room, and Dining-Room. The Guardians soon discovered that the space allotted to each inmate was insufficient, and, having dispensed with the services of the Commissioners' architect, they erected new School-Rooms for the boys and girls, and provided new wards for the sick by the addition of another story to one part of the building. The windows are constructed in such a manner as to deny to the inmates a view of all external objects, excepting a slanting glance at the sky! The windows in the front of the building are those of the Guardians' Board-Room and Porter's Offices, and must not be confounded with the prison-like windows of the poor inmates' wards.

The work to which the male inmates were set was "compulsory labour by way of punishment." They were employed to pound bones charged with animal matter, the effluvium from which is described as having been intolerable. This kind of labour was very generally resorted to in the Workhouses in that part of England. Mr. Parker, the Ex-Assistant Commissioner, not only constantly verbally objected to it, but, in several instances, stated his objections in writing, whilst Mr. Chadwick wrote an unanswerable paper recommending its discontinuance. Mr. George Lewis, who succeeded his father as Commissioner, paid as little heed to the one as to the other until public opinion declared itself, and was about to hurl destruction on the supporters of this bone-crushing: then, and not till then, did he and his colleagues forbid this description of labour. Having been called to account for their tardiness in forbidding the poor to be employed at such disgusting and unhealthy work, the Commissioners endeavoured to shift the responsibility on their subordinate, who repelled the accusation, and brought home the delinquency to the Commissioners themselves.

The Ex-Assistant Commissioner offended the triumvirate on the subject of Workhouses. He objected to the prison-like appearance of the Commissioners' plans, and designed four or five Workhouse plans, which possess some claims to architectural taste. We have taken one of his designs by way of contrast to that of the Commissioners. It is an isometrical view of the Workhouse which is about to be erected at Canterbury. A building after the same design is erected at Aylesbury, and, with the exception of the range of buildings at the back and the group in front, which are not yet erected, one also at Rye, in Sussex.

It would appear that Mr. Parker did not propose to "test" within four walls the youthful and the aged poor; instead of walls their playgrounds and airing-yards are enclosed by an open fence. At Aylesbury, the aged inmates have converted their airing-yard into a pleasant garden, where they may be seen tending shrubs and flowers with as much care as they would bestow on the culture of similar plants in their cottage gardens. At either end of the main building are colonnades where the children can take recreation in wet weather. The windows throughout the building are arranged in such a manner as to enable the inmates to enjoy the prospect from them. From the windows of the Aylesbury Workhouse there is a delightful view of the Chiltern Hills, and from the Rye Workhouse the coast of France is discernible in a clear day.



THE ANDOVER UNION WORKHOUSE.

The range of buildings at the back is the Infirmary. It contains spacious dormitories and wards for various diseases, which require separate treatment. It is also provided with a surgery, nurses' rooms, and baths.

The group of buildings in front is the Guardians' Offices and the Porter's Lodge.

The yards at the back of the main building, separated by the Chapel, are appropriated to the able-bodied male and female inmates. The sitting-room of the Master and Matron commands these yards.

The Schoolmaster and Mistress, from their respective oriel windows in the wings of the principal building, view their pupils in the hours of recreation. The nurse, in like manner, can see the sick patients in the garden where the infirmary patients take air and exercise, whilst the porter and his wife can overlook the aged people.

The Kitchen department is at the distant end of the Chapel. The cooking is conducted by means of a steam apparatus, which not only performs all the duties required of a steam-kitchen, but also boils the linen in the wash-house, and supplies hot water to the washing-tubs in the laundry, and baths in the Infirmary and receiving wards.

The Chapel is a handsome hall 58 feet by 23 feet. The roof is included in the area of the section, and its timbers are so arranged as to give the hall the appearance of a place of worship. The service in a Workhouse is in the nature of domestic prayer, and therefore the Chapel is not inappropriately the Dining Hall as well as the hall where the family assemble for their orisons.

The Turret in the centre of the principal building is a shaft, which, by a simple contrivance that has received the approbation of Dr. Arnott, effectually ventilates the day rooms and dormitories. The necessity for ventilation in such establishments as Workhouses is too obvious to require remark. The means which have been employed to effect this desideratum in public buildings have generally been so imperfect as to make it doubtful whether the prospect of fever and the ills of an unwholesome atmosphere were not equivalent to the chance of colds, catarrhs, and other ailments, which are brought about by exposure to currents of chilling air. According to Mr. Parker's system, the apartments are heated by hot water, and the warmth evolved by it attracts fresh air, which, tempered by contact with the heated water-pipes, flows into the apartments in small jets, whilst the vitiated air escapes through the ventilators, and passes off through the central shaft. The Commissioners, in their plans, deemed 150 cubic feet sufficient space for a full grown person, and 77 for a child. Mr. Parker, with efficient ventilation, assigns to each adult in health 266 cubic feet, being the average volume of air drawn into the lungs of a full grown man in twenty-four hours, and in sickness 300; whilst to each child he allows 160 cubic feet.

The bitter feeling which the Commissioners evinced before the Andover Committee on the subject of Workhouse Plans was remarkable; they insinuated that Mr. Parker had no authority to visit the Aylesbury Union for the purpose of introducing his improved plans. Dysentery, diarrhœa, and fever, had made sad havoc there, amongst the inmates of the old Workhouse; yet, with the knowledge that such diseases were endemic, they insinuated that he committed an official irregularity in going there to remedy the evil. In conveying this insinuation they violently objected to the production of notes marked "private," as if they expected Mr. Parker to sit quietly under an insinuation, and keep his defence in his pocket. The production of a note marked "private," overturned the much-abused doctrine of confidentiality and the tables on these high public functionaries.

Under the administration of the present Poor-Law Commissioners, the Poor-Law expenditure has increased about one million in the last eight years. In 1837, says the Edinburgh Review, it was four millions; in 1845 it was five millions. In 1843, one-tenth of the population was in a state of pauperism; whilst in 1844, say the Commissioners in their Eleventh Annual Report, the number of persons relieved may be taken at nearly one-eighth part of the population.

The Westminster Review, which has taken alarm at this state of things, says:—"There is to us a solemnity in this announcement like that of a funeral knell—the knell of a nation. One-eighth part of the population of England and Wales paupers in a year of railroad activity, and with wheat at 51s. and 5d.!"

The Commissioners' days are numbered, and, in the meantime, public opinion forbids the erection of "Bastiles."

HEALTH OF TOWNS.

WE believe our leading statesmen are impressed, or are beginning to be impressed, with the conviction that the direction of their legislative efforts, for the future, must be towards social improvements, bettering the means of living, or what may be called the "science of life." In this respect we have yet much to learn. We make wealth and acquire skill, but do not apply them to the things around us so completely or extensively as it is in our power to do. We are great and wealthy, but live, move, and respire among deteriorating influences that money might remove, but does not. We rule the world from the midst of filth and fever. These enemies, being invisible, we do not think them worth combating, though figures prove they are killing nearly two hundred every day that passes over us, besides diminishing the health and happiness of those who escape. Suppose an armed force bringing such destruction among us, what exertions and sacrifices would be made to destroy it! But we live on in singular indifference to the "pestilence that slayeth at noon-day," and the "arrow that flieth by night," though we have in our power the means of defence: energy to use them seems all that is wanting to shield us from that mass of suffering which comes under the definition of "preventible disease." The question is one affecting alike both rich and poor; for our neglect is very impartial as to all classes; the dwellings of the richest and noblest are in close contact with hotbeds of contagion; and even in the internal arrangements of buildings of the highest class, modern science points out defects that sow diseases in the midst of magnificence. Classes are exclusive enough, and divided by impassable gulfs and chasms from each other; but, physically and locally, they cannot "dwell apart," and accident or necessity, as if to prove that all are so far on a level, has brought startling contrasts into close juxtaposition. The Houses of Parliament, where our Statesmen achieve their greatness, and the old Abbey, where they rest in monumental fame from their labours, are surrounded by one of the dirtiest and most disreputable neighbourhoods of the Metropolis: the Palace of the Sovereign is badly placed for health, and worse built for convenience: all the money that has been lavished on it has not secured either comfort or grandeur. The House of those Merchant Princes who hold "the gorgeous East in fee," has, we have heard, some of its windows walled up to keep out the disgusting smells of a skin and leather market: a strange anomaly this, that the rulers of the Continent of India cannot remove from beneath their very noses a nuisance which the smallest of their tributary Princes would not tolerate within a mile of his dwelling! And more, and worse than these instances, in this the nineteenth century, we permit cattle markets to be held in the very heart of a densely crowded city, which can only be reached through miles of busy streets, and allow the same cattle to be slaughtered in back kitchens, shops, and cellars, in every part of the town, under circumstances that brutalise men and torture the brutes, and both without necessity. Worse again than this, we tolerate the interment of the dead in the haunts of the living, where the sanctity of the grave and every association connected with peace and repose are violated; where outrages the most horrible are committed, avarice making burial a profitable trade, which, to its own gain, sacrifices the feelings and health of the living, and even dares to mock and "profane the service of the dead" and the rites of the Church. It is scarcely credible that such things can co-exist with the intelligence and spirit we display in other matters. But the energy that has established our boundless dominion over other nations has not yet been turned to securing health for ourselves. While we are yoking steam to our chariots, and making the yet more mysterious forces of nature carry our thoughts across whole kingdoms, with little less than the speed of that thought itself, we live on in communities where the almost awful excess of vitality has far outrun the provisions for maintaining it in health and vigour. Machinery, of nearly super-human ingenuity, spins, and weaves, and performs material miracles in the centre of thousands who scarcely know what pure air is, and to whom the "breath of life" is a misnomer—so loaded is it with poison and disease. Our Manchesters are marvels for all that can create wealth; nothing has been neglected—save that without which wealth is valueless; where "Perceval wrote, and Dalton lived," nearly two thousand children perish annually "over and above the mortality natural to mankind!"

Statesmen are, as we have already said, beginning to be alive to these evils; the contests of party are being changed from purely political questions to social ones. It is a field almost untouched, and the few attempts yet made have proved almost abortive, because no great or united movement has been made in support of them. A few isolated attempts on the part of some legistator, who takes up a question as a hobby, make no impression. The fate of Mr. Mackinnon's Smoke Prohibition Bill, and his Bill for preventing Interment in Towns, is that of all such products of individual zeal, sneered at, postponed, every discussion cut short by a "count out." Furnaces may darken the air, and gorged grave-yards corrupt it till the end of time, ere an unsupported individual put an end to the evils. How should it be otherwise? Legislators themselves complain that the greatest difficulty in the way of improvement in such matters is the indifference of the people. The utmost that can be done at present, therefore, is to awaken an interest on such matters; attention once directed to an evil, it almost always ceases. For this purpose, an Association has been formed with the express object of disseminating information as to the "Health of Towns," and the causes that injure it. This is the utmost that scientific and intelligent men can effect at present. They may act as "flappers" to that heavy body, the public, as deeply absorbed in the business of life as the philosophers of Laputa were in abstract meditation. Many ills are inseparable from poverty; and, unless a Government can lift the whole community to a state of comparative affluence, they will continue to exist; this no Government can do, and it will be nesessary to guard against unreasonable expectations. But, as far as life in cities or towns is artificial, it may be bettered by interference and arrangement. The air and light of heaven are pure and free, till man pollutes the one, and excludes the other from his dwellings—darkness being in a measure forced upon the people by a mischievous Window-tax. Drainage may be regulated; supplies of water may be regulated. In both these particulars, the community is at present given over, as a property, to public companies, whose first care is, of course, their own profit. Other abuses are equally or even more assailable, and "that's comfort yet:" for instance, though, at the recent Banquet at Guildhall, a Cabinet Minister said the House of Lords is "united in its determination to maintain the immunities and privileges of the City," we trust the privilege and immunity of keeping a cattle market in a spot where in no other city of Europe such a dangerous annoyance would be allowed, is not to be perpetual; we will answer for it that, when the time comes (and it is coming rapidly) the House of Lords will cut down this and sundry other "privileges and immunities," of the City and other bodies alike, with remarkable readiness, though the truth would not have recommended an after-dinner speech in the precincts of Guildhall. Future Governments will not be as apathetic in these matters as past ones have been; their existence as Governments will turn on such points; men's minds are being directed to the causes at work around them; they are no longer dazzled by Gazettes and bulletins of battles and victories abroad, and hounded on into senseless hatreds and divisions at home, for the advantage of parties and sections whose highest wisdom was the letting things go on to settle themselves as they might. What Governments can do, they will be compelled to do, for their own sakes; the creating an interest in such questions is half the remedy.

There was a time when the Gaol Fever was an ordinary disease, that carried off judges, jurors, and barristers; so attention was turned to it, and it has ceased: the Scurvy was once the scourge of our fleets; as it weakened our means of defence, that was examined and remedied; it is now unknown: the Small-Pox has yielded to skill and legislation; and other afflicting evils will in time be added to the same catalogue.

PORTS OF SUPPLY: MARSEILLES.

Many and anxious are the glances cast at present at the accounts from the outports: they are the doors through which, in the present need, abundance must enter, or not at all. In Germany, France, Ireland, and England, the same interest is felt as to the supplies from abroad. In the interior of the Sister Isle, the hopes rest on Dublin, or Cork, or Limerick; we in England turn to Liverpool: in the bureau of the French Minister of Agriculture and Commerce, Marseilles and its traffic is the great point of consideration. Thither have arrived the immense purchases of corn that have been effected for the French market at Odessa and in the ports of the Black Sea. The supplies so obtained are understood to be very great: they have had the effect already of lowering the price of grain, or, at least, of checking its rise. In England and Ireland, the same effect has been produced by the large importations from America, which are still on the increase. The accounts from Ireland are, consequently, less gloomy; the prices of provisions are fully to the level of England; they had recently been above it.

Marseilles is one of the most important commercial cities and seaports of France: she is the grand emporium of the south, and the centre of nine-tenths of the trade of France with the countries on the Mediterranean and the Black Sea.

Marseilles engrosses almost the whole trade between France and Algiers, and is the principal seat of the intercourse carried on by steamers with Malta, Alexandria, and Constantinople.

The Harbour, of which our Engraving presents a fine view, has the access defended by strong fortifications, and lies in the centre of the city. Though not accessible to the largest class of ships, Marseilles is one of the best and safest ports in the world for moderate-sized merchantmen, of which it will accommodate above 1000. There is a lighthouse in the Fort St. Jean, on the north side of the entrance to the port.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE

On Saturday afternoon, the Ambassadors, Ministers Plenipotentiary, and other diplomatic agents accredited at the French Court, proceeded to the Palace of the Tuileries, and complimented the Royal family and the Duchess de Montpensier on her Royal Highness's marriage.

The absence of Lord Normanby upon this occasion has created great excitement among the Paris papers. The official journal, the Débats, mentions the fact without any remark; but the Presse is much less discreet. It says.—"As we had stated, the diplomatic corps have been received, at the Palace of the Tuileries, on the occasion of the marriage of his Royal Highness the Duke de Montpensier. All the Ambassadors and Ministers Plenipotentiary now at Paris repaired in grand uniforms to this reception, where his Excellency the Ambassador of England shone by his absence. Such was the sincerity of that alliance, and the cordiality of that entente, which we have constantly exhorted our country to distrust."

The current report at Paris is that M. Guizot, at the request of the King, has furnished Lord Brougham with copies of all the correspondence which has passed between Lord Palmerston and the French Government on the subject of the Spanish marriages, in order that his Lordship may be enabled, at a fitting opportunity, to vindicate the course pursued by the French Cabinet.

The Constitutionnel confirms the statement relative to the marriage of the Duke de Bordeaux with the sister of the Duke de Modena. The contract was signed by procuration at Modena on the 30th of October, and on the 31st the marriage was published at Vienna, by order of the Emperor, who is first cousin to the Princess. The future Duchess of Bordeaux is thirty years of age. Her fortune is estimated at 100 millions of francs (four millions British). The Duke of Bordeaux is twenty-six years of age.

The Presse, the Court organ, does not seem much pleased at the marriage of the Duc de Bordeaux, the fact of which it confirms, and says it actually took place on the 5th inst. The Presse also states that the Duke has notified his marriage to the Viscount de Chateaubriand, and that the Duke of Modena's second sister is betrothed to the second son of Don Carlos.

The Count de Pontois, former Ambassador of France in Switzerland, has been elevated to the dignity of a Peer of France.

On Monday the inscription of the marriage certificate of the Duke and Duchess de Montpensier, in the registers of the état-civil of the Royal Family, took place, with all the usual formalities, in the Salon de Mars, at the Palace of St. Cloud. In addition every branch of the family, all the grand dignitaries of the State, with the Spanish Ambassador, and all the officers of the embassy, were present. At a quarter past four his Majesty entered the hall, leading in the Duchess de Montpensier; the Duke, her husband, supported his Royal mother. They were followed by all the Princes and Princesses, including the Count de Paris, the Duke de Chartres, and Prince Philip of Wirtemberg. The King, the Princes, and all the gentlemen present were in court dresses, or in full uniform, and wore the cordons and other insignia of the several orders with which they are invested. They took their seats at a table covered with velvet, placed under the portrait of Louis XIV. The bride and bridegroom sat between the King and Queen, and the rest of the family in succession at each hand of their Majesties. The Chancellor, Duke Pasquier, in his simarre, and the Grand Referendary, attended by M. Cauchy, Keeper of the Archives, were at the end of the table. Having received the King's command, the Chancellor read the act of marriage solemnised at Madrid. This done, the King rose and signed the entry, and was followed by the Queen, the Duke and Duchess de Montpensier, the Princes and Princesses, the Ministers, the Spanish Ambassador, and the other witnesses. At half-past six there was a grand dinner, at which were present the whole of those who took part in the ceremony, with other guests to the number of 140.

The Courrier Français asserts that the period for the assembling of the Chamber will be hastened, and that it will meet on the 15th of December instead of the period before fixed, the 12th of January.

A great number of vessels laden with corn continue to arrive at Marseilles. Between the 28th ult. and the 3rd inst., fifty-four arrived, bringing 184,000 hectolitres, of which 175,000 were wheat.

The Reforme has an article upon this subject, the object of which is to prove that these arrivals will not make a change in the corn market, but there is likely still to be a scarcity of grain. The Reforme says:—"The scarcity and dearness of corn are produced by natural causes, the insufficiency of the crop of 1845, and the still more sensible deficiency of the precocious harvest of 1846. It is not through a spirit of party that we say to the Government, Beware! The corn trade is impeded in its action by the prohibitive measures adopted in Bavaria, Prussia, the Grand Duchy of Baden, Wurtemberg, and Electoral Hesse. It is not through a spirit of party that we say that we have been informed that several cargoes of corn, which were about to enter France, have been stopped by order of the Government of Hesse, and thus our eastern departments, where wheat is selling at the exorbitant price of 35f. 50c. the hectolitre, and where bread is already sold at 70c. the kilogramme, are placed in a state of blockade by the entire German frontier."

The inauguration of the new Protestant church of Panthemont, in Paris, took place on Sunday, in the presence of a numerous congregation. The consecration was performed by M. Juillerat, President of the Consistory. The Ministers of Justice and Foreign Affairs, the Prefects of Paris and of Police, the Mayor of the 10th Municipal District, the Director of Ecclesiastical Affairs, and several high functionaries, were present at the ceremony.

Lord Brougham dined yesterday week with M. Guizot.

SPAIN.

The Royal decree dissolving the Cortes has appeared in the Gazette of Madrid. The new Cortes are to meet on the 25th of December

The Madrid Government has given assurances to Mr. Bulwer that the Spanish troops shall not cross the frontiers of Portugal. The only thing demanded by the Portuguese Government was, that Spanish troops should be placed on the frontiers to prevent bodies of armed insurgents from entering Spain, as they are in the habit of doing when pressed by the Queen's troops, in order that they may re-enter the country at some point where there is less danger. The Spanish Government have given orders to the Generals commanding the troops on the Portuguese frontiers to disarm such insurgents, and to send them into the interior.

Our latest accounts from Madrid still allude to probable changes in the Ministry. It is said that M. Mon, who is to receive the title of Marquis de Casa Mon, would be President of the new Cabinet, of which Messrs. Pidal, Pezuela, Bravo, Murillo, and the Marquis de Casa Irujo, would form part.

BELGIUM.

The session of the Belgian Chambers was opened by King Leopold on Monday, in rather a long speech, which his Majesty commenced by an expression of congratulation, that the relations of Belgium with Foreign Powers were of a pacific character. The speech then noticed several propositions for social improvement, and alluded to the prosperity of the principal branches of commerce. The linen trade was, however, in such a position as to require immediate relief. The speech announced various projects of law respecting bankruptcy and personal arrest, and alluded in terms of congratulation to the extension of the railway system. A compliment is then paid to the braves Belges. His Majesty went on to say "The army, one of the firm supports of the independence of the country, and of its institutions, continues to render itself worthy of my entire confidence and of the interest which you manifest for it. The efforts of my Government are directed to maintain in its ranks a useful emulation, and the sentiment of its duty towards its country." And his Majesty concluded thus:—"Belgium, in the bosom of peace, has developed the germs of a fruitful activity. In reflecting on the results already obtained, we are enabled to contemplate the future with confidence. The accord of the great powers of the state—the support which you have given to my Government, and on which I continue to depend will enable us to preserve and consolidate our institutions. The aspiration breathed by our country for ages, that she might have an existence for herself, and the disposal of her numerous resources, is realized in our days. It will always be a source of great happiness to me to reflect that my efforts have contributed to insure to Belgium the precious advantages of a free and independent existence."

THE UNITED STATES AND MEXICO.

There has been an arrival from New York, by the Cambridge, with papers to the 21st ult. They do not contain any further intelligence of the movements of General Taylor, but we have received the important intimation that the Americans intend prosecuting the war with all vigour—at least so the papers say. The official Washington Union thus alludes to it

"The papers have been speculating upon an expedition to Tampico. We see no good reason why it should not be undertaken. We have still at least 20,000 troops in the army of the Rio Grande. Allowing General Taylor's camp at Monterey to have one half of them, we have about 10,000 more in that wing of the army to furnish troops sufficient for a new expedition, besides guarding the points we occupy on the river, and maintaining the connection between our different depôts."

The same authority declares that Major Graham has started from Washington, charged with despatches for General Taylor, and that his instructions are to terminate "the temporary cessation of hostilities."

Private letters state that the Cabinet of Washington is not satisfied with the terms of armistice granted by General Taylor, and think that he dealt too leniently with Ampudia. The Americans now make it out that the battle of Monterey was a more serious affair than first accounts represented. They say that the American loss was 700, and that the Mexicans had 1500 killed and wounded.

Santa Anna, who had been appointed General Commander-in-Chief, arrived in Mexico on the 15th ult., and was received with the greatest enthusiasm. The people were unbounded in their testimonies of attachment to his person, and seemed frantic with joy. On the day previous to his arrival, when at Aljotla, he addressed a letter to General Almonte, the Minister of War. This document breathes a spirit of determined hostility towards the United States, and declares his readiness and anxiety to fulfil his utmost duty in opposing the enemies of his country. He promises to die fighting, or lead the valiant Mexicans to complete victory.

The dreadful hurricane, the effects of which were so disastrous at Havannah, on the 10th October, appears to have visited Charleston at the same time. A portion of the roof of Trinity Church was blown off, and the vessels in the harbour had sustained great injury. The gale begun from the north west, and continued blowing from that quarter, altering a little to the eastward, for some time. The accounts of the disasters at sea, during the gale which the Great Western encountered, are of the most distressing description.

The Rochester has since arrived, with papers one day later. There is no further news; but a report had been circulated in New York that another engagement had taken place between the Mexican and American troops. There are, however, no particulars, nor is the fact mentioned at all to be relied on.

POLICE.

The New Lord Mayor upon the Bench.—The new Lord Mayor took his seat at the Mansion-House for the first time on Tuesday, as Chief Magistrate. About ten lads, varying in age from twelve to sixteen, were charged with picking the pockets of gentlemen and ladies while viewing the civic pageant on Monday. One (an old offender) was fully committed for trial, and the remainder sent to Bridewell for fourteen days each.

The Right to the Wall.—On Wednesday, Mr. Ellis Bowden Weare, a gentleman who was dressed in rather fantastic style, having a small parti-coloured lady's handkerchief round his neck, with a large purple tie, to which there was a light green border, and several rings upon his fingers, was brought before the Lord Mayor, charged with having assaulted Mr. Shellingford, of Cheapside. Mr. Shellingford stated, that as he was walking along Cheapside, the defendant roughly pushed against him without the least provocation, and upon being remonstrated with struck him. The defendant subsequently, upon being given into the care of a policeman, apologised, and the apology was considered sufficient atonement. The Lord Mayor having asked whether the defendant appeared to be under the influence of strong drink of any kind, Mr Weare said he had had no refreshment except a bowl of soup at Alderman Birch's (Messrs. Ring and Brymer's), at 12 o'clock, and upon coming out and walking quietly and inoffensively down Cheapside, he was pushed and hustled about in a most unceremonious manner, although he strictly kept to his side of the wall. Irritated by such treatment in a great public thoroughfare, he had behaved rudely to the gentleman who complained, under the erroneous impression that Mr. Shellingford was amongst those who had elbowed him about. The Lord Mayor: Which do you consider to be your side of the wall? Mr. Weare: I consider that when my left side is next to the wall I am entitled to the wall. Well, I moved on, and reduced myself to as small a compass as possible, to get through the crowd, but it was all useless; I was knocked about from one to the other. The Lord Mayor: You were wrong in your opinion of the generally understood practice for the public accommodation, which is, that those whose right hands are next to the wall are entitled to the wall. Mr. Weare: Indeed! I had no notion of such a thing. I come from the country, and there the left hand always goes to the wall. (A laugh). The Lord Mayor: If you had taken the trouble to observe the stream of people, you could not have mistaken the fact. Such is the necessity in this crowded city for a regulation of the kind, that even ladies are not sanctioned in violating it. Mr. Weare: I am glad I know that. I squeezed myself into very small dimensions indeed, in order to avoid rough contact with those who were coming towards me; but I was hustled and struck. Mr. Shellingford said the gentleman appeared to be very much excited, and that the assault, as an assault, was not at all worth speaking about. Mr. Weare again expressed his regret at the annoyance to which his ignorance of the forms observed in the streets of London had subjected Mr. Shellingford. The Lord Mayor: If Mr. Shellingford is satisfied with your apology I see no reason why I should disapprove of it. The defendant then left the bar

The Girl Charged with Attempting to Strangle her Mother.—Ann Parker, aged nineteen, who was remanded on a charge of having attempted to murder her mother, by strangling her, was, on Tuesday, brought before Mr Combe at Clerkenwell Police-office, for final examination. The mother now attended, perfectly recovered, and declined prosecuting; she begged and prayed of Mr. Combe to discharge her "poor, dear child" The prisoner was discharged, when she left the court with her mother, apparently on affectionate terms.

The Weather.—Winter and Lord Mayor's day came together on Monday. A cutting east wind prevailed; and on Monday night there was a somewhat sharp frost. The trees in and around the metropolis are now almost wholly shorn of their leaves, which, till this visitation, were unusually green, at this advanced stage of the season. On Tuesday and Wednesday the weather was dry and beautiful, and the sun shone throughout both days.

Accident to a Police Inspector.—On Monday afternoon an accident of a fearful character happened to Mr. Champney, inspector of the S division of police, who was riding along Regent-street, when the animal suddenly took fright and paced off at an alarming rate; and, coming in direct collision with a hackney cab, the rider was thrown with great violence, several of his ribs were fractured and his leg broken. Mr. Champney was picked up in an insensible state, and removed at once to the Charing Cross Hospital, where the surgeons pronounced him to be in a dangerous state.

Fire at a Coach Factory.—On Sunday morning the premises of Messrs. Witham and Co., coach-makers, Little Queen-street, Lincoln's Inn, caught fire and considerable damage was done to them and to the adjoining houses. At Messrs. Witham and Co.'s, the whole of the three upper floors and stock were burned, and the contents in the ground floor were severely damaged.

The Dagenham Murder.—The three police constables, named Butfoy, Fearns, and Stevens, who have been under surveillance in consequence of the contradictory evidence they gave relative to the murder of the policeman Clark, at Dagenham, have been dismissed from the force. The Attorney and Solicitor Generals were of opinion that, as the policemen were not sworn at the time they gave false evidence, they could not be indicted for perjury.

A Man Killed by a Plough.—A few days ago, a man named Thomas Watts, farmer, of Cottenham, Cambridgeshire, met his death in an awful manner, being absolutely ploughed to death. His brother was guiding the plough, and he requested him to turn the horses round. In so doing he slipped down and was dragged along, the ploughshare passing over his head, which was smashed to pieces, the brains being completely crushed. He died, of course, instantaneously. An inquest was held on the body, and a verdict of "Accidental Death" returned. Watts was a man of some property, and had no wife or children.

Enlargement of the Royal Polytechnic Institution. On Tuesday a very numerously attended meeting of proprietors of the Royal Polytechnic Institution was held in the board-room, W. M. Nurse, Esq., presiding, to determine upon the expediency of permanently enlarging and otherwise improving this popular temple of science. After a good deal of discussion among the proprietary, as to the best mode of affording additional accommodation to the daily-increasing number of visitors, it was unanimously carried, that power be given to the Directors to enter upon arrangements for the construction of a commodious theatre attached to the institution, the cost of such building, including the uncovered seats, but exclusive of the fixtures, fittings, and paintings, to be defrayed by means of an annual rent from the institution.

EPITOME OF NEWS.—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

The manufacturers of Elberfeld, in Prussia, are at this time in a state of complete stagnation. In one manufactory alone 200 looms are standing still. More than 3000 workmen are to be seen in the streets of Elberfeld in the utmost distress

The inauguration of the statue of King Charles John of Sweden took place at Stockholm, on the 20th ult. The King and Royal Family were present at the ceremony. In the evening there was a concert and ball, and the city was illuminated.

A letter from Rome of the 28th ult., mentions a remarkable instance of the tolerant spirit of the Pope. It states that Fanny Elssler has been permitted to kiss the feet of his Holiness

Since the year of the comet, says a letter from Beaune (Burgundy) there has not been so fine a vintage as that of this season. The quality of the wine is so superior to that of 1845, that the produce of vineyards which last year was sold at 55f. the tun of 228 litres, has this year been bought by the merchants at 250f.

The Post Ampt Gazette of Frankfort states that a general union of the Italian customs is talked of at Turin.

The cheap omnibus system, which is a novelty in London, has long been common in Scotland. The charge of conveyance from Edinburgh to Leith was never more than twopence.

Five cargoes of Indian corn have arrived at Plymouth, consigned to the Royal William Victualling Yard, to be converted into meal for the use of the destitute in Ireland

The Queen of Greece has for some time been rather seriously indisposed. Her Majesty's state of health, according to the last letters which reached town from Athens, causes considerable anxiety to her Royal relatives.

The oldest farmer in France, named Brancheraud, has just died at St. Maurice-de-Girard (Vendée), aged 108.

A letter from Munich gives a very poor account of the health of Prince Metternich, who is, it would seem, incapacitated both in mind and body, and apparently breaking up.

According to the last advices from Monte Video, the negociations had been broken off at Buenos Ayres, but the Monte Videan Government was in no way answerable for that result.

A trial of the explosive cotton in blasting was made on Saturday, at Nanterre, near Paris, and with complete success, having caused explosion with greater facility and effect, and with less danger, than with gunpowder.

We learn from Copenhagen that, on the 1st instant, the King of Denmark laid the first stone of the viaduct which will complete the railroad from Copenhagen to Rothschild.

Considerable sensation has been created at Constantinople, by the receipt of a letter from Lord Palmerston, demanding the abolition of slavery in the Ottoman Empire.

The Brussels papers mention a serious fire in that city, which broke out in the extensive manufactories of M. Pelseener, timber-merchant, in the Place Saint Gery. The warehouse and workshops contained not only a great quantity of various kinds of wood ready prepared, but also a vast accumulation of furniture. The neighbouring houses were in part consumed, and others much damaged. The amount of the damage is not at present known; 300,000 francs is mentioned, but this is only a rough estimate. The greater part of the property was insured.

Among other instances of social improvement at Rome, may be noticed the establishment of an English newspaper called the Roman Advertiser, devoted to the affairs of Rome, as well as to science, literature, and art.

The Bavarian Government has just prohibited the sale of fulminating cotton. This article is placed in the same category as gunpowder, to sell which it is requisite to take out a special licence.

On Tuesday there was a reduction of one-halfpenny on the 4lb. loaf of bread throughout the metropolis.

So successful have been the experiments of cheap omnibus fares from Hungerford market to Paddington, that they are now in practice on the line of road from the Eastern Counties Railway to the Elephant and Castle, the fare being threepence. Some of the omnibuses from King's Cross to Kennington Gate also go for threepence.

The Swiss journals mention that the ancient and noble Abbey of Dissentis, in the Canton of the Grisons, was entirely consumed in the night of the 28th ult. Its magnificent church, its treasure, and its rich and splendid library, were completely destroyed. The friar, who discharged the functions of cook, perished in the flames. The Abbey of Dissentis, founded in the seventh century by Sigebert, a Scotch Benedictine, had been before burnt in 1790.

It is stated that the long procrastinated completion of the works on the Nelson Column in Trafalgar-square will very soon be finally brought to a close. Workmen have been actively employed on the work during the last few days.

The Moniteur Algerien of the 5th inst. announces a melancholy catastrophe. On the 3rd inst. the river Aurach, swollen by the rains of the preceding day and night, overflowed its banks and deluged the lower part of the plain of the Metidjah. Seven of the eleven houses which compose the village of the Maison Carrée were carried away by the torrent; 23 persons were drowned, and the loss of property is enormous. On the afternoon of the 4th the waters had subsided to their level.

The whole of the magistrates officiating at North Shields have sent in their resignations, in consequence, it is understood, of their refusal to grant a licence to the railway terminus at Tynemouth having been overruled at the general quarter sessions of the peace, held at Alnwick

The Constitutionnel states as an authentic piece of information, that Prince Louis Napoleon is about to lead Miss Burdett Coutts to the hymeneal altar.

An extra Gazette was issued on Wednesday night of unusual bulk. It contains 128 pages, chiefly filled with railway notices

The Bedford branch of the London and North-western Railway will be opened on Tuesday next.

At Brunswick, on the 30th ult., a grand banquet, at which there were 180 guests, was given in honour of the Abbé Ronge. In the evening, Ronge was present at the burgher assembly, where he delivered a discourse, in which he traced the development of German Catholicism in Silesia. He was loudly applauded

The mail from Corunna to Madrid was stopped on the 30th ult., by a band of brigands, and all the passengers were robbed. One person lost 10,000 reals (about £100)

The new Hamburg Gazette publishes the Address of the States of Schleswig-Holstein to the King of Denmark, in reply to the Letter Patent of his Majesty on the 8th July last. In this document, the propositions of the Letter Patent are controverted, its conclusions denied, and, by way of counter-propositions, it is maintained that the States of Schleswig and Holstein are inseparably united, that both form an independent State, hitherto united to Denmark, but in default of male heirs reverting to the House of Augustenburg, and of right forming part of the great Germanic Confedration.

Messrs. Evans, of Liverpool, say that rough Epsom salts, in a strong solution, are an absolute preventive to the progress of disease in potatoes, and this remedy saves them even when they have probably reached decay

The New York Constitutional Convention has adopted the following section, by a vote of 58 to 44:—"All property of the wife owned by her at the time of her marriage, and acquired by her afterwards by gift, devise, or descent, or otherwise than from her husband, shall be her separate property."

A new packet-ship of 1100 tons, to be named after the late Premier, is now being built in New York for the London line; another, of 1000 tons, the American Eagle, has already been launched. Of ninety packet-ships now trading between New York and Europe, fifty-two sail to and from Liverpool.

There are a number of forged £1 Bank of Ireland notes now in circulation, bearing the date, "11th May, 1845."

We learn from St. Petersburgh that the long-talked-of project of forming a railway from that capital to Baltishport, on the Baltic, is about to be carried into execution by a company formed at St. Petersburgh. The same company has also obtained an authorisation to lay down a railroad between Cronstadt and St. Petersburgh, with a branch to Moscow.

A letter from Washington dated Oct. 16, says:—"The remains of the late Hon. Henry S. Fox, late British Minister, were entombed in the Congressional Cemetery to-day. The funeral took place at eleven o'clock, the President, the Cabinet, the Corps Diplomatique, joining in the procession at the late residence of the deceased The obsequies passed off almost noiselessly and unobserved, and without the slightest symptoms of ostentatious parade."

Among the most recent importations from Ireland, were 30 blocks of marble, the production of the county Galway, from the port of which name they were brought to the British metropolis.

The Midland Railway Company have got the telegraph completed at the Kegworth station. On the day it was first used, by the fast train, which leaves Derby at three p.m., J. B. Storey, Esq., with his lady and servants, was set down at the station. Immediately after, Mrs. Storey discovered that she had left some small valuable articles in the carriage; she communicated the same to Mr. Sykes, the station master, who telegraphed the loss to Leicester; it was replied to instantly, and the articles forwarded to Kegworth per next train.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"H. A. S."—When the Black King is left alone against a White King and Rook, the player of the latter is bound to checkmate in fifty moves, or the game is drawn. The moves in all such cases must be reckoned from White's play. Black's moves are not counted.

Is a looker-on justified in pointing out this, or any similar violation of the Rules of the Game"? Certainly not. A player subjects himself to three distinct penalties for such breach of the Laws, and it is his adversary's business to detect and punish the error committed. The interference of lookers whenever they saw, or fancied they saw, a mistake of the kind had occurred, would lead to incalculable inconvenience.

(a) We should certainly now take White's game for choice. Black's best Bishop is masked, and out of play, and his other pieces anything but well disposed for action.

(b) This is an unaccountable error, as it brings the Q at once into irresistible combination with the two Rooks. Kt to Q 5th would have still preserved for White the advantage of position.

(c) A dashing termination, and, strange to say, quite unforeseen by Mr. Horwitz, upon whom it came like a thunder clap.

(a) The present situation of White's forces is anything but recommendatory of Mr. Horwitz's new fangled defence.

(b) This, indeed, is passing strange! What possible good can be obtained by giving up this pawn?

(c) Threatening to mate or win the Kt. Can the young player see how both to avoid the Mate and yet preserve his piece?

(d) This is the move which utterly defeats White's projects. He can now neither Checkmate nor win the Kt, and is compelled to play his Queen to an unfavourable and out-of-the-way sq.

(e) Tempting his opponent to take the Rook's Pawn, which would cost the Bishop.

(f) If this Pawn is taken, White gains two pawns in return.

NATIONAL SPORTS

THE Olympic Parliament closed its session for 1846 with some judicious legislation. At a meeting of the Jockey Club, held at Newmarket, on the Friday in the Houghton week, it was resolved that, in future, the Criterion Stakes should be run for on the Monday in the Houghton meeting, and the Cambridgeshire on the following day; and it was also agreed that an application should be made to the Master of the Horse, for permission to run the Autumn Queen's Plate, at Newmarket, in 1847, on the last Thursday in September, instead of the first Thursday in October, on account of the late period at which the October meetings would otherwise fall. This request having been complied with, the race weeks at Newmarket will fall next year as follows: The Craven, on Monday, April the 5th; the First Spring, on Monday, April the 19th; the Second Spring, on Tuesday, May the 4th; the July, on Tuesday, July the 6th; the First October, on Tuesday, September the 28th; the Second October, on Monday, October 11th; and the Houghton, on Monday, October the 25th As the time on which the various provincial races fall is regulated by the date of the Craven Meeting at Newmarket, this item of knowledge will be of use. Moreover, as we are on the business of the turf, it may be as well to call attention to the important stakes, the entries for which close on the first day of the New Year. We have not space to spare for the catalogue, but those concerned in racing will profit by the hint, and, for particulars, refer to the Racing Calendar.

But we may not pass unnoticed the unprecedented position of the most essentially national of all our national sports—the most popular in every sense of the term. The nominations for all the leading stakes, are, both in character and account, vastly superior to any in the annals of horse-racing. That fine pastime has the support and countenance of a social class, by which it will soon be purged of all offence. The scum of their kind will not much longer be allowed footing on the race-course, driven, as they already are, from the penultimate resource of the leg, loaded dice, the descendants in a direct line of the loaded pistol of Finchley and Hounslow. We would not divest the turf of its manly characteristics; we don't desire it to be a mere holiday pageant or fête champêtre; but we can see no reason why it should be a conventional tryst, for honest men and knaves neutral ground wherever vice and virtue may promenade arm in arm. The necessity for a reform in this particular becomes every day more urgent. People do not alone refrain from asking rogues to their tables in the fear of being robbed of their silver spoons, but also being filched of their good names. The disreputable who still haunt our race meetings not only levant with honourable members' money (when that course appears the most profitable), but they leave behind impressions which "make them poor indeed." When the Secretary of State for the Home Department prohibited gaming at those places—for they pleaded privilege of play long after dicing was declared illegal by the law of the land a great outcry was raised . but what has come of it? That the taste for excitement by which the gaming-table keeper "lived and moved (from course to course) and had his being," took a turn destined to give a new and wholesome zest to the sport of racing. On the suppression of those tents of the enemy, there arose a practice—at first very limited—of opening lotteries on the great events, the tickets averaging very small prices. That small beginning led to the present system of "sweeps," established already very generally in connection with every race of importance in the kingdom by which large funds are supplied for a legitimate purpose—that of enabling the owners of steeds to hedge to their stakes. When gentlemen shall minister to themselves, by scouting from among them, when at their recreations, a body of vagabonds, from any one of whom they would fly elsewhere, as they would from a patient in the blue cholera, then will the true golden age of British Racing date. Give it character, and you endow it with a perpetual annuity of popularity of the right sort: with friends who will secure its independence. The well-wishers of the Turf will not take it amiss that our last notice of it for the season closes with a moral.

TATTERSALL'S

MONDAY. A very brisk afternoon; the round betters, of whom we found a good muster in the room, showing every disposition to transact business, and meeting with plenty of encouragement. The investments, therefore, although not comparable with the magnitudinous transactions reported in the course of the racing season, were generally on a liberal scale; and, in the instances of Epirote and Allertonian, the Marpessa colt and Lunedale, were really spirited. Planet was the only "falling star."

LORD MAYOR'S SHOW IN THE OLDEN TIME.

THERE is nothing more conducive to the success of a public holiday than fair, bright weather; such as the Londoners enjoyed on Monday last, the day of their great City Carnival, Lord Mayor's Show. The number of spectators, as the report states, was "unusually great;" yet was there a sorry falling-off from the Lord Mayors' Pageants of the Olden Time. Some twenty years since, Hone justly observed, "all that remains of Lord Mayor's Show, to remind the curiously informed of its ancient character, is the first part of the procession. These are the poor men of the Company to which the Lord Mayor belongs, habited in long gowns and close caps of the Company's colour, bearing shields on their arms, but without javelins. So many of these lead the Show as there are years in the Lord Mayor's age." On Monday last, this fine old feature had disappeared; though the Lord Mayor's Company (the Spectacle-makers) walked in the procession, flanking the group of banners, some of which are, unquestionably, very splendid.

The fact is, the character of the Show is altogether changed from that of the Pageant of old, which was picturesque and grotesque, and theatrically effective; whereas, the modern procession is but a mere official marshalling, relieved by "men in armour," a military escort, bands of music, trumpeters, &c. Both are "the very age and body of the time:" one is characteristic of a period when the "property-man" must have been in his glory, and when the love of show indulged in mythological emblems of the Virtues and the Arts, indicative of the City trades or Companies; for, "every citizen, according to their severall trades, made their severall show," according to the quaint fancies of the time. Much of this taste is thought to have originated in the Low Countries, at that time the grand emporium of the world. The importance of such associations in regulating their trades, has almost ceased; but, their funds continue to be appropriated to charity which "passeth show." Hence, although the Civic procession of our own time is shorn of its splendour, it retains the essentials of good government, the primary object of our municipal institutions; thus, we have parted with the shadow, but kept the substance; and, discarding the follies of an uneducated age, we sensibly preserve but little more of the semblance or the externals of authority than conduces to maintain it in public respect.

Year by year, we have illustrated in this Journal the Lord Mayor's Show of our time; but, this year, by way of contrast, we look back for a century and a half, just to picture to our readers the fashion in which the citizens of Old London kept their great holiday. Past and Present, in all cases, furnish ample food for reflection; and we have indulged in a few speculations as to the cause of the change, which we now illustrate. Be this as it may, the scene we have engraved presents a very curious retrospect of the picturesque of a distant age, suggestive of many useful inferences as to the popular taste of the day—dramatic, to say the least of it—though hardly comporting itself with the rigid utilitarianism of a contemporary class of thinkers.

We are indebted for our Illustration of the Olden Pageant to Mr. F. W. Fairholt, F.S A., the author and editor of a very interesting "History of Lord Mayor's Pageants," with specimens of the Descriptive Pamphlets, printed for the Percy Society. This elaborate work is prefaced by a few pages, in which our old City Pageants are shown to be analogous with the public ceremonial observances of our Continental neighbours, particularly in France and Flanders.

The earliest of the Ridings, as the Royal and Civic Processions were anciently termed, is recorded to have taken place in 1236; but it was upon the return of Edward I. from his victory over the Scots, in 1298, that the earliest exhibition of shows or pageants connected with the City Trades or Companies took place, which afterwards became so important a feature in Lord Mayor's Shows.

The Wardens' accounts, preserved by the Grocers' Company, for 1435 and 1436, give us an item for the hire of barges for the Sheriffs "going be water to Westmynster," proving the fact that water processions were in use by the Companies at least nineteen years before their first supposed introduction by Sir John Norman, in 1453. Still, as Lord Mayor, he had the merit of fixing the fashion of the annual water procession that has continued, with few intermissions, to our day.

It would be easy to gossip through a column or two upon the several pageants from the date last mentioned, up to that of our Illustration, the details of which have been copied from representations of Pageants of the seventeenth century.

But we have not space for such matters, however pleasant; and we pass at once to the details of the Engraving. First in the Procession are Wild Men, dressed with masks and skins, clearing the way with fireworks and clubs: "they were whimsically attired, and disguised with droll masks, having large staves or clubs, headed with cases of crackers;" (? squibs.) and they came "castyng fyer and making hidious noyses." "They were usually employed to clear the way in land processions, and were constant attendants at the Lord Mayors' Show, in this capacity In the Mayoralty Procession of 1681, a body of twenty preceded the principal device" (Fairholt.)

Next come the "Wifelers," who, according to Archdeacon Nares, were young freemen who marched on Lord Mayor's Day, at the head of their proper Companies. Douce says, in his "Illustrations of Shakspeare," that "the name is derived from 'whiffle,' a fife or small flute, the performers on which usually preceded armies or processions; and hence the name was ultimately applied to any person who went before a procession." In a print of a Lord Mayor's Show, 1635, appears a Whiffler, in the costume of the period, wearing a chain, and holding a staff in his left hand, the wand of office, with which to clear the way.

The First Pageant—Apollo and the Muses—is now reached: this was a great favourite: it was exhibited as early as 1620, and accompanied the Lord Mayor with "variety of musique."

Next come men bearing partizans, then Whifflers, and

The Second Pageant the Chariot of Justice, which was usually adopted on all occasions as emblematic of the Mayor's virtues; it is frequently mentioned by the City Laureates; and this specimen is copied from an engraving of the one actually exhibited in 1698: the car is drawn by unicorns, ridden by two Indians, bearing banners, as do also the attendants of Justice; her car being surmounted by two figures, bearing trumpets and palm branches.

Behind the Car are Henchboys, carrying nosegays on staves, with richly laced handkerchiefs tied beneath the flowers.

These are followed by the City Waits; and Old Men of the Mayor's Company, dressed in their livery gowns, and carrying halberds and spears, preceding and surrounding

Gog and Magog, who were conveyed in a car, in 1672, as thus described in Jordan's Pageant for that year:—"I must not omit to tell you, that marching in the van of these five pageants, are two exceeding rarities to be taken notice of; that is, there are two extreme great Giants, each of them at least 15 foot high, that do sit and are drawn by horses in two several chariots, moving, talking, and taking tobacco, as they ride along, to the great admiration and delight of all the spectators: at the conclusion of the Show, they are to be set up in Guildhall, where they may be daily seen all the year, and I hope never to be demolished by such dismal violence as happened to their predecessors; which are raised at the peculiar and proper cost of the city." Mr. Fairholt notes "this exceedingly curious paragraph escaped the notice of Hone, who was upwards of sixteen years endeavouring to gain information about the Guildhall Giants, and in which he was assisted by various City antiquaries, who could find no trace of them in the City archives. Had he seen this paragraph, it would have saved him much argument and conjecture." (See his "Ancient Mysteries," &c)

St. George and the Dragon follow the Giants: the Dragon was always one of the favourite monsters of the Show, and the tutelar St. George was, as might be expected, equally popular.

Old Cheapside forms the background of the picture, with the Great Cross in the centre; and here we have a fixed Pageant, and the figure of Fame beneath a canopy, addressing the Mayor in the usual strain; his Lordship on horseback, stopping to listen to the speech, attended by his Sword and Mace Bearers, &c.; the Procession having just passed through an Arch of Triumph.

We should here state that for the several Shows, from a certain date, Pageants, well spiced with florid flattery, were composed by the City Poets, who usually kept the properties for the Show, its pasteboard deities and monsters.

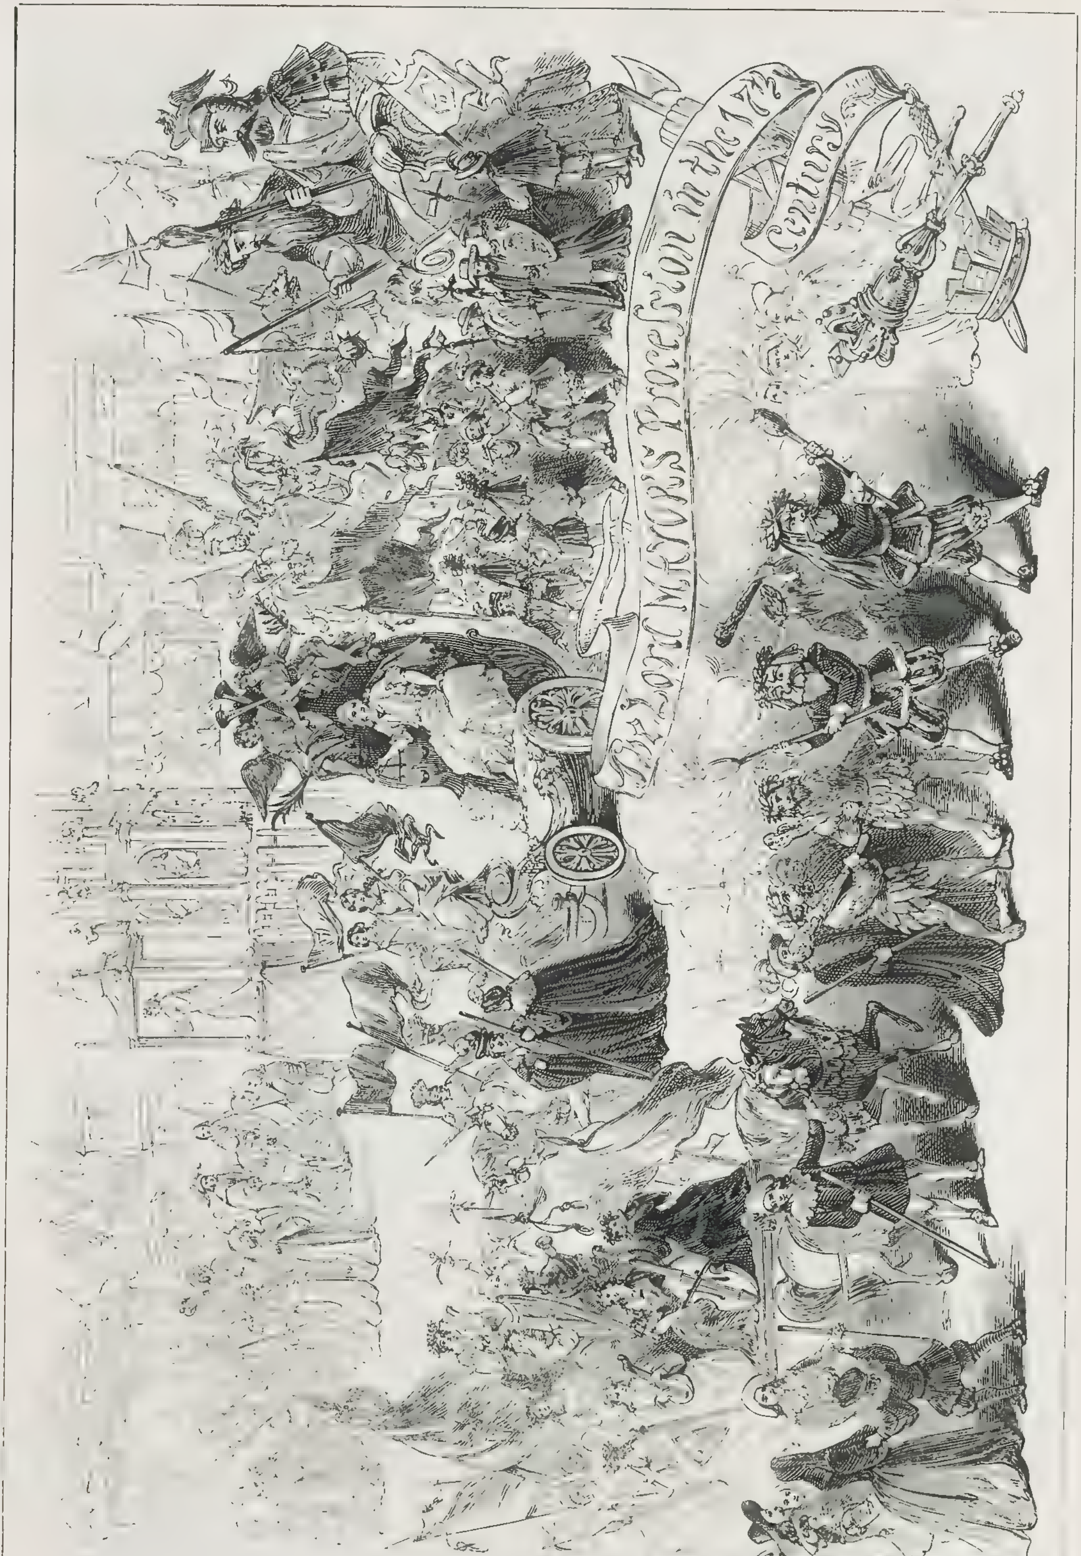
At length these Pageants fell into disrepute, the last attempt at reviving their ancient glories being made in 1702, when Queen Anne dined at Guildhall, it being the first Lord Mayor's Day in her reign. Elkanah Settle exerted himself to produce a more original performance than usual for the occasion, feeling that "the splendour which formerly shined [illegible] this solemn City Festival now almost dropt into oblivion, had taken its second resurrection among them." This was, however, the last of a long line of these annual shows composed by a City Poet, and publicly performed: poor Settle, we find, "underneath his glorious Pageants starved," though he has been immortalised by Pope, in the "Dunciad."

The Show proved a failure, and Mr. Fairholt tells us that—

"This last attempt at resuscitating the glories of the ancient Mayors being so unfortunately frustrated, and the taste for such displays not [illegible], that for economy, no effort was made at a revival of the annual pageantry, and the display seems to have sunk to the level at which it has remained for more than a century; the Barges by water, and the Land Procession, with a few Men in Armour, or a single impersonation or two, being all that was [illegible]." The carved and gilt Coach was introduced after 1711, when Sir Gilbert Heathcot was the last Lord Mayor who rode on horseback at his Show.

In 1761, however, when King George III. and his Queen honoured the City with their company, on Lord Mayor's Day, soon after their Coronation, a revival of the ancient Pageants was recommended, and partly carried out. "The Armourers and Braziers, the Skinners and the Fishmongers, particularly distinguished themselves on this occasion. The former were marked by an archer riding erect in his car, with bow, quiver, &c; besides a man in complete armour; and the Skinners had seven of their Company dressed in fur, their skins painted like Indian Princes. And the Fishmongers had a statue of St. Peter, finely [illegible] a dolphin, two mermaids, and two sea-horses."

The Giants, Gog and Magog, we should add, have since been [illegible]. Mr Fairholt states, at the Show of Alderman Lucas, in 1837. They were constructed of wicker-work; each walked along by a man inside, who occasionally turned their heads; and as the figures were fourteen feet high, their features were on a level with the first-floor windows. They were extremely well contrived, and much admired; but, if we mistake not, the Giants were revived upon a Mayoralty some years previous to 1837



The Lord Mayor's Procession in the 17th Century

LORD MAYOR'S DAY.

Last Monday—Lord Mayor's Day—having been excessively fine, the number of spectators of the "Lord Mayor's Show" was unusually great. At about a quarter-past twelve o'clock, the new Lord Mayor, Sir G. Carroll, received notice that the order of Procession was about to commence, and the company accordingly left the breakfast-room, and entered their carriages.

The Procession was speedily formed and moved from Guildhall at eleven o'clock, passing through Gresham-street, Princes-street, King William-street, and Adelaide-place, to London-bridge; thence, by water, to Westminster.

The following was the order of the Procession.

In his state carriage, drawn by six horses,
Attended by the Chaplain, Sword Bearer, Common Crier, and the Water Bailiff.
Guard of honour on horseback.

On the arrival of the Lord Mayor and the Civic authorities at the Court of Exchequer, Mr. Baron Parke was on the bench in the absence of the Chief Baron, owing to the death of his daughter-in-law. The Recorder having presented Sir George Carroll, in appropriate terms, eulogised the conduct of the late Lord Mayor.

Mr. Baron Parke then addressed the Lord Mayor in these words:—My Lord Mayor, In the absence of the Lord Chief Baron, under circumstances of a melancholy and painful nature, I am called on to be the organ of communication between this Court and your Lordship, and the great Corporation of which honourable mention has been made. The splendid ceremonial of to-day is not a mere idle pageant; it has been adopted in pursuance of a very ancient custom—a custom as ancient as those from which the Corporation you represent has derived many of its rights and privileges. And it has been performed, not simply for the purpose of displaying the magnificence and wealth of that Corporation, but to add honour to the administration of the law, and respect for the franchises of the City. My Lord, I feel assured that the respect which we feel for that Corporation will suffer no diminution from the circumstance of your Lordship's elevation to the high office which you now hold. The splendid eulogium which has just been passed upon you by the learned Recorder has convinced us of your amiable character and of your capacity to discharge the arduous duties which were imposed upon you by your election to the office of Sheriff. In your discharge of that office you have displayed those qualities which always find their proper estimate in the mind of the intelligent public; and I believe you to be possessed of all those qualities which are essential to the administration of justice. We have now the happiness to live in times of peace. The great bulk of her Majesty's subjects have now no recollection of the horrors of war; and it is likely, therefore, that the exercise of those qualities which you have already displayed will prove sufficient to carry you through your year of office with ease and satisfaction. But if the contrary should happen, and you should be called on to discharge more onerous and more responsible duties, I have no doubt you will display all the courage and determination which the exigencies of the times may require, and which you have already manifested so greatly to your honour. His Lordship then briefly addressed Mr. Alderman Johnson, and congratulated him on having passed through his year of office, and fulfilled its duties so entirely to the satisfaction of his fellow-citizens.

The usual oaths were then administered to the Lord Mayor, and some formalities were gone through, including the calling on the late Lord Mayor to produce his accounts for the past year, which was done, and Mr. Alderman Johnson was sworn to their correctness. Before leaving the Court, his Lordship invited the learned Barons to the Civic banquet at Guildhall, which invitation was cordially accepted by their Lordships, as well as by the Judges of the other Courts, on whom his Lordship waited for the purpose.

The Procession having re-formed, returned to the State barges at Westminster Bridge, where they embarked a little before three o'clock. Having reached Blackfriars Bridge the dignitaries debarked. The Procession was once more put in order, and moved on through New Bridge-street. At the obelisk the ceremonial was rendered the more imposing by such of the Foreign Ambassadors, Ministers of State, the Nobility, Judges, Members of Parliament, and other persons of distinction, who had accepted invitations to the banquet. The Procession then wended its way up Ludgate-hill, around St. Paul's Churchyard, and along Cheapside and King-street to Guildhall. The Lord Mayor was well received throughout the whole of the route.

THE BANQUET AT GUILDHALL.

The guests of the Chief Magistrate and the Sheriffs began to arrive at Guildhall at three o'clock, and the principal guests reached the hall before five o'clock. The tables were covered in a very magnificent style; and Deputy Evans, of the ward of which Sir George Carroll is the Alderman, and the rest of the Committee, made the greatest exertions to prove to the company that the present Mayoralty would be worthy of the presiding authority in all the essentials of hospitality.

Among the company were the Lord Chancellor, Lord John Russell, the Marquis of Lansdowne, the Marquis of Clanricarde, the Earl of Auckland, Lord Palmerston, Lord Campbell, Lord Morpeth, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir G. Grey, Sir J. C. Hobhouse, Mr. Macaulay, Baron Parke, Justice Coltman, Justice Erle, Justice Wightman, Baron Platt, Baron Williams, the Attorney and Solicitor-Generals, Sergeants Channel, Gazelee, Clark, Wilkins, and Rain, Lords Anson and Strangford, Lord Dudley Stuart, the Honourable Mr. E. J. Stanley, Baron Rothschild, Sir Stratford Canning, Admiral Sir Charles Adam, Sir Moses Montefiore, Lord John Hay, R N., Lord Ebrington, Sir J. M'Taggart, Sir W. B. Riddell, Mr. Hume, Mr John Masterman, Mr. Pattison, Sir F. Thesiger, Mr. B. Hawes, Mr. C. Craig, Mr. H. Kemble, Mr. Wansell, Mr. J. Parke, Mr. G. Palmer, Aldermen Johnson (the late Lord Mayor), Sir S. C. Hunter, Farebrother, Lucas, Kelly, Wilson, Copeland, Hooper, Farncombe, Musgrove, W. Hunter, T. Wood, Sir James Duke, Sidney, Moon; the Recorder, the Under-Sheriff, the Town Clerk, the City Solicitor, the Remembrancer, the Comptroller, the Secondaries, the City Commissioner, and several others of the City officials.

After the performance of "Non Nobis Domine,"

The Lord Mayor proposed the usual loyal toasts, which were received with cheering.

His Lordship then rose and said he was about to propose a toast to his distinguished guests, which had reference to an eminent personage to whom in distant days the destinies of this great empire would, in all probability, be committed

LORD MAYOR'S SHOW.—THE LANDING AT WESTMINSTER.

As he (the Lord Mayor) was anxious for the welfare of the Prince of Wales, he would take the liberty to make a separate allusion to his Royal Highness. His Royal Highness was born on Lord Mayor's day, and might be said to have a peculiar claim upon the attention and affection of the citizens of London. (Cheers.) He doubted not that the illustrious young Prince, under the tuition of the Queen and her gracious Consort, would be educated in the principles of the British Constitution, and that his Royal Highness would eventually be well prepared to administer, whenever it might please Providence so to order it, the rule and government of this great nation. Feeling strongly upon an occasion of such interest to the future prosperity of the nation, he would propose "The health of the Prince of Wales and the other branches of the Royal Family." (Cheers.)

Admiral Sir C. C. Adam and Major Pate returned thanks for the Navy, which immediately followed the health of the Prince of Wales, &c.

The next toast was, "Prosperity to the City of London, and the trade and commerce thereof." (Loud cheers.)

The Lord Mayor said he was convinced that the next toast he had to propose would be received with enthusiasm. It was "The health of the late Lord Mayor." (Cheers.)

Alderman Johnson returned thanks in a very effective manner. He felt the greatest satisfaction at the honour done him by the Lord Mayor, and said he could not but feel gratification in believing that he had fulfilled what he had promised upon his election, namely, to hand down to his successor unimpaired the rights and privileges of his fellow citizens. (Loud cheers.)

The Lord Mayor next proposed "The Lord High Chancellor of England."

The Lord Chancellor returned thanks.

The Lord Mayor next proposed the "Health of the Foreign Ambassadors."

The Turkish Ambassador returned thanks.

The Lord Mayor said he had no doubt of the warm manner in which the next toast would be received. He knew well that the Corporation of London had always felt pride in evincing their loyalty and devotion to the Sovereign by supporting the Ministers in whom the Sovereign placed confidence. (Cheers.) The position of the Administration, in whatever way it was constituted, was a position of great responsibility and anxiety. At the present moment those responsibilities and anxieties were increased by a dispensation of Providence. Confident that their most vigorous endeavours would be directed to assuage the calamity which he was happy to believe was not so great as it had been represented to be, he felt happy in proposing "Her Majesty's Ministers." (Cheers.) They were a body of men who were prepared, he had no doubt, to meet the evil, and, with the co-operation and confidence of their fellow-countrymen, successfully to contend against it. (Cheers.) It would be too heavy a task for him to describe the character of the present Premier of England. It would be unnecessary, too, for all knew, from long experience, that the measures of that eminent statesman were all directed to the public good. He would allude to another circumstance. For the first time, the City of London was represented by the Minister. (Cheers.) He was sure that the toast of "Her Majesty's Ministers" would meet with the warmest reception. (Continued cheering.)

Lord John Russell rose, and was most enthusiastically applauded. He begged leave, in the names of his colleagues, and in his own name, to return thanks to the company for the high honour done to them. He could assure the company that the Administration would use their utmost endeavours to promote the interests, to guard the honour, and to maintain the liberties of the empire, and he trusted that, with the support and approbation of the citizens of London, they would be enabled to contribute to those great ends. He had, however, another responsibility cast upon him—one of a personal nature. He must always remember that the last time he had had the honour to appear in the Guildhall it was to be re-elected as one of the representatives in Parliament of the City of London. (Cheering.) But he felt that the duties of a Minister of the Crown, and those of a representative were not of a clashing or contradictory nature; on the contrary, they were compatible and perfectly harmonious. (Cheers.) He wished to state that fact, because he believed that the citizens of London felt deeply for all the great interests of the general community. He believed that the hearts of the citizens vibrated with every fear of dangerous or evil circumstances while they rejoiced in all the good fortunes with which the nation might be blessed. The citizens of London became possessed, as it were by an electric telegraph, of all that passed in every part of the empire; and, whatever intelligence might be subject matter of joy, in that they rejoiced, while in matters of lamentation they hastened to contribute to the utmost the means for its alleviation. (Cheers.) He felt that his duties as a Minister of the Crown, and as a representative of the citizens of London might therefore be well mingled and joined together. (Cheers.) He offered his congratulations to the Lord Mayor for the choice which his fellow-citizens had made. He had long known and esteemed the character of the Lord Mayor, and he was confident that his Lordship would honourably support the dignity which had been conferred upon him; but he must tell the Lord Mayor that he would have no light task to perform, if he meant to imitate the conduct and emulate the example of his most excellent predecessor in the chief magistracy of the City of London. (Loud cheers.)

The toast was drunk with loud acclamations.

The Lord Mayor, in returning thanks, said he should endeavour in every way to imitate the example of his predecessor. His Lordship then proposed "The Marquis of Lansdowne and the House of Lords."

The Marquis of Lansdowne returned thanks. He assured the assembly that, if ever there was a question upon which the House of Lords were unanimous, it was in the determination to maintain the rights, privileges, and immunities of the City of London.

After the health of the Lady Mayoress was drunk, the ladies retired from the Hall, and commenced dancing with great spirit in the Council Chamber.

Mr. Masterman responded to the toast of the House of Commons; and several other toasts were proposed and received with cheers; and the conviviality lasted till morning.

We annex a Portrait of the Lord Mayor, Sir George Carroll, whose official career was duly recorded in our Journal of last week. (See page 295.) We may briefly recapitulate that Sir George was, for more than thirty years, a member of the Stock Exchange, and a Contractor for State Lotteries. Sir George subsequently retired into Essex, and is in the Commission of the Peace for that County; and he has, at this day, an estate at Loughton. In 1837, Sir George was chosen Sheriff of London and Middlesex, and was Knighted, on her Majesty's visit to the Corporation of London. And, in 1839 Sir George Carroll was unanimously elected Alderman of the Ward of Candlewick. Sir George is understood to be wealthy, and the éclat with which he has entered upon his year of office gives assurance that it will be a Mayoralty of brilliant hospitality. His Lordship is a man of strong common-sense views, and kindly nature: indeed, one of his decisions at the Mansion House, at his first sitting, on Tuesday morning, well bespeaks his humane character.

The second Illustration upon the preceding page shows the Landing of the Civic Procession at Westminster, on Monday: the late Lord Mayor is ascending the stairs, and the present Lord Mayor has just stepped from the barge, preceded by the Chaplain, and Sword and Mace-Bearers.

IRELAND.

New Irish Poor-Law Commissioner.—Morgan John O'Connell, Esq., M.P., Kerry, has been appointed Chief Commissioner of the Poor-Law Board in Ireland, at £[illegible]000 a-year salary. On Mr. O'Connell's being installed, Mr. Twisleton returns to England.

The Irish Registry of Deeds Office.—Some promotions in this office have been caused by the retirement of the late Registrar-General, Mr. George Ogle Moore, who, being upwards of seventy years old, was naturally anxious to retire. In consequence of that gentleman's resignation, every person in the office has got a step. The First Assistant-Registrar, Mr. Morgan O'Connell, has become Registrar-General; Mr. Glascock, the second Assistant, succeeds him; and Mr. Chapman and other officers were advanced in the same manner. The salary of Mr. George Ogle Moore was £1500 a-year; and that of Mr. Morgan O'Connell is only £1200, and he is beside required to do the duty in person.

The Repeal Association.—The proceedings at the Repeal Association on Monday were unimportant. Mr. O'Connell made a speech, which was chiefly devoted to the disputes between "Old Ireland" and "Young Ireland." The "rent" only amounted to £88. It is now stated positively that the O'Connell tribute of 1846 is abandoned, and that the formal announcement of the fact will appear forthwith.

Fall in the Price of Grain.—We are gratified to find that, according to the latest returns from some of the leading grain markets, the panic is fast subsiding—that prices of all kinds of grain are giving way—and that, in the course of a few weeks hence, it is now probable, events will show the senselessness of the clamour raised against the Government for their refusal to abrogate the remnant of the Corn-Laws, or to interfere with the regular course of commerce by the establishment of food depôts throughout the country.

Deaths from Starvation.—On Thursday (last week), James Carroll, Esq., Coroner, held an inquest in Nenagh, on the body of Margaret Corcoran, a young woman aged twenty years, whose death, it appears, was caused from want of sufficiency of food to sustain nature. An inquest was held, and the jury found, "that the deceased Margaret Corcoran came by her death in consequence of a general state of debility, brought on for the want of food." An Irish paper states that three persons died from want of food at Miltown Malbay within the last week.—Two additional deaths from starvation are reported from the county Cork.

Fatal Accident to the Wife of Dean French.—A melancholy and fatal accident occurred on Wednesday evening (last week), at the Deanery House, Elphin. Mrs. French, the lady of the Dean, being unwell, two bottles were prescribed by her medical attendant—one an embrocation, the other a simple draught. The servant, mistaking the embrocation for the draught, administered the former, which contained ingredients of a poisonous nature, and the consequence was immediate death.

Horrible Occurrence.—The Limerick Chronicle gives the following particulars of a very shocking occurrence: "Ennistymon workhouse was visited with a calamitous [illegible] this week. The deputy-master, Michael Walsh, [illegible] two children, a boy and a girl, for having quarrelled [illegible], and [illegible] from the other a crust of bread. He placed them in [illegible] for punishment, and appears to have totally forgotten them for [illegible], when their absence was remarked by the other paupers, and, on opening [illegible] of confinement, both children were found dead in each other's [illegible]. The master was brought into Ennis in custody."

Dreadful Murder.—The Boyle Gazette has the following details:—"A countryman named Bourke was brutally murdered, on Monday night, after returning from the fair of Ballaghaderreen. The ill-fated man, having sold a cow at the fair, and received the price, was treacherously followed to his own house, in the neighbourhood of Clogher, where they deprived him of life, almost severing his head from his body by means of a hatchet. The murderers bound his wife in the garden while perpetrating this horrid deed."

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON ALMANACK.—SECOND EDITION OF 40,000.

This Day, price 1s., gilt edges,

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON ALMANACK, AND PICTURESQUE CALENDAR FOR 1847

This ALMANACK is submitted to the Public by the Proprietors, with confidence of its superiority over its predecessors. The Work was commenced in 1845, with a view of furnishing a Repository of Useful Knowledge of permanent value, for constant reference, in Astronomy, Astronomical Occurrences, and the Natural History of the Year.

The ASTRONOMICAL DEPARTMENT has been placed entirely under the superintendence of JAMES GLAISHER, Esq., F.R.A.S., and of the Royal Observatory at Greenwich.

On the third page of each month is a series of tableaux of Memorable Events, carrying out in a true spirit what is usually and properly introduced into our Almanack; not for occasional reference only, but to cherish respect for these landmarks of British History.

The fourth page of each month is devoted to Natural History. The whole of this portion is from the very able pen of Mrs. LOUDON, and the interesting series of Illustrations to this department has been drawn and engraved by Miss LOUDON, under the immediate superintendence of Mrs. LOUDON.

The Calendar Illustrations are from the masterly pencil of WILLIAM HARVEY, and engraved in the first style of Art, by LINTON; illustrative of the National Sports.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1846.

For many hours on Monday last the streets of the City presented a strange spectacle: the Lord Mayor's Pageant was not the most remarkable feature of the day, but the universal blockade, of which it was the cause. All the capitals of Europe might be challenged to furnish such an instance of "suspended animation." Under the most favourable circumstances it is difficult enough to get through the City, but a total stoppage, for a time, produces confusion worse confounded. While the Civic Procession was dragging its slow length through lane and bye street, all the traffic of London went on accumulating behind the barriers in most portentous abundance. Unhappy was the raw provincial who on that day had confided himself, perhaps for a saving of time, to a public conveyance; a spell from Gog and Magog was cast over all that moved by horse-flesh and wheels, and they became fixtures; or, with the enterprising spirit of circumnavigators, reached the Bank by describing immense traverses. Waggon wedged itself behind cart, and cab behind dray, till pavements were invisible, the several conductors beguiling the time as best they might with lively remarks upon each other and the occasion: cheerfulness under difficulties is a virtue, but we were sorry to observe it often tinged with a degree of bitterness and exasperation: with a dinner in perspective the inconvenience might have been borne more philosophically. But it was not till the accumulation was set at liberty that the full magnitude of the sacrifice London makes every year to its Lord could be appreciated; then

> The pent-up stream of life
> Rush'd downward like a cataract.

The mass that was simply obstructive when at rest became destructive when in motion; wheel locked in wheel, and such a splintering of shafts never happened, save at a tournament or the return from the Derby, the only scene that approaches in difficulty of progression the streets of London on the 9th of November. But what may be a very trifling matter on a party of pleasure, where a mishap can often be turned into amusement by an easy alchymy, is a very different thing in business, where it inflicts loss and inconvenience; and we fancy many an execration was poured last Monday upon the procession, which, during its progress, put a stop to that of everybody besides.

The Brevet we this day publish is somewhat of a novelty in these times, when promotion is individual, and not collective. It will give pleasure to both services; but it is not in the nature of such things to satisfy everybody; we observe already that it is criticised, the principal complaint being that an advantage has been given in the arrangement to the Guards over the troops of the Line; it is said that the average term of service of the same number of officers of the same rank, is twice the number of years in the Line that it is in the Guards. The consequence is, that one class reach the higher grades of the profession while in the vigour of life; the other at an age when opportunity of distinction and the vigour required for active service are more problematical. These differences between men of the same rank and the same profession are always to be regretted; the British Army should be one body, without these distinctions; at present, the Guards and some other regiments hold themselves as superior to the officers of the Line as the last hold themselves above "Indian," or "Company's" officers. The dissensions that have been created by this imaginary distinction (since both equally serve their country), have been very mischievous; the last Mail from India bore evidence of it; in General Nott's journals and letters, the feeling appears again and again, even with distressing repetition; if his statements are correct, this "precedence" seems to have led to actual wrong and injustice. It is a pity so gracious a boon as the present Brevet should have anything detracted from it by expressions of discontent. Promotion should be shared among brethren in arms, like the perils of the profession, equally among all. The Guards are ready for any duty they may be called on to discharge; but reward should not be given for what might, could, would, or should be done, if occasion required; it is for what has been done already. In actual service, the Guards must concede that the hardest work has fallen on the Line. If it is necessary to give high rank to younger men (and, we believe, talents being equal, a young General will prove the better one), it should be done on that distinct ground, not in a manner that creates professional divisions and jealousies.

The spirit of contradiction certainly mingles largely with human affairs. When all the world was protesting against the placing the Wellington Statue on Mr. Burton's Arch, and determining, by anticipation, that it would be a monster of disproportion, it was set up. As soon as the public breathe more freely, as if relieved from an apprehension, begin to find that the thing is not so very bad after all, and even to look at it with a sort of approval, lo! the Statue, it is said, will be taken down again! Another momentous question then arises—where shall it be placed at last? Is it always to be in a state of transit and trial; to be set up as horses are lent on liking? We have an Experimental Squadron; and, perhaps, considering our defects in matters of taste, an Experimental Statue may serve to disseminate sound principles of Art. Considering, however, that the public has gone through the three stages of feeling by which men become reconciled to worse things—that it has "first endured, then pitied, then embraced"—it might be left where it is, by a compromise. Suppose the Woods and Forests take down the Trafalgar Fountains, and spend the money the removal of the Statue would cost in erecting new ones that, in point of design, will soar a little higher than a pair of ugly dumb waiters?

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

THE BIRTH-DAY OF THE PRINCE OF WALES.

Monday being the anniversary of the birth-day of the Prince of Wales, great rejoicings took place at Windsor. As early as eight o'clock in the morning the 1st Life Guards, commanded by the Hon. Colonel Cavendish, and the Scots Fusiliers, under the command of Colonel Colville, arrived in Windsor Park, and formed into line beneath the South Terrace, opposite to the Augusta Tower, the cavalry regiment forming the right wing. Immediately upon the arrival of the troops her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, accompanied by their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales, Prince Alfred, the Princess Royal, and Princess Alice, left the Castle by the Queen's entrance, and walked across the Quadrangle to the Home Park, through the York and Lancaster gateway; close to which the Royal party stationed themselves to witness the evolutions of the troops. The two bands performed the National Anthem upon the arrival of her Majesty. The Queen was also accompanied by Prince William of Loewenstein and the Chevalier Bunsen, and attended by Lord Byron, Lady Portman, Lady Caroline Cocks, the Hon. Miss Devereux, and Major General Sir Frederick Stovin. The Hon. Captain Gordon and Mr. G. E. Anson were in attendance upon the Prince.

The Prince of Wales, who looked remarkably well, and appeared highly delighted, was attired in a Scotch dress. Prince Alfred was also similarly attired.

The troops (the 1st Life Guards being dismounted), after marching before her Majesty in ordinary and quick time, then re-formed into line, and fired a feu de joie, down the front and up the rear, the military bands performing alternately during the military movements. The pieces performed by the band of the 1st Life Guards, by Royal command, were the celebrated march composed by her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, and the Prince of Wales's Quick Step, also composed by her Royal Highness upon the occasion of the celebration of the Prince's first birth-day at Windsor Castle, in 1842. The band of the Scots' Fusilier Guards, also by Royal command, performed the regimental slow and quick marches.

At the conclusion of the firing the troops gave her Majesty three hearty cheers.

Her Majesty then sent the Equerry in Waiting to command the attendance of the Hon. Colonel Cavendish, to whom the Queen expressed her high approbation of the admirable appearance and discipline of both the regiments, and, at the same time, honoured the hon. and gallant Colonel and Colonel Colville by inviting them to the banquet at the Castle in the evening.

The regiments, after again marching past her Majesty, then gave the Royal salute, and left the ground for their respective barracks.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent arrived in the forenoon at the Castle to pay a visit of congratulation to her august relatives, and remained to luncheon with her Majesty and her Royal Consort.

His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales received several valuable presents from his Royal and illustrious relatives during the day.

The banquet, to celebrate the fifth anniversary of the birth of his Royal Highness, took place in the evening, in the Grand Dining-Room.

The company included her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Cambridge, their Royal Highnesses the Hereditary Grand Duke and Grand Duchess of Mecklenburgh Strelitz, her Royal Highness the Princess Mary, his Serene Highness Prince Frederic of Hesse, his Serene Highness Prince Edward of Saxe Weimar, his Serene Highness Prince Loewenstein, his Excellency the Chevalier Bunsen, the Lady in Waiting of the Duchess of Cambridge, the Baroness de Speth, the Marquis and Marchioness of Worcester, the Earl and Countess Granville, the Dowager Lady Lyttelton, Lord Portman, Mr. George Edward and the Hon. Mrs. Anson, Sir George Couper, and the Gentleman in Waiting of the Duchess of Cambridge.

The band of the Scots Fusilier Guards attended during dinner.

Her Majesty also had an evening party. The following had the honour of receiving invitations:- Lady Isabella Wemyss, Lady and Miss Couper, the Hon. Caroline Lyttelton, Colonel and Lady Emily Seymour, Viscount and Viscountess Seaham, Colonel the Hon. H. and Miss Cavendish, and the Commanding Officer of the Scots Fusilier Guards.

Her Majesty's private band attended in the Castle during the evening.

A splendid new Royal standard was hoisted, for the first time, on the Round Tower.

The bells of St. George's Chapel and the parish church of St. John rung merry and loyal peals, at intervals, throughout the day. A Royal salute was fired from the Corporation ordnance in honour of the event, in the Bachelor's Acre. A Royal salute was also fired from the Belvidere Battery, at Virginia Water, and likewise from the vessels on the lake, at twelve o'clock.

A public dinner took place in the evening at the Royal Adelaide Hotel, to celebrate the birth day of the Heir-Apparent, at which Mr. Neville (who presided), one of the members for the Borough, and upwards of forty of the principal inhabitants, were present. Upon the healths of the Queen, Prince Albert, and the Prince of Wales, being drunk, and right loyally responded to, Royal salutes were discharged from a battery erected in the gardens of the hotel.

The houses of several of the Royal tradesmen were illuminated in the evening. A magnificent Prince of Wales's feather, beautifully executed, was displayed in front of the house of Mr. Sharman, in the High-street.

A large cake, elegantly ornamented with naval and military devices, elaborately executed by Mr Mawditt, her Majesty's first yeoman confectioner, was placed on the banqueting-table, at the Castle, in the morning, and partaken of by her Majesty's Royal and illustrious guests.

The Court at Windsor.—On Sunday morning the Queen and Prince Albert took their usual early walk. Her Majesty and Prince Albert, the Ladies and Gentlemen of the Court, and the domestic household, attended Divine Service in the private chapel. The Hon. and Rev. C. Leslie Courtenay officiated. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent also attended the service.

Windsor, Thursday Evening. (From our own Correspondent.)—Her Majesty and the Prince Consort walked this morning in the Home Park. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Cambridge, their Royal Highnesses the Hereditary Grand Duke and Duchess of Mecklenburg Strelitz, and the Princess Mary of Cambridge, and his Serene Highness the Prince of Hesse, took their departure from the Castle this morning, at ten o'clock, for Kew, calling at Frogmore en route to take leave of her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent. Prince Albert, accompanied by by Prince Edward of Saxe Weimar, and attended by Lord Byron, the Hon. Capt. Gordon, Mr. G. E. Anson, &c., left the Castle immediately after the departure of his illustrious relatives, to enjoy the sport of shooting over the Royal preserves, in the [illegible] of the Great Park; returning, at two o'clock, to luncheon with her Majesty. The Royal Family were taken for their usual airings in the morning and this afternoon. Her Serene Highness the Princess of Hesse is expected to arrive this evening, upon a visit to her Majesty. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, the Baroness de Speth, and Lady Anna Maria Dawson, will have the honour of joining the Royal dinner-party at the Castle this evening. It is generally expected that the Court will leave Windsor, on Tuesday next, for the Isle of Wight.

Her Majesty's Late Visit to Hatfield House.—The Marquis of Salisbury left Hatfield House, Herts, last week, to visit his extensive landed property in Lancashire. The noble Marquis, on Saturday last, gave the whole of the artisans employed on his estates in Hertfordshire a subtantial entertainment, at Hatfield House, in consideration of the activity and zeal displayed by them in forwarding the preparations for her Majesty's visit. Mr. Champion, his Lordship's clerk of the works, presided.

Court Arrangements. Although the precise period has not yet been determined upon by her Majesty for the Court to leave Windsor Castle, for Osborne House, it is supposed, from instructions which have been forwarded to the Isle of Wight, that the Queen and the Prince Consort will take their departure from Windsor in the early part of next week.

The Earl of Harrowby.—The venerable Earl of Harrowby, according to accounts received in Grosvenor-square, from Sandon Hall, Staffordshire, is somewhat improved in health

Lord Willoughby De Broke—We are happy to learn that Lord Willoughby De Broke is gradually recovering from his late dangerous attack of illness

Aristocratic Marriages.—Last Saturday, his Excellency the Earl of Elgin and Kincardine, Governor-General of Canada, was married to Lady Louisa Lambton, eldest daughter of the late Earl of Durham, and sister of the present Peer. The ceremony took place at St. Peter's Church, Pimlico, the Hon and Rev. John Grey, uncle of the bride, officiating. The marriage of the Marquis of Ailsa with Julia, second daughter of the late Sir Richard Mounteney Jephson, Bart., of Spring Vale, in the county of Dorset, was solemnised on Tuesday, at the residence of Lady Jephson, in Pelham-crescent.

Proposed Marriage in High Life—We hear that the Earl Waldegrave is about to lead to the matrimonial altar, Mrs. Millard, widow of Mr. E Millard.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

The Indictment Against Mr. Dunn.—In the Bail Court, on Tuesday, Mr. Dunn appeared, and personally moved to change the venue of the indictment against him from the City of London to the County of Middlesex. The affidavit upon which he moved stated all the usual facts excepting this, that he had not been able to state that he could not have a fair trial in London, because he believed he could have it, but he would prefer being tried in this County. The prosecutrix, her partners, and all the witnesses lived in this County. The chief objection he had to be tried in London was this, that it had been circulated in the public papers that his object was to make a bankrupt of this lady, which was calculated to create an angry feeling in the minds of mercantile men. Now, it would not be possible for him to make the lady a bankrupt, nor had he any such intention. Proceedings had been adopted at the Old Bailey which had created great alarm in his mind. The name of the foreman of the Grand Jury had been endorsed on the back of the indictment some time after the bill had been found. The indictment was for perjury, for swearing in the Bankruptcy Court that Miss Coutts was indebted to him. He was sure the parties were too respectable to endeavour, by any steps, to drive him into a corner or to make him uneasy; he would therefore leave the matter in the hands of his Lordship. Mr. Justice Patteson said, that in such cases the venue was laid in the County wherein the cause of action arose; therefore, the proper place for this to be tried was the City of London, and he must have a very strong reason for removing it, and he did not think any ground had been laid. He could not suppose that twelve gentlemen of London would not try the case as fairly as twelve gentlemen of Middlesex.—Sir F. Thesiger might be permitted to say, that if he had the slightest suspicion that there would be the smallest prejudice against Mr. Dunn, or that he could not have an equally fair trial in London, he would at once consent to change the venue.—Mr. Dunn then asked his Lordship to order him a copy of the Grand Jury panel, with the residences of the Grand Jury.—Mr. Justice Patteson did not recollect an instance of such an application. Rule refused.

The Late Case of Death From Flogging at Hounslow.—In the Court of Queen's Bench on Thursday, the Attorney General moved, at the instance of Mr. Wakley, M.P. for Finsbury, for a rule calling upon Michael Cooke and Thomas Healey, who are the printers and publishers of the Medical Times, to show cause why a criminal information should not be filed against them for a libel published in that paper. The Libel appeared between the 1st and 3d of August. The Learned Gentleman read the alleged libel, which stated that the whole proceedings at the inquest were a farce; that Mr. Wakley would be consigned to infamy after what had taken place if he did not prove that the soldier died from military torture, and that he had coaxed the private soldiers of the regiment in order that he might bring a charge of murder to the door of an eminent medical man (Dr Warren) to conjure up such a charge against him and Colonel Whyte, and the farrier and drummer, and that he had acted throughout the investigation, in order to gain public sentiment in his favour, to help his fortunes for the future. It went on to accuse him of prostituting the office of an English magistrate for the purpose of seeking applause; and said that the inquest was a melo-drama; that Mr. Wilson and Mr. Wakley had connived together for the purpose of preparing a colourable statement to the jury; and concluded by stating that they shared the fees which Mr. Wilson received for post mortem examinations. The Court granted the application.

ACCEPTANCE OF OFFICE BY CONSERVATIVES.

The Morning Post of yesterday confirms a statement it made a few weeks ago, to the effect that the Duchy of Lancaster was in future to be managed by a Chief, assisted by a Board of unpaid Commissioners. Our contemporary adds:—

"There is now no longer any necessity for preserving the secrecy that was at the time imposed on us. The department alluded to is that of the Duchy of Lancaster, and the intended Board of Commissioners—however surprising the fact may appear to our readers—will be composed of the Earl Spencer, the Earl of Lincoln, Sir James Graham, and the Earl of Hardwicke!

"We were strictly correct in saying that these Commissioners will receive no pecuniary emolument; but we do hear that certain arrangements have been made in reference to the distribution of patronage, by virtue of which the new Board will not be left altogether without influence.

"It is, for the present, quite enough for us to know that two members of Sir Robert Peel's late Cabinet, and a nobleman who held an appointment in the Royal Household under the same Administration, have accepted office at the hands of Lord John Russell.

"Were we altogether wrong when, five weeks ago, we ventured to say that the circumstance would 'throw a very curious light on the present state of parties in this country?'"

The Earl of Westmoreland.—We are enabled, on the authority of the last advices from Berlin, to contradict the report of the dangerous illness of the Earl of Westmoreland, lately circulated in the German journals. Beyond a trifling cold, the noble Earl is in the possession of excellent health.

Fall of Three Houses and Loss of Life.—On Thursday evening, three newly-erected and unfinished houses in Alfred-place, Brompton, fell down. Three men were at work, and one of them, named Kasey, was buried in the ruins. One of the other men was much hurt. The mutilated body of Kasey was found yesterday morning.

LATEST FOREIGN NEWS.

France.—The Paris papers and our latest private letters allude to various contradictory rumours upon the subject of the Montpensier marriage, which again has assumed some importance, it being said that the misunderstanding between England and France has been explained, and cordiality restored. According to one account, Lord Normanby had, in compliance with instructions from London, demanded an audience, and had presented to the Duke and Duchess of Montpensier the felicitations of his Court upon their marriage. Another rumour was to the effect that Lord Normanby had received an order to demand his passports. It was said that a dispatch had been received from M. de Jarnac, which had produced a deep sensation at the Tuileries. The first of the above rumours received countenance from the agents of the Government, and the funds rose. The facts which are now known are, nevertheless, simple and natural, and such as do not produce any effect upon the existing differences between the Governments. It is the etiquette that a new Ambassador, on his arrival, shall be presented to each of the members of the Royal Family. At the time of Lord Normanby's arrival in Paris, last August, the Prince de Joinville and the Duke de Montpensier were both absent, and since that time no opportunity occurred in which the Ambassador could be presented to them. Lord Normanby accordingly addressed a note, on Monday afternoon, to the Minister of Foreign Affairs, requesting to be presented to these Princes. In compliance with this, he was received in their private apartments at the Tuileries, on Tuesday, at one o'clock, when he was also presented to the Duchess of Montpensier by the Duke. The King, Queen, and all the Royal Family left Paris on Tuesday for Compeigne, where they are to remain some days. They delayed their departure for some time, for the purpose of receiving the congratulations of Lord Normanby.—The inundations throughout the south of France have subsided. The damage done to the Paris and Orleans Railroad has been less considerable than was at first supposed. It will be reopened in the course of next week.

Public Baths and Wash-houses in Manchester.—In Manchester the erection of the additional private baths at this establishment has very favourably progressed, and there appears no doubt but that they will soon be fully completed. The shower baths are now nearly in general use, and have given the highest satisfaction, in so far as they have at present been used. The extraordinary increase in the washing department, shows more satisfactory returns than could have been supposed. The institution opened for this department on the 10th of September, and during that month there were 9827 articles washed by 199 parties. In the following month of October, the numbers who availed themselves of the privileges offered by the establishment were 568, during which period 18,728 articles of various descriptions were washed, showing a very unexpected increase.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

Proposed Removal of the Wellington Statue.—We understand that, after all, it is intended to remove the Wellington statue from its present position. The sites now spoken of are Waterloo-place, opposite to the Duke of York's column, and the Parade Ground in St. James's Park.

Proposed Improvements in the City.—On Wednesday afternoon, a large meeting of inhabitants of the ward of Farringdon Without, was held in the New Court, Old Bailey, for the purpose of opposing the present plan for the improvement of some parts of the City, to procure the appropriation of a portion of the Corporation funds to the above ward, and to take means for ameliorating the sanatory state of the metropolis. Sir James Duke, Alderman of the Ward, presided. Mr. Carpenter moved the following resolution, which was adopted after a short discussion:- "That this meeting has heard with surprise and regret that the Court of Common Council has passed a resolution for the appropriation of a sum amounting to nearly £300,000, to the making of a new street of very questionable utility, and which will, probably, involve the outlay of half a million more, without affording relief for the traffic in some parts of the most important and crowded thoroughfares of the City of London." The proposed new street would commence at King William-street, opposite the statue, and run to Queen-street, Cheapside. It was, in point of fact, a widening of Cannon street, which would be made sixty feet in width. The following resolution was then adopted:—"That how important soever it may be to increase the traffic in the City of London, there are other and much stronger claims upon the funds for those sanatory regulations upon which the health, comfort, and lives of many of the inhabitants of the City of London depend." After a short discussion, it was agreed that the meeting should be adjourned in order that the question of the sanatory condition of the City might be more fully considered and discussed. In addition to the various proposed alterations, it has been arranged to build a commercial edifice adjoining the Hall of Commerce.

Another Bridge over the Thames.—On Wednesday notice was given that application is intended to be made to Parliament in the next session for leave to bring in a bill for constructing a bridge over or across the River Thames, at from or near Essex-Street, Strand, to the opposite shore, at or near to Dowson's-wharf, in the Marsh and Wall liberty. Also for making and maintaining a market, at or near the south end of the proposed bridge; and also to obtain powers for the compulsory purchase of lands and houses, and to levy tolls, rates, or duties in respect of the said bridge and market.

Baths and Wash-houses.—On Saturday a special meeting of the Marylebone Vestry took place at the Court House, for the purpose of considering the propriety of extending to the parish the provisions of the Act relating to the establishment of baths and wash-houses for the labouring classes. Mr. John Williams took the chair. Mr. Gomm brought forward the necessary resolution, which was seconded by Sir James Hamilton, and carried unanimously. A committee was then appointed to take the necessary steps for carrying out the object, and the Vestry Clerk ordered to write to the Secretary of State for his consent, in accordance with the provisions of the Act.

Births and Deaths in the Metropolis.—The number of deaths registered in the metropolitan district during the week ending Nov. 7, was—males, 463; females, 481; total, 944. This number is below the average both of the last five years and five autumns, but slightly exceeds the first week of November during the past five years. There is a slight increase of the number of deaths from typhus. Not a single death from cholera was registered last week. The number of births registered in the week ending Nov. 7, was—males, 689; females, 692; total, 1331.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

Curious Robbery by a Young Frenchwoman.—On Wednesday evening, the 27th ult., amongst the passengers brought by the up train from Southampton to the terminus at Nine Elms, was a young Frenchwoman, fashionably dressed, but whose appearance was rendered more than ordinarily attractive from the fact of wearing her hair, which consisted of a profusion of magnificently black tresses, wholly unconfined, and flowing over her shoulders to her waist. The young woman, who spoke English with difficulty, inquired for an hotel, and was taken by the servants of the railway company to the Railway Hotel. Upon being introduced to Mr. Howse, the landlord, she stated her name to be Mdlle. Malvina Florentine de Saumarez. Having remained in the house some days, Mr. Howse questioned her as to her connexions, and her reasons for remaining so long in London; but her answers were, if not at all times perfectly satisfactory, sufficient to lull suspicion. She had with her a valuable accordion, upon which she played superbly, and otherwise exhibited the fruits of an excellent musical education. On Saturday evening she went to Astley's Theatre, and prior to starting to that place of amusement, produced a cheque on the Fareham Bank for £99 13s., the name of the drawer being Purkiss, which she requested Mr. Howse to get cashed. Mr. Howse stated that the readiest mode of obtaining cash for the cheque would be by giving it to one of the railway guards, who could present it at the bank it was made payable at. This proposition did not accord with Mdlle. de Saumarez's views, and she replaced it in her pocket, saying that a day or two hence would do. About this time it was discovered that a cash box, containing upwards of £150 in gold, two double sovereigns, and a cheque for £99 13s., had been stolen from the house of a ship-builder living at Fareham. A reward of £20 was offered for the apprehension of the thief and recovery of the property, and, soon afterwards, Mr. Gow, the superintendent of the Hants constabulary, obtained such information as induced him to come to London and take the young Frenchwoman into custody. The prisoner threw herself upon her knees, and gave the following extraordinary statement:—That, a few weeks since, a gentleman brought her to England; and, after remaining with her for a few days, left her at Gosport, where she obtained apartments at a boarding-house. The family with whom she lodged showed her many kindnesses, and she was introduced to their cousin, who resided at Fareham. Here she remained a week on a visit, and during that time saw the mother of her friend's cousin give him fifty sovereigns from a cash-box, which she afterwards deposited between the sacking and bed of a bedstead. The prisoner added that she left the house and went to Southampton, where she purchased a cash-box resembling the one she had seen, and, returning with it, complained of her head aching, and requested permission to lie down for an hour or so before she left for Gosport. She then went to the room where she knew the cash-box to be deposited, and, substituting the empty for the full one, succeeded in leaving the house without exciting any suspicion. She then went direct to the railway station, and choosing a first-class carriage, in which there was no other passenger, she broke open the box with a knife, and, having abstracted the contents, threw the box out of the window. She said she had felt miserable ever since, and inclined to give herself up to justice. Upon being searched, the cheque and two double sovereigns were found upon her, and Mr. Howse, upon opening the bag, discovered it to contain £146 in sovereigns. The money was given up to the superintendent, who started with the prisoner the same night for Fareham. On Tuesday she was taken before a magistrate, and remanded for the attendance of witnesses from London.

The Female Burglar. Hester Elizabeth White, the young female who, as we have already stated, stands charged with having committed a burglary on the night of the 20th of October, at the residence of Mr. Jones, of Woodland-place, Ealing, has been re-examined by the Middlesex Magistrates at Brentford, and has been fully committed to Newgate for trial.

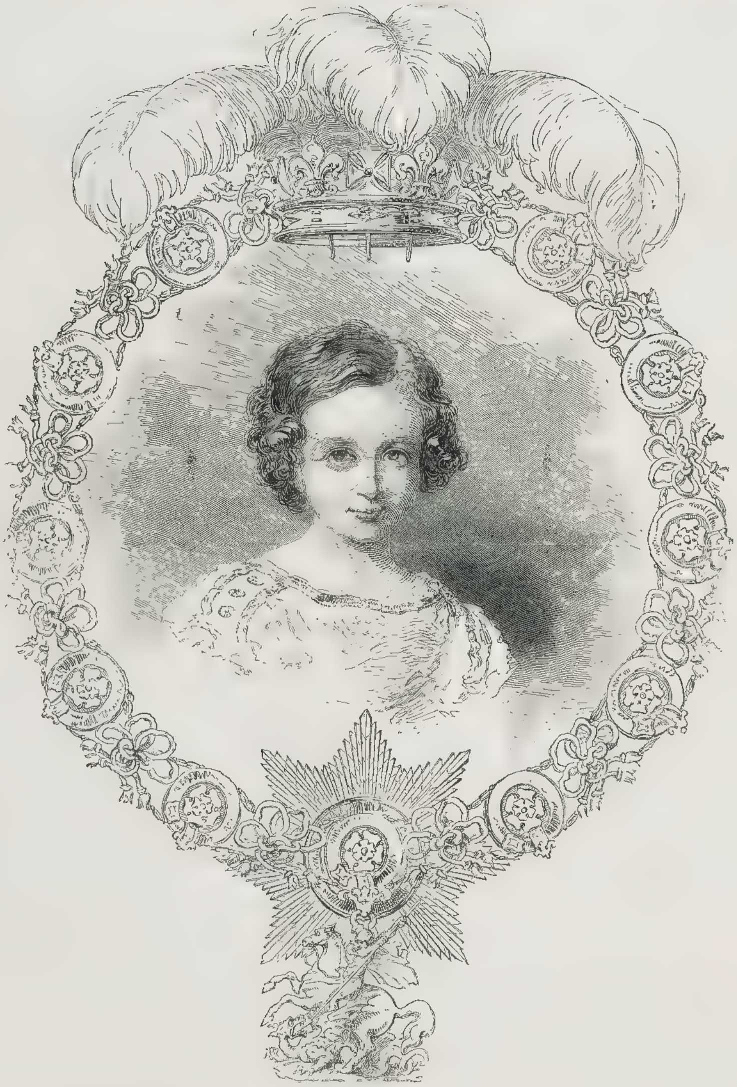
Curious Discovery of an Illicit Distillery.—A most extraordinary seizure has been made by the officers of Excise. The premises are situated immediately under and extending beyond the building in the Waterloo-road, known as the Royal Hospital for the Diseases of Children. Although daily visited by a great number of persons, no idea existed of the extensive trade that was carried on immediately below. A few days ago, however, from information received, Messrs. Bayford and Lewing, officers of the Excise, made their way to the rear of the premises, which are approached by a narrow passage, running parallel with the Waterloo-road, near to Stamford-street. Large gates enclosed the entrance to what were known as vaults for the depository of old ales and publican's fittings in trade. On gaining an entrance, they made their way to a vault approached by a very narrow passage, and totally excluded from a ray of light, where they discovered two large stills fitted up, both set in brick-work, and under one of which a fire had been recently lighted. A quantity of illicit spirits was also found in the place. On pursuing their search in the adjoining vaults, they found from eighty to ninety barrels of old ale, and the refuse of porter, amounting to 8000 or 9000 gallons. No molasses wash whatever was found on the premises. The worm tubs were supplied with water from vessels below the ordinary supply in the dwelling-houses in the Waterloo-road, and the waste water was discharged by pipes downwards from the stills into the common sewer, so that not the slightest clue to any premises could be obtained from this circumstance.

Fire near the Regent's-park.—At an early hour on Tuesday evening, a fire of an alarming nature broke out in the residence of Mrs. Needham, No. 12, Stanhope-street, Park-place, Regent's-park. It appears that whilst the inmates were in the drawing-room they were alarmed by the crackling of wood. Upon examination it was ascertained that the upper room was in flames. An attempt was made to subdue the flames by pouring buckets of water upon them, but the fire had already obtained a strong hold, and, bursting through the roof, the flames rose to an alarming height. Several engines promptly arrived, but, unfortunately, the firemen had to wait upwards of twenty minutes before any water could be procured; and meanwhile the fire continued to descend down the staircase, and through the flooring, into the rooms beneath. Water having at length been obtained, the engines were set to work, and the flames were by nine o'clock entirely extinguished. The damage done is considerable, but fortunately Mrs. Needham was insured in the County Office.

Indisposition of the Duke of Cambridge.—We regret to learn that, in consequence of the indisposition of the Duke of Cambridge, arising from a severe cold, his Royal Highness was unable to go to Windsor, from Kew, on Monday, to be present at the grand banquet given by her Majesty to celebrate the birth-day of the Prince of Wales

Illness of the Earl of Portsmouth.—We have to announce the serious indisposition of the Earl of Portsmouth. His recovery is exceedingly doubtful. The noble Earl, it is well known, has long been subject to aberration of mind. His Lordship is at present at his country residence, Hurstbourne Priors, Hants.

A Novel Point at the Election for the Mayor of Nottingham.—At the election of the Mayor of Nottingham on Monday, a question was raised whether a citizen of the United States can hold that office. Mr. Cripps was objected to on the ground that he had, when in America, become a citizen of the United States. The Town Clerk was of opinion that this circumstance would not be a legal objection, and as Mr. Cripps avowed himself to be a loyal subject of the Queen, he was unanimously elected. The discussion of the question occupied much time, and excited great interest.



HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCE OF WALES, BORN NOV. 9, 1841.

LINES TO THE PRINCE OF WALES ON HIS BIRTH-DAY.

> Who rises like the issue of a King,
> And bears upon his baby brow the round
> And top of Sovereignty
> SHAKSPEARE.

The voice of nations rises on the gale,
Across the island of the brave and free
On this, thy Festival, to bid thee hail,
Young Lord of Empire over land and sea !
Great as thy heritage is yet to be,
It is not greater than the hope we twine
With the far years of thy futurity,
Thou scion of a sceptre-bearing line :
Oh ! heir to all its power—be all its virtues thine !

Short yet thy progress on that Earthly path
Whence wealth and worship sweep the thorns away ;
To thee the world is fair—for thee it hath
Less shade than sunshine where thy footsteps stray ;
No struggle will be thine from day to day,
And chance and change—dark dwellers with the morrow—
Thy youth have never saddened with dismay,
Or forced thy cheek, in childhood's hour, to borrow
That pallid hue which paints the sons of want and sorrow

No knowledge of a people's woe forbids
The lightsome sleep of youth to seal thine eyes ;
Not yet the future troubles thee—thy lids
Are closed in peace—and while to us arise
From the abyss where fate in darkness lies,
Spectres of evil that may yet befall ;
Then may they ne'er approach—it is not wise
To let the coming time that heart appal
Whose present hopes are bright, with gladness gilding all.

There are kind eyes keep watch upon thee now,
And soft the hands that tend thy couch of rest ;
Thy Queenly Mother's kiss is on thy brow,
And in a people's blessing thou art blest ;
Far distant be the day in which thy breast
Must throb beneath a thought of regal sway !
Power brings to every heart a fearful test ;
Not human strength must aid thee in the day
That at thy feet shall rule, and boundless empire lay.

And when thy mind, by time awaked, shall ask
Its question of the past—oh, may there be
Those who will tell thee truth without a mask,
And show thee what to follow, what to flee.
Princes have been, who young and pure like thee,
Have lived to be a sorrow to the earth—
False, selfish, proud, cold in their cruelty :
Be not thou like to them ; let truth and worth
Bring to thy future years the joy that hailed thy birth !

LEWIS FILMORE.

THOUGH Winter's breath hath barb'd the breeze
And snow-fraught clouds blockade the sun ;
Though torpid droop Earth's energies,
As though her final task were done ;
Still warmly bounds Old England's heart,
For Loyalty crowds all her sails :
Castle and Cottage, Fleet and Mart,
Welcome thy Birthday, Prince of Wales !

And reason good ! The very name
Calls up the glories of the day,
Which beam'd on Cressy's flag of fame—
That burst on Agincourt's array—
The Black Prince and brave Hal ! . . . Our Land
Still nobly o'er each foe prevails :
Three Nations join—heart, head, and hand—
And rally round the Prince of Wales.

There's Scotland in her bonnet blue,
Steady and firm as rock of steel !
Her tartans waved at Waterloo,
When onward rush'd each sturdy "Chiel."
There's England's glorious Chivalry,
And Erin's lance, that seldom fails :
Match me, old Earth ! these nations three,
Whose shields bear up the Prince of Wales !

Fair Child ! thy years are barely five,
And yet to thee the freeborn wave
Hath welcome been, where "Jack's alive"—
Right well thou lov'st the Sailor brave !
For, Nelson, Nile, and Trafalgar
Are not yet quite forgotten...Quails
The Tricolòr before the Tar,
Who ramparts well the Prince of Wales.

Yet 'tis not that, most Royal Child !
Our creed and country both disclaim
The stern recourse to warfare wild—
Save to defend our rightful claim.
Man hath a mission. 'Tis gone forth :
In vain Ambition's shaft assails.
Commerce—the Arts—Peace—Moral Worth,
These be true glories, Prince of Wales !

Oh ! cloudless be thy path on Earth !
May "Ich Dien" prove thy guiding star !
An Empire hail'd with joy thy birth,
It hails thee now, both near and far.
Long may it be so ! Britain's brand,
Her free flag to the mast-head nails.
God bless the Queen—Prince Albert—and—
Hurrah for the young Prince of Wales ! L.

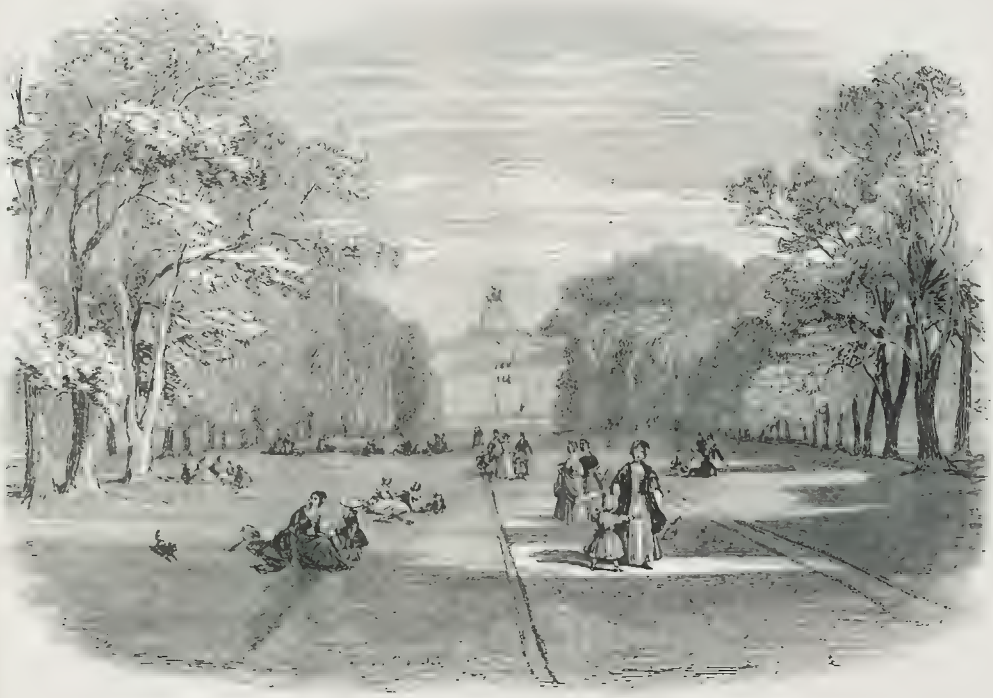
WINDSOR CASTLE.



THE LONG WALK, WINDSOR.

THE LONG WALK.

Southward of Windsor Castle lies the Great Park, a part of Windsor Forest, which, in the reign of Queen Anne, was cut off from the Castle by the intervening private property; and it was, therefore, determined to buy as much land as might be required to complete an avenue from the Castle to the Forest. This is the present Long Walk, generally considered the finest thing of the kind in Europe. It is a perfectly straight line, above three miles in length, running from the principal entrance to the Castle to the top of a commanding hill in the Great Park, called Snow Hill. Its continuity is a little interrupted by the public road leading into the town of Windsor; "but," says Mr. Jesse, "it would be very unwise to sacrifice a great and general convenience for a mere piece of picturesque beauty."

On each side of the Long Walk, which is slightly raised, there is a double row of stately elms, now in their maturity. The view from Snow Hill is very fine: on its highest point, in 18[illegible], was placed a colossal equestrian statue of George the Third, in bronze, by Sir Richard Westmacott; it occupies a pedestal formed of huge blocks of granite: the total elevation of the statue and pedestal exceeds fifty feet, and the statue (man and horse) is twenty-six feet in height. Mr. Jesse (Surveyor of her Majesty's Parks and Palaces) regrets that the road terminates before it reaches the statue: "had it been continued up to it, and a large area of gravel made round the base, the statue would have been thrown more into view, and connected more with the Castle."

The statue was raised by George the Fourth: we are not aware of its cost, but the expense of the pedestal was £8000. Mr. Jesse gives a pleasing glimpse of this part of the Park, where the beech-trees are extremely picturesque. "Herds of deer may sometimes be seen reposing under their shade, while the pendent branches of the trees, drooping with an elegance so peculiar to the beech, seem to invite the traveller to seek for a cool retreat beneath them. The fern, the thorn-trees, and the cattle feeding in every direction, all add to the beauty of the scene."

PRIVATE STATE APARTMENTS.—THE CRIMSON DRAWING-ROOM.

This is one of the superb suites of rooms added by George the Fourth on the east side of the Castle. Like the other principal apartments in this front, it has a spacious bay, which, while it contributes to great variety of form within, constitutes the main and richest feature of the exterior design.

This magnificent Drawing-room is hung with striped crimson satin; the ceiling, piers, and cornices are elaborately gilt; the furniture is crimson and gold; the candelabræ are richly gilt; there are a few large pictures on the walls: and the superb appointments are multiplied by a profusion of mirrors.

⁂ For the previous Illustrations of this Series, see Nos. 230 and 232, in present volume.

MUSIC.

LORETTA, A TALE OF SEVILLE. OPERA IN THREE ACTS. MUSIC BY MR. LAVENU, THE LIBRETTO BY MR. BUNN

There was the usual interest and excitement at Drury-Lane Theatre on Monday night, to hear the first representation of a new opera by an untried English composer, Mr. Lavenu, being the step-son of the late violinist Mori, and having received his musical education at the Royal Academy. The house was quite full; and amongst the amateurs and professors present we noticed Costa, Wallace, Balfe, Brindly Richards, Jawson, Ella, Parry and John Parry, Madame Dulcken, [illegible] Romer, Crevelli, Ferrari, Bartholomew, G. à'Beckett, Mark Lemon, Sir H W[illegible], Mrs Horace Twiss, Mrs. à'Beckett, the Marchioness of Conyngham, &c. To designate properly the result of the ordeal, recourse must be had to the degrees of success characterised by the lively Parisians. We should, therefore, call it a succès d'amitie; the ill-natured might style it "the publisher's success." And yet, if a foreigner were to draw conclusions from the calling before the curtain of the composer, the author, and of the principal singers, and from the plentiful shower of bouquets, and other such "premeditated impromptus," it might have been presumed that it was a veritable triumph, especially as there were seven encores one ballad being repeated, indeed, twice. On Tuesday night we witnessed the second performance, when the opera was reduced from four hours [illegible] about three hours and twenty minutes, which is still half an hour too long. Mr Lavenu will gain credit but not fame by "Loretta." The libretto being of a most exciting nature has, in fact, taxed his powers too much, with his want of experience

Our young composers, from a lack of opportunity, begin at the wrong end. They should first try their hands at one or two act operettas before they venture on the grand opera. If Mr. Lavenu's music had been reduced to these proportions, it would have gained, perhaps, a permanent footing. As it is, the majority of the pieces might be excised, and the drama gain wonderfully by the omission. Without entering at length into the incidents, we will just briefly state that, in the first act, Loretta (Madame Bishop) is made the victim of abduction by Don Carlos (Harrison), in a moment of intoxication, just as she and her father, Juanito (Weiss), have taken leave of Philippo (Borrani), who departs for the army, into which he has recruited. Loretta escapes from the place where she had been forcibly conveyed, after taking a survey of the objects therein, to be enabled to identify hereafter her betrayer, who is unknown to her. In the second act, Don Carlos has become a General, five years having elapsed, and he is betrothed to Florinda (Miss Poole), the daughter of his patron, Don Henriquez (S. Jones), the Gov[illegible] of Seville; but the lady, as usual in stage dramas, and very [illegible] has chosen for herself a lover, in the person of Don Ferdinand (King), a partner in Carlos's drunken revel in the first act. Loretta, who in the interim has lost her father, resides in a cottage with a child which is her own, but which she passes off for that of a peasant. Don Carlos seeing Loretta, and not recognising her, becomes enamoured; and, as Philippo, her brother, returns from the campaign a Captain, and proves himself to be of gentle birth, the new General makes an offer of his hand, which she refuses, on account of the aforesaid child. Philippo is unable to account for her rejection of such a brilliant offer, until he discovers that Loretta is a mother. Frantic with rage, he attempts to kill her, but is prevented by Don Carlos and the villagers.

In the last act he is reconciled to his sister, and he applies to Carlos to resign his commission, resolving to leave the country after the exposure of his sister's innocent dishonour, for such it is, but Loretta, who had entered Carlos's room with Philippo, identifying the furniture, &c., denounces the General, and Philippo strikes him, just as the Governor, Officers, &c., enter. As no explanation will be given by the brother of having administered a blow to his superior officer, Philippo is condemned to death, and is on the eve of eternity, but Loretta rushes in at the place of execution, and, by an appeal, with the child in her arms, to Don Carlos, the latter, who has always been conscience-smitten, offers to make atonement by marriage. The Governor, learning the state of affairs between Florinda and Ferdinand, does not hesitate to pardon Philippo, and all ends happily with a brilliant Rondo finale from Loretta of the recognised form in such matters

This story, which may be pronounced to be one of great danger to put on the stage, although it is founded on facts, is one of intense interest, and afforded every opportunity to the young composer for every school of music in the shape of soli, choruses, and concerted pieces. The poetry was unequal, as in all Mr. Bunn's effusions—sometimes pretty thoughts were found—often the extreme of bathos in the midst of pathos; but, in this respect, the author is neither better nor worse than many of his critics, whose inspirations, submitted to the same ordeal they bestow so unsparingly, will be found to contain as many absurdities. So long, indeed, as our libretto-writers will foolishly cling to the syllabic jingle, it will be impossible for even the best English Metastasio to satisfy the exigencies of musical notes in our language, so full of consonants, without twaddle and nonsense. The only effectual remedy is to write in blank verse, and then rapid articulation and musical expression may be attained with attention to idiom and grammatical sense

Mr. Lavenu is by no means destitute of melodic imagery, but he cannot grapple with exciting situations, and there is a want of the couleur locale throughout the opera. Where he was the least ambitious, he was the most successful Thus, although the romance, "On the Banks of the Guadalquivir," was considered to be the cheval de bataille of the opera, and it is effectively sung by Madame Bishop, who receives a nightly encore in it, the song is, undeniably, the ballad, "Happy Heart! oh, Happy Heart!" in E flat, so enchantingly warbled by Miss Poole, that it received a double encore.

Without intending to institute any invidious comparison between two orders of talent so totally distinct, and equally great in their way, as those of Madame Bishop and Miss Poole, considerations for art induce us to dwell for a moment on the opposite effects produced by their voices on the audiences. Here was Madame Bishop, with a high soprano (with little or no lower notes) cultivated to the highest degree of perfection, with correct intonation, and the purest method, but with indistinct articulation, and labouring incessantly for effect from beginning to end, giving often the painful notion that such continuous exertions must come to a stand still On the other hand was Miss Poole, with a mezzo soprano of great purity of tone, singing without effort without any attempt at a mechanical exhibition of vocalisation, but whose simple and unaffected style goes to the heart, and creates the most pleasurable sensations. It was the triumph, in fact, of nature over art—simplicity versus mechanism. Miss Poole vocalises as if she could not help it, every word she utters is heard: Madame Bishop sings artificially, and declamatory power is absolutely wanting. The audience evidently decided in favour of the ballad over bravura: amazement at the florid divisions in the Rondo finale, so brilliantly executed by Madame Bishop, was created; [illegible] the genuine rapture of the soul was only excited when Miss Poole was heard in a melody, than which nothing could be more unassuming in form, but deriving an especial charm from the natural style of the vocalist. The two ballads of Mr Harrison—the first, in F, "That feeling which exalts the soul; the other, in E flat, "Oh, I can well believe"—encountered some opposition in the encores. Of the two, the latter is the best, but it is badly placed, coming, as it does, in the midst of a concerted piece, after Philippo has discovered, as he wrongly imagines, the shame of his sister. Carlos (in order to sing his song) coolly tells Philippo,

> As friend I ask, as officer require
> That for a while you quell this useless [illegible]

Borrani is of course friendly to the music publisher, and falls back; then Carlos turns to Loretta and sings:—

> Hear me, and think I feel
> The pangs I may not heal.

Here is the cue, and the tender tenor, after knowing that Loretta is a mother—but who is the father of the child he is supposed to be ignorant of warbles his bit of sentiment:—

> Oh, I can well believe what bright
> And happy days were thine.

Surely this absurd situation might have been avoided, as it spoils a really effective finale dramatically speaking.

Of the concerted pieces, the trio in D five flats, "Before this heart my father,' in the first act, sung by Mdme. Bishop, Borrani and Weiss, is the most dramatic, and its theme is subsequently reproduced by the composer, very happily, in the instrumentation. There is a quartet unaccompanied, "Like the bosom of ocean," which is of the English glee form, and a sestet of the Rossinian coupe, sustained by the chorus. The overture is a string of subjects incoherently concocted, the opening movement of which had some nice points.

"Loretta" will not be a hit, but may draw a few nights, until Balfe's opera be produced. It will be certainly advisable, if Mdme Bishop is to be included in the cast, that there should be a second part for some other vocalist, equal in importance; as, to compose concerted pieces for harmonising voices, with a soprano of such limited compass and veiled quality as the upper voice, entails the necessity, for the vocal harmony to be effective, that the parts for the other voices must be written out of their ordinary register. And this, no doubt, has been a serious drawback for Mr. Lavenu, which the musical public is bound to bear in mind. To write for a high soprano, without vibration, and veiled or muffled in quality, is to be certain that no intense dramatic effect can be produced in a grand opera. Such a voice will be best heard in the concert-room. Some beautiful scenery by Grieve animated and picturesque action by Mr. W. West, and a general mounting most costly and effective—have been contributed for the opera of "Loretta"

On Wednesday evening, Miss Messent appeared for the first time, in Linda, in Weber's "Der Frieschutz." She will prove a valuable acquisition, although at present her powers are scarcely sufficiently developed, from the want of stage experience.

PRINCESS' THEATRE.

In the musical execution of what is called the opera of "Rob Ro[illegible]" there was nothing remarkable. We were much disappointed that the celebrated "Tramp" Chorus of Sir H. R. Bishop, one of the greatest composers this country has ever produced, should have been so inefficiently executed. The Diana Vernon of Miss G. Smithson was distinguished by insipidity and incorrect intonation. Barker, as Frank Osbaldistone, sang sweetly at times, but his ornaments might all be spared in the simple Scotch melodies. Loder's "Giselle" continues to draw crowded houses.

MUSICAL CHIT CHAT.

The Promenade Concerts at Covent Garden Theatre, and at Laurent's Casino, have been well attended this week. On Monday, Mr. Allcroft, the Concert-Monstré speculator, begins a series at the Lyceum, with a band of eighty players, conducted by Negri. The Distin Family, Sinclair, and Henry Russell, Master Thirlwall, G. Cooke, Carte, Handley, C. Severn, W. Thomas, Hatton, R. Blagrove, &c, have been engaged.

Benedict, it is stated, who is now in Paris, is to compose an opera for the Académie Royale, the libretto by Mr. Lucas. The pasticcio of Rossini, "Robert Bruce," will be produced at the close of this month, or early in December. Gardoni, the tenor, has forfeited his engagement with M. Leon Pillet, having been assigned an inferior part in "Robert Bruce." His place, it is anticipated, will be filled by Poultier, of Rouen. Gardoni's fine will be paid by M. Vatel of the Italiens, and Mr. Lumley of her Majesty's Theatre, as Gardoni is engaged both for Paris and London. Mdlle. Grimm, a pupil of the Conservatoire, has appeared in Carlo in Auber's "Part du Diable," at the Salle Favart, with success. M Th. Labarre, the harpist, succeeds Girard as chef d'orchestre, Tilmant having declined to quit the Italiens. Halevy's "Mousquetaires de la Reine" had run more than 100 nights in less than ten months, an unprecedented success. Berlioz's new work, "La Damnation de Faust," in four parts, was to be produced at the Opera Comique, on the 29th inst. Roger, Herman Léon, Henri, and Mdme Duflot-Maillard, were to be the principal singers. A military requiem, by Zimmerman, had been performed at the church of St. Eustache. It was considered clever, but noisy. Emile Prudent, the pianist, and Mdme. Cinti-Damoreau, had given a concert for the sufferers by the late inundations of the Loire. We learn from Milan, that Mr. Lumley was in that city, engaging artists. Verdi was composing an opera for the Pergola in Florence, the libretto being Shakspeare's "Macbeth."

Dr. Ries, the father of the late Ferdinand Ries, died at Bonn, on the 4th inst., aged ninety-one years. Dr. Ries was Director of Music to the Elector of Cologne, and was the early protector of Beethoven. At the Inauguration of the Statue in 1845, Dr. Ries received his musical degree from the University, in honour of the event. He sat in a chair in front of the orchestra at the rehearsals, shedding tears of joy at the honours paid to the great master mind of his age. Ferdinand Ries, his son, was the only pupil of Beethoven; but he died in 1838, at the age of fifty-one years. Jenny Lind was singing in Munich at the last advices, and was to appear afterwards in Vienna.

Mdlle. Fuoco, the Italian danseuse, who has created such a sensation at the Parisian Académie Royale de Musique, in the ballet of "Betty"—the story being the waggeries of Charles the Second at Wapping, with Mary Copp and the Page will appear next week at Drury Lane Theatre. The important question whether a premiere danseuse does not compromise her dignity by dancing in a divertisse[illegible]tead of a ballet, is to occupy the attention of the gentlemen of the long robe, but nothing but a congress of danseuses of the short robe can decide such a vital question of choregraphic art.

THE THEATRES.

ASTLEY'S.

We are afraid that we are beginning to lose our faith in Astley's. We do not think it is because we are growing older: had this been the case, our incredulity in its attractions would have come upon us some time ago; for we have arrived at very discretionary years. We rather imagine—and we make this statement in sorrow—that the style of performance has gradually got lower and lower, until all the artistic effect, which alone made the equestrian spectacles endurable, has vanished. There is, apparently, no lack of liberality on the part of the present lessee. The same number of horses clatter about the boards; the dresses are heavy, with spangles and foil; the supernumeraries throng, as of old, along perilous platforms, and form into complicated groups; but, with all this, the tableaux are so mechanically arranged, in hard, straight lines, on the fixed platforms the working of every piece of machinery is so bare—and the "set," as it is termed, of all the great scenes is so inartistically contrived, and carelessly carried out, that the only feeling with a spectator, at all accustomed to theatrical exhibitions, is, "How much better all this might be done!"

Of the acting we say nothing, as nobody ever expects any in an equestrian spectacle; nor do they much attend to the dialogue; but in the entire absence of these points, the utmost care should be exerted to please the public eye, which, as we have before observed, is now educated to a far higher pitch than some managers give it credit for. Every one of our theatrical readers must recollect the exceeding beauty of general effect and detail that characterised all poor Ducrow's productions; if but a handful of people had to be disposed upon the stage, the grouping was artistic and graceful; and his grand scenes were really studies. Mr. W. West, at Drury Lane, has much of the same eye to an agreeable ensemble, breaking the various lines, and disposing his figures so that they may best harmonise with the general scenery. Surely what is merely an accessory at one theatre, should be equalled, if not excelled, at another which relies entirely upon spectacle as its leading feature. We say "spectacle," as we have long entertained misgivings about the real attraction of horses on the stage. We believe the Circle to be their true arena; and are convinced that an entertainment of first-rate horsemanship only, on the same plan as the Cirque, in the Champs Elysees, and got up with the same extreme care, would be one of the most profitable speculations a manager could enter upon.

We have been led into these remarks from having been present at the representation of "The Demon Horse" on Tuesday evening. A great deal of money has evidently been laid out on the piece, and a great many people are engaged in it; and yet the mise en scène is so full of absurd incongruities, and ineffective rushing about and jostling, that all interest in seeing it is destroyed. In the scene, for an example, of the hunt, the large trees at the back appeared to be growing up on a shelf, under which actors ran in and out; and people wandered about carrying hedges and fences, and placed them in the way of the hunters when the chase began; and a very harmless deer walked composedly from side to side, forming a ludicrous contrast to the frantic horsemen, who shouted, and spurred, and galloped up places like steam-boat piers at low water, evidently in the unsportsmanlike position of "before the dogs," who never appeared at all This was, however, of less consequence, as nobody went on the track the deer had taken, but appeared to be following the directions offered in Hood's inimitable out of "Which way did the fox go?" and pervaded the theatre quite promiscuously. The siege, too, was equally feeble; and whether it was supposed to be taking place inside the city or outside, or down in the fosse or up on the ramparts, was perfectly impossible to define; for there was a large arch, with tree side scenes, as if it had been in the middle of a forest, and far up at the back an anomalous complication of wonderful erections that, however, had the advantage of being able to do for anything an imaginative spectator chose to conceive them fitted for.

Much better were the scenes in the Circle. Stallmeister Steinbrecht is a gentleman who has acquired wonderful command over the horses he exhibits. His is not a performance of horsemanship, in the usual acceptation of the term. He is simply dressed in top boots and a black coat, and he puts his beautiful steeds through their paces in the manner of Madame Caroline, M. Baucher at Franconi's, and others. He was loudly cheered, and he acknowledged the applause very gracefully. Madame Dumos is a pleasing ecuyere; and the really marvellous performance of the equilibrious foreigner, with the bottles and basins, is alone worth encountering the perils of Westminster-bridge to see. The wheels of life, as regards Mr. Widdicombe, appear to have had their action reversed, he is positively looking much younger than he did last year. The "Shakspearian Jester," Mr. Wallett, did not impress us with high notions of the fun of the immortal bard as respected clowns. But the clowns are everywhere going from their mission. We long for the good old-fashioned Mr. Merryman of our early days, to return.

The foregoing remarks have been made with no ill feeling towards the establishment; on the contrary, we always wish Astley's well, from old associations. But Mr. Batty must make great alterations in all the departments of the theatre, before he can look forward to those great hits by which Ducrow amassed a fortune.

SURREY.

The engagement of Mr. Macready, which came to an end on Saturday last, after a very lucrative run of business, has been followed up with most praiseworthy spirit on the part of the management by that of the Misses Cushman, who made their appearance on Monday evening, in "Romeo and Juliet," and performed in "Ion" on Tuesday: on both occasions to very excellent houses. We have more than once noticed the acting of the talented sisters in these plays, when they were at the Haymarket. The effect they produced upon the audiences at the Surrey was not one whit inferior to that they had made upon those in the more legitimate spheres. It has been a great mistake to imagine that the transpontine play-goers would not go to see anything but ultra melo-dramatic performances. They will support everything that is really good, and crowd to patronise it; but it must be first-rate whatever its nature. Macready and the Cushmans in tragedy; and Harrison, Miss Romer, and Leffler, in opera, have always drawn good houses here, which other artistes ever so slightly inferior have completely failed in doing. Miss Cushman and her sister are moderately well supported by the members of the [illegible]ck Surrey company, one or two of whom, however, might become more perfect in their business with advantage.

Mr Mitchell announced his season of French plays to commence last evening at the St. James' Theatre, with Duval's comedy of La Jeunesse de Henri V., (the "Charles the Second" of our stage). Mademoiselle Brohan is spoken of as a clever and attractive actress, who has not appeared in England before: she is the première soubrette of the Théatre Français. There is something agreeable in the opening of the campaign at this house. It bespeaks the awakening of London life, from its autumnal lethargy, and carries our ideas on to the gaities of the next season. The present arrangements are made up to the beginning of June, 1847.

The Lyceum closed on Wednesday evening, and will not reopen for dramatic performances until Christmas. A pantomime will form the holiday entertainment; and arrangements have been made with Mr. Dickens, for the right of dramatising his Christmas Story, in the same manner as last year

The tide of popular favour still runs towards Sadler's Wells and Laura Addison; and the trouble of arriving at that theatre, which, like Boz's Golden-square, is in nobody's way from anywhere, is no more thought about. By the way, it may be a boon to our West-end play-goers to know that there are omnibuses which pass Charing-cross at short intervals, and put you down at the theatre This will save much vague wandering about in savage districts beyond Smithfield, or despairing enterprise in the great labyrinths of Clerkenwell. The Lessees of Sadler's Wells are making money, and they deserve to do so.

Grand Polish Ball and Concert at Guildhall. The Committee of Management and the patrons of this Ball met at the Guild[illegible], when, notwithstanding the early and great demand for tickets, it was resolved not to alter the former price, which has always been for a double ticket, admitting a lady and gentleman, £1 1s.; and for a single ticket, admitting a gentl[illegible], 15s. The Concert is to be on a grander scale than usual; and the beau[illegible], worked by the ladies of Poland, and presented to Lord Dudley Stuart, is to occupy a conspicuous position in the Hall, which will also be decorated with the stupendous lustres exhibited last Lord Mayor's Day. We c[illegible]dially trust the fête will prove profitable to the funds of the Association.

The New Roman Catholic Church at Lambeth.—It is arranged that the new Roman Catholic Cathedral, Lambeth, shall be consecrated on the 23d April next, being St. George's Day.

LITERATURE.

Pictures of Country Life, and Summer Rambles in Green and Shady Places. By Thomas Miller. With Thirty Illustrations by Samuel Williams. Bogue.

It has usually been held that a poet "hurts himself" by writing prose. There [illegible] be some truth in this, if we take "prose" in the every-day sense of the [illegible] Mr Miller's prose is, however, so highly imbued with poetic feeling, and [illegible]ged with the delightful enthusiasm of the poetry of Nature, that the pro[illegible] of such a volume as the present one will by no means affect the rank which he takes as a poet; whilst, as an acute observer and clever painter of chequered life—its cares and crosses, its struggles and amenities, its darkening storms and sunlit showers—this series of "Pictures" must very considerably add to the well-earned popularity of their author. It may, possibly, be objected that he occasionally boils over with "virtuous indignation" at the wrongs of the rustic poor: but these are days of "bold thoughts" and "daring changes," and the main object of the book is to draw the Reader into "the green solitudes" of the country, that he may have a brief breathing space before he proceeds further. The work would, indeed, appear to have been actually written "in green shady places;" and the strong opinions may have been suggested by the occasional glimpse of an unsightly pile with which a Dagonite has disfigured the smiling landscape; or, perchance, "a yet unenclosed footpath" may have embittered a few pages, and the squalor of poverty have sent the author to seek its cure in the modification of some recent remedial laws. Be this as it may, the gall of the book is minutely disproportionate to its benevolent tone; and it is scarcely possible to wander through the world without sometimes repining at an uncheery lot. In all that relates to the poetry of the Country, the several pages of this volume are cabinet "pictures," as charming as the title imports; such as the field poet has delighted to paint in his "Summer Rambles," and to people with delightful thoughts and holy musings. The titles will convey some idea of their charming variety—"Old English Ferries," "Shakspere and Sheep-shearing," "Osier Peelers," "Greenwich Park," "Country Statutes," "Twenty-ninth of May," &c. There is, too, a striking chapter on "Rural Cemeteries;" and a paper very nicely appreciating "Bloomfield's Farmer's Boy." We have but space to quote a few snatches from this attractive work: here is a very natural reflection, which may excuse some of the "hard words" we have referred to—

"It is a very natural thought—and has occurred to thousands, as they have passed through some beautiful English village, and admired the thatched cottage, with its wood-bine covered porch, standing in the centre of its own little garden; or been struck with the long row of dilapidated huts, that seemed to lean upon each other for support—it is a very natural thought, to wonder how the inhabitants obtain a livelihood. You see an old man working in his bit of garden-ground; that cannot support him: you behold an old woman, seated with her spinning-wheel in the open door-way; she cannot live by that. And, to draw a true picture of village life, as it really is in the present day, cannot be done without depicting much poverty, and many hardships."

Again: here is a very sensible estimate of the chances of "Young Englandism;" and it is the more valuable from being written by one who bears a poetical love of the subject:—

"Although we may admire the old May games, the rough and boisterous buffoonery of the ancient Christmas revels, and all the light-hearted tomfoolery which contributed to make the "merry England" we read of, still, we much question if the same amusements, which gave such gratification to our simple forefathers, would not, if now repeated, pall and dissatisfy the more refined taste of the present age. We fancy we should soon grow weary of watching the foolish curvetings of a stupid clown and hobby-horse; find but little pleasure in hearing some strong-voiced fellow halloing from out the throat of a pasteboard dragon; that the rude antics of Maid Marian and the coarse jests of Friar Tuck would hardly be tolerated in a decent household; nor could we get up those uproarious bursts of laughter which these spectacles were greeted with by our ancestors. The holidays of England will never be again what they once were. They were adapted for a rude age and a rude race: the barbarous relics of the past, worn by a pastoral people, who, unaware, were progressing towards a more refined and poetical age. We look upon them as manners and customs now obsolete; as things pretty enough to gaze upon in a picture, where the obstreperous uproar is silent, and we see but the quaint costume and odd antics of the actors; the eye pleased, and the ear unoffended. We retain, and improve upon the music, the singing, and the dancing of their merry-makings: the sun-shine, the scenery, and the flowers, we still worship; but their maskings and their mummerings we leave to sleep in oblivion. We are still worshippers at the same shrine, though we have hurled down the idols that disfigured the fair temple of Nature."

Here, too, is a clever artistic passage:—

"A poet might fancy, while standing here, that he looked upon England in its rude, sylvan, and barbarous age; and further out, in its present state, rich in improvement, and flourishing in industry, and bearing the marks which the intelligence of man has stamped upon the earth. So primitive look those thatched homes among the trees, so wealthy that wide expanse of cultivated land, here and there alive with lowing herds, and, further on, white over with bleating flocks. Behind, we might picture the hardy Briton hunting the savage wolf, or chasing the wild deer. Before, where the sunlight streams, instead of the howling wolf and the belling of the deer, we look for the bird-boy's whistle, or the milk-maid's song, or listen for the carol of the sun-tanned reaper. Here we have, mapped out before us, what our artists so seldom paint the bold back-ground of a primitive old world, hilly, and woody, and wild, softening down into smiling corn-fields and rich pasture lands, dipping into dales, and ascending in sweet, green summits, which give such a charm to the pastoral landscape of English scenery."

We have left ourselves but room to say that the work is embellished with some thirty most picturesque vignettes by Samuel Williams, our best engraver of "green and shady places," which form the staple of this beautiful work.

The New Small Debts A[illegible] Explained; also the Recent Debtor and Creditor Statutes in connexion with it. By Peter Burke, Esq., of the Inner Temple, Barrister-at-Law. W. Benning and Co.

This work may be divided into two parts, which, though perfectly distinct in purpose and matter, have necessarily a connexion with each other. The first part contains the prior Debtor and Creditor Law established by recent enactments, and administered elsewhere than in the Insolvent Court. The second part gives the new statute law, the 9 and 10 Vict., c. 95, for the more easy recovery of small debts and demands in England. The whole is analysed, simplified, and arranged, with the Acts themselves, and an Index; so as to place the Law of Debtor and Creditor in a clear and intelligible form for popular reference.

The Parlour Novelist. Simms and M'Intyre.

From thirty shillings to half-a-crown appears to be the rate of reduction insured to the reading masses by this very cheap and well-selected reprint. The series, already extending to nine volumes, includes Dumas's "Count of Monte Christo" and "Chateau d'If," and Eugène Sue's "Commander of Malta," but the more sterling attractions are Jane Austen's delightful novel of "Mansfield Park," Miss Sedgwick's "Clarence," and John Banim's powerful tales of the "O'Hara Family," wonderfully wrought pictures of Irish nature, achieving a great object, the assuaging of national prejudice and animosity, by the most fascinating means that genius can devise. We cordially recommend this work to the lovers of charming fiction, and the admirers of the most agreeable media of popular refinement.

Tales for Young People. By Agnes Loudon. Edited by Mrs. Loudon. Bowdery and Ker[illegible]

This neat volume comprises eleven Tales, six of which are from the pen of Miss Loudon, the "Agnes Merton" of Mrs. Loudon's popular books for young people. They are nicely-written narratives, full of promise, under the able guidance of the juvenile author's mother. There are, also, two Tales translated from the German; and the remaining three have been written by Mrs. Loudon, illustrative of historical records of remarkable trees, &c. This is a very pleasant mode of impressing botanical knowledge on the minds of children. Altogether, the volume is one of the prettiest imaginable books for the approaching gift season; and it has a few attractive illustrations. It is dedicated, by permission of her Majesty, to the Princess Royal.

SCOTLAND.

The Lord Rectorship of the Glasgow University.—It appears that Mr. Wordsworth, the distinguished poet, is to be nominated as a candidate at the approaching election.

Alleged Murder by a Wife.—At the High Court of Justiciary, on Wednesday (last week), Janet Campbell or M'Lellan was tried for poisoning her husband with arsenic, in July last, at Dunning, in Perthshire. After a trial, lasting two days, the Jury deliberated about an hour, and found a verdict of "Not proven," by a great majority, which was received with considerable surprise by the large assemblage in court.

Representation of Renfrewshire.—Colonel Mure, of Caldwell, has offered himself as a candidate for the representation in Parliament of the county of Renfrew, vacant by the death of Mr. P. M. Stewart.

Supposed Poisoning at Carlton-upon-Trent.—A case, involving a strong suspicion of poisoning, which took place two years ago, has been discovered at this place. The person, whose death is in question, was a farmer of Carlton-upon-Trent, named George Taylor, who died on the 26th November, 1844. Some remarks having very lately got abroad relative to the cause of his death, R. Falkner, Esq., of Newark, gave orders for the exhumation of the body, and a Jury was empanelled, which sat on Friday and Saturday (last week). From the evidence adduced it appeared that the deceased was unmarried, and that a woman, named Elizabeth Smith, who was described as somewhat prepossessing in appearance, intelligent, and twenty-eight years of age, took care of his house. In September, 1844, Taylor was attacked more than once by severe illness, during which his housekeeper nursed him with great care, but he ultimately sunk under the complaint and died on the day above-named; his disease being, in the opinion of the medical attendants, ulceration of the stomach. After his decease the woman Smith showed signs of much mental suffering, and at length confessed to other parties that she administered mercury to her master at two separate times, which she put in his coffee. It appears that a preparation of arsenic is frequently kept by the farmers to steep the wheat before sowing, and this preparation is commonly known among them by the name of "mercury." The witness who spoke to having heard Smith confess her having administered the drug, said that at the time she declared her only intention was to make her master ill, but not to cause his death, for which she felt great remorse. The inquest was ultimately adjourned, that the contents of the stomach of the deceased might be examined by competent chemists.

THE LATE ADMIRAL DUPERRE.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

ADMIRAL DUPERRE.

VICTOR GUY, Baron Duperré, was born at Rochelle, the 20th February, 1775. This gallant and distinguished seaman entered the French navy in 1793, and from that time, until disabled by his late illness, was continually and actively engaged in the service of his country. He rose through every grade, and was made an Admiral and a Peer of France in 1830. He first displayed his ability and valour, while a sub-lieutenant on board La Virginie, in an engagement between that frigate and an enemy's vessel. In 1808, while commanding La Syrène, he made a skilful and honourable retreat from before two English vessels of war. In 1810 he commanded the Bellona, and the station off the Isle of France; he there, in the Bellona, captured three ships of the East India Company. On the 24th August, in the same year, he sustained a terrible and successful sea-fight against the English: in that encounter, he destroyed our frigates the Magician and the Syrius, and he captured the Nereid. During the engagement, which lasted four hours, he was severely wounded in the face, and, being thrown down from the deck into the battery, was carried off senseless. After much more eminent service, Admiral Duperré was appointed to the chief command of the naval army of Africa, and co-operated with Marshal Bourmont in the taking of Algiers. In 1834, M. Duperré was President of the Council of the Admiralty, and Minister and Secretary of State for the Marine and Colonial Department of the French Government. The gallant Admiral during his later years suffered from a disease of the spine, which terminated fatally on the 2nd inst.; he died at Paris in the seventy-second year of his age, leaving behind him the reputation of having been one of the greatest naval officers of his day—a reputation which this country is ever ready to acknowledge, and well able to appreciate, even in an enemy.

The remains of M. Duperré were interred with great pomp at the Invalides, on Monday, the 9th inst.

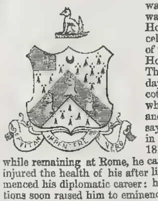
PRINCE RADZIVILL.

RADZIVILL is a non-Sovereign and Catholic princedom, having estates in Lithuania and the Grand Duchy of Posnania. Prince Michael, the recent head of this distinguished house, and the subject of this notice, was the third surviving son of Prince Michael, Palatine of Wilna, by his wife, Helen, daughter of Count Przezdziecki. Prince Michael, the son, was born the 24th September, 1778: he was a General, and Commander of the Order of Malta. The Prince married, in 1815, Alexandra, Countess Stecka, by whom he had, with other issue, a son, Charles, who succeeds him. Prince Michael died last October, at Podlieznim.

LADY SHUCKBURGH.

ANNA MARIA, Lady Shuckburgh, whose death occurred a few days since, was only daughter of the late Peter Denys, Esq., of Hans-place, Chelsea, by the lady Charlotte Fermor, his wife, daughter of George, second Earl of Pomfret. Her Ladyship, born 12th August, 1792, married, 27th October, 1825, Sir Francis Shuckburgh, Bart., of Shuckburgh, county of Warwick, and has left several children.

THE HON. HENRY FOX.



THE Hon. Henry Stephen Fox was born the 22nd September, 1791: he was the only son of General Henry Edward Fox, third son of Henry, first Lord Holland. He was thus the nephew of the celebrated Charles James Fox, and cousin of the late amiable and enlightened Lord Holland, and of his son, the present Peer. The Hon. Henry Fox was, in his younger days, well known in London as one of a coterie of gay and witty aristocrats, among whom were Lords Byron and Kinnaird, and others more or less celebrated, whose sayings and doings are recorded by Moore, in his "Life of Byron." After the peace of 1815, Mr. Fox visited the continent, where, while remaining at Rome, he caught a malaria fever, the effect of which injured the health of his after life. On his return to England he commenced his diplomatic career: his talents no less than his high connections soon raised him to eminence in it. He was the first Minister Plenipotentiary of Great Britain to Buenos Ayres, from which he was transferred in the same capacity to Rio de Janeiro: in 1836 he was appointed Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from this country to the United States of America. His conduct, both private and public, while in that important station, obtained the general esteem and affection of the Americans, and tended much to the dignity and advantage of his own Government. Mr. Fox died recently at his residence in Washington; he was in the fifty-sixth year of his age, and had never married.

NEW FONT IN DURHAM CATHEDRAL.

AMONG the many judicious alterations which the Dean and Chapter of Durham have lately been making in their noble Cathedral, is the erection of a massive Norman Font (in character with the style of the building), to take the place of the old Font, which, with its lofty canopy of tabernacle work, was far from being in harmony with the pile; however beautiful it might be in itself as a work of art. The Font is placed in the centre of the nave, at its western extremity. It is a fine work of art, and does its architect, Mr. Salvin, of London, much credit. The upper part of it is square. On the side facing the east, is a figure of St. Cuthbert (the patron saint of the Cathedral), holding the head of King Oswald; and on that facing the west, St. Cuthbert's Cross, with Norman foliage filling up the panelling of each. The north and south sides are decorated with roundels, sculptured with scenes from the life of St. Cuthbert, taken from some of the illuminations in a transcript of Bede's biography of the Saint, written about the year 1200, in the possession of Sir Henry Lawson, of Brough Hall. The Basin is supported by five short pillars, each adorned with varying decorations, the design of which has been taken from different parts of the Cathedral fabric. The Font is about to be raised by an approach of three steps.

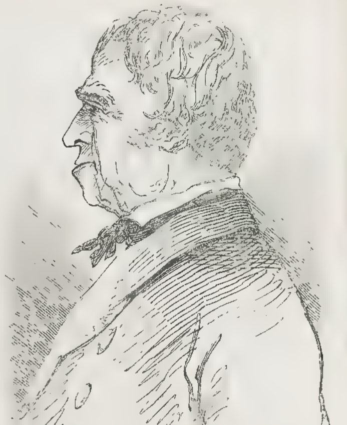
AMICUS.



GENERAL TAYLOR.

THE operations of the United States forces against Mexico are bringing into notice the names of the Generals and Military Commanders of both Republics. Among the American officers none stand higher than General Taylor, by whom the first movements were conducted. He is a veteran soldier, rough and ready for a camp life in all its changes. In his total disregard of the minor points of dress, etiquette, &c., he resembles our Commodore Napier, who led an attack in Syria in a broad straw hat and flourishing a thick cudgel. The American papers give similar anecdotes of General Taylor, whose exterior would probably strike the mess-table of "the Tenth" with dismay. In more essential matters, however, he is an efficient commander: he had not only to conduct the warlike operations, but, what is even more difficult, to organise and drill the raw volunteers, of whom the greater part of his army consisted.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

CAMBRIDGE. Nov. 11.

At a Congregation held this day the following degrees were conferred:—

B.C.L.—John Moseley, Christ's College.

M.A.—G. H. Money, A. Lowther, R. M. Newton, Trinity College; C. D. Gibson, A. K. Curtis, St. John's College.

B.A.—F. French, St Peter's College; J. M. Valpy, F. Bliss, Trinity College; F. W. Adey, Trinity Hall; W. Gipps, G. C. Mellor, O. P. Halstead, G. Lambert, J. B. Honnywill, St. John's College; H. J. Dodsworth, Sidney College; F. B. Burridge, Queen's College.

Ad Eundem.—A. F. W. Shadwell, M.A., Baliol College, Oxford.

RECENT APPOINTMENTS.—The Rev. James Browell, curate of Fulham, has been appointed to the incumbency of St. James's Church, Muswell-hill, Hornsey. The incumbency of St. James's Church, Bermondsey, has been conferred on the Rev. William Nowal.

THE LORD MAYOR'S CHAPLAIN.—Sir George Carroll has appointed the Rev. Mr. Cobden to be his chaplain during the year of his Mayoralty.

THE TEETOTALLERS OF THE METROPOLIS.—On Monday night, a very crowded meeting of teetotallers was held in Exeter Hall, Dr. Oxley in the chair, when, after upwards of twenty working men had addressed the assembly, a memorial to Lord John Russell was adopted, praying his Lordship to prevent the consumption of grain in brewing or distilling, and to preserve it for the use of those who were writhing under the effects of famine. They marched to and departed from Exeter Hall in Lodges, preceded by bands of music. It was computed that there were 4000 persons present, each of whom paid an admission fee of fourpence.

LONDON LUXURIES.—Seats are now being placed, similar to those in the parks, for the use of the public, beneath a handsome row of trees, on the foot pavement in Piccadilly.

THE "GREAT BRITAIN" STEAMER.—W. Billington, C.E., who received instructions to survey the Great Britain steamer, has given his opinion that the difficult task of floating her can be accomplished, and that respectable and experienced contractors may be found who will undertake to float her at a moderate cost. Mr. Billington thus describes the position of the Great Britain:—"She is stranded on the sands on the north side of Dundrum Bay, between two reefs of rocks, which extend a considerable distance into the sea, about 1000 yards asunder. Her position is north-west, with her stern to the sea, and about 130 yards above low-water, and her stem 300 yards from shore. On the starboard side the plates have been bulged, and the rivets sprung to a considerable extent, which admit freely the flowing and ebbing of the tide; and several holes about 1¼ inch diameter have been drilled through the bottom in order to prevent her from lifting or beating. At spring tides there are from 16 to 17 feet of water in her hold, and at low water she is left dry, with the exception of a small quantity of water in the dock she has naturally formed for herself in the sand and gravel, and about 2 feet in her bottom, and she oscillates freely during high tides. She appears much sprung and strained, has lost her rudder, and the screw propeller is slightly damaged. The cylinders, pumps, &c., and part of the driving gear, are covered at high tide, and exposed to the action of the salt water. Her weight is about 1,600 tons (without masts, &c.), and the accumulation of wreck about 200 tons more."

SHAKSPEARE'S BIRTH-PLACE, STRATFORD-UPON-AVON.

IN our little gallery of "Nooks and Corners," there is not one which will be regarded with greater interest than the accredited Birth-place of Shakspeare, at Stratford. By the death of Mrs. Court, the owner of the house, the property will shortly be disposed of, according to the will of her late husband, and it is reported to be the intention of the Corporation of Stratford to purchase this home of genius—we trust to preserve it for the gratification of many future generations of pilgrims to the hallowed spot.

The house is so well known through tourists and the guide-books, that its description need scarcely be repeated here. Mr. Charles Knight has, however, invested its familiar history with such freshness and enthusiasm, that the reader will thank us for the following quotation:—

"In the town of Stratford, there is a street retaining its ancient name, Henley-street, being the road to Henley-in-Ardan, where, in 1574, stood two houses, with a garden and orchard attached to each; and these houses were then purchased by John Shakspere. It is said that William Shakspere was born in one of these houses. His father may have inhabited the house before the purchase; and it is more than probable that he did, for at a Court-leet in 1556, there is an entry of an assignment to him of the lease of a house in Henley-street, and of another in Greenhill-street. There is nothing to prove that the poet was not born in the house in Henley-street; and there that house still stands, altered according to modern fashion, its gable roofs destroyed, divided and subdivided into smaller tenements—part converted into a little inn, part the residence of a female, who shows the room where it is alleged that Shakspere first saw the light, and the low-roofed kitchen where his mother taught him to read. The walls of that bed-room are covered literally with thousands of names, inscribed in homage by pilgrims from every region where the glory of Shakspere is known. At the time when Shakspere's father bought this house, it was, no doubt, a mansion, as compared with the majority of houses in Stratford."—Penny Cyclopædia: voce Shakspeare.

THE POLICE OFFICES OF LONDON.

No. II.—THE THAMES OFFICE.

MR. BRODERIP AND MR. BALLANTINE.

The first named of these two gentlemen has just been removed to the Westminster Police Court, to fill up the vacancy caused by the death of Mr. Bond. The appointment is, of course, a promotion, and one which Mr. Broderip, as he has won it, will, we hope, enjoy long. He has sat upon the Thames Police Bench for nearly twenty-five years, and appears yet to be in the prime of life—a good-looking, portly, gentlemanly personage.

Mr. Broderip is a benevolent, kindly magistrate, somewhat fiery of temperament, and apt occasionally to cross-examine a stupid or prevaricating witness in a style and with a tone which has more of the sharpness and snappishness of the advocate than the calm dignity of the judge. He is somewhat of a stickler for the letter of the law, and apt to iterate and reiterate the reasons which induce him to take a particular view of a point long after any one he addresses sees the gist of the matter quite as well as himself

MR. BRODERIP, THE NEWLY-APPOINTED WESTMINSTER POLICE MAGISTRATE.

Mr. Broderip enjoys a fair standing at the bar; the volumes of Reports published by him, in conjunction with Mr. Bingham, of Worship-street, are standard works of reference; and, besides his legal attainments, he is a man of much and varied reading and information.

Mr. Broderip's removal will, we understand, be much regretted by the subordinate officials of the Court, to whom he has endeared himself by many acts of single-hearted kindness and benevolence.

Mr. Ballantine is the Senior Magistrate of the Thames Police Court. He is now approaching his seventieth year, and has kept his present situation for more than a quarter of a century. He is a remarkably tall, portly, and military-looking man—indeed, we believe that he was in the Army before he embarked in his legal career, and he still retains something of the bearing of the soldier. Mr. Ballantine has always borne the character of an efficient and upright Magistrate. He is possessed of a calm and agreeable disposition, and a clear head; he is, however, perhaps apt to cling to his own impressions, with occasionally undue tenacity. He makes up his mind upon a case speedily, and can very rarely be shaken from the view which he believed it right first to adopt. Mr. Ballantine is the father of the gentleman of that name, so well known as an Old Bailey Barrister. Occasionally, his son appears in his legal capacity in his father's Court; and, we have heard it remarked by those who know both well, that, upon these occasions, it was a matter of curious interest to watch the determination evidenced by Mr. Ballantine, senior, not to allow even the shadow of a doubt to creep in, of his being in any degree swayed in his decision by any considerations, other than those of the naked merits of the case.

In point of personal demeanour, nothing can exceed the contrast between the two Magistrates. Mr. Broderip is as fiery and explosive as Mr. Ballantine is quiet and self-possessed; but the difference, after all, is one more of manner than matter: both are gentlemen—upright public functionaries, and acute and learned lawyers.

THE WORCESTER HANDICAP STEEPLE-CHASE.

Fling me the picture of the chase. Scott.

Sport never dies—at least, in England. The plant is perennial. The seasons won't chant its dirge or write its epitaph. All that would be premature. When Sport evacuates the Turf, and gives the Jockey Club a holiday, you are sure to find him at the Steeple-Chase. When he retires from that field of his fame, you are equally certain to find his tent pitched at Newmarket, among the daisy-cutters, or else some other arena of noble equitation. Honour to Worcester! for it has just enjoyed the honour of opening the ball; of exhibiting the first Chase of the season; and a noble Chase it has been. There was

Lord Strathmore, on Switcher, brave hedger and ditcher,
  And bold Captain Barnet's Marengo the fleet;
Squire Onseley Higgins on Pioneer—which are
  The steeds just unlikely to suffer defeat.
We cannot be mute on Hon. Watkins' Salute;
  Tilbury's Culverthorpe jump'd to the scratch,
With Moseley's nag Jerry, that rasp'd away merry,
  And Mr. Smith's Tramp, 'bout the best of the batch.
Don't let us forget Mr. Preston's Brunette
  "A bumper, Squire Jones," to your Sparta the bonny;
Another line "tottles" the whole of the set
  In Mahomet, Gilrag, and b(i)g Little Johnny.

At starting, Tramp seemed determined to enact the part of the bull in the china-shop—viz., to have it all his own way. He had taken an idea into his head that the Severn would be only a ditch to him, and that his competitors were so many equine tortoises. Well and nobly did he clear the hurdles, where "Little Johnny" went down as though this were "the great difficulty:" while Switcher and Brunette, almost neck and neck, flew over bravely, close in the wake of the Tramp. At the second fence, Pioneer performed the functions implied in his name. He came to the front, only to clear the way for the band behind him; when Sparta and Marengo thundered upon his flanks, as though they were conscious of "the pluck" which their glorious names should evoke. Once more at the hurdles! and there Tramp took a leap that would electrify a tomb-stone. In sober truth, it brought him slap up to the front, although he was two lengths behind. Brave and gallant steed! you should have won the Race: but the race is not always to the swift, and the best horse has often been signally defeated. Now they enter the course—

On to the course! On to the course!
Gallantly rattles each quivering horse.
The Meadows are past; and now comes the brunt;
See! Sparta flies up, as of yore, to the front.
  Nobly she took the leap o'er the brook;
And over flew Tramp in the brilliantest style;
  Pioneer, Jerry, Marengo, unweary,
Come up in a bunch. Where is Switcher the while?
  He comes to the brook. Before you leap look!
Bah! he has been "dodging" the whole of the race;
  And, swift as the wind, he has now left behind
The most of the lot. Oh! brave is the chase;
  Bold Tramp is done up; and poor Jerry is down;

THE THAMES POLICE OFFICE.—MR. BALLANTINE, THE SENIOR MAGISTRATE.

Marengo remembers its name of renown;
With Pioneer second. Ply, Strathmore, the lash!
Hurrah! he is first: and another bold dash
Brings Switcher the laurel. Shout thousands around,
While the waves of the Severn re-echo the sound.

A most splendid race, and run in 11 minutes 20 seconds. A length between the winner and Marengo; ditto between the latter and Pioneer; Brunette fourth; Tramp fifth; the "ruck" at a respectful distance. The gentlemen riders were more than usually numerous, and Lord Strathmore's horsemanship was of the first order. He has gallantly borne off the palm.

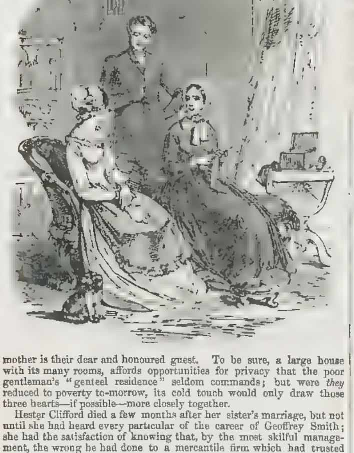
CHAPTER XVII.

CONCLUSION.

Most kind and gentle reader—for such you are, if you have really lent your patient fancy to all the shifting scenes of this history—will you loosen the reins of your imagination now, to dwell for a little while in the happy home of Trevor and Margaret! I will not weary you with a dull account of the wedding, or the dresses of the bride or bridesmaids. Susan Clifford and Catherine Joyce, so singularly connected by past events, were Margaret's "attendants" on the occasion; and if it be any satisfaction to be assured of the truth, I can positively affirm that no past memories exist which could at all interfere with the bestowal of their own fair hands, should the fit persons appear as suitors; though it must be confessed that they are considerably more fastidious and difficult to please than they were a few years ago. Trevor and Margaret have been married upwards of a year; and though, as a general rule, it is a very "bad plan" for parents to reside with their married children, they have never for a moment regretted that Trevor's mother is their dear and honoured guest. To be sure, a large house with its many rooms, affords opportunities for privacy that the poor gentleman's "genteel residence" seldom commands; but were they reduced to poverty to-morrow, its cold touch would only draw those three hearts—if possible—more closely together.



Hester Clifford died a few months after her sister's marriage, but not until she had heard every particular of the career of Geoffrey Smith; she had the satisfaction of knowing that, by the most skilful management, the wrong he had done to a mercantile firm which had trusted him, had been repaired, the forged draft recovered, and his name rescued from the chances of public posthumous disgrace. Who shall fathom the heart? By her own desire, all that remained of Hester Clifford was interred in the obscure churchyard of a Sussex village, beside the corpse which the "waves had given up." But let the dead rest free from reproach, as from the world's sin and sorrow, and turn we once again to the living.

The position of Trevor Sefton is peculiarly fortunate. Would, indeed, for the interests of humanity, that such a position were less peculiar, less an exception than it is. The man of wealth—and of the influence that wealth gives—who has known the struggles of poverty; the medical professor who is independent of all patronage, and therefore can look Truth in the face, and listen to her teaching, no matter how strange the garb she wear; who, though startled sometimes at her appearance, is not repelled from his search, even though charlatans have mimicked her guise till Truth herself is hooted at and abused, and compelled to veil her loveliness. But She is indestructible. Ages pass over in wrath or in silence, while she slumbers on; Time alone can remove her veils.

No matter what a man be called—poet, or philosopher, astronomer, or anatomist, the searcher mid the petals of a flower, or the analyser of a drop of water—let him work at unshrouding Truth, and the meanest labourer in such a cause is greater than the world's mightiest conquerors!

It is good for all such to have some fair share of Gold, for it gives to them Ease and Leisure. And oh! may The People feel that they can not buy Ease and Leisure for such workers too dearly!

Trevor Sefton has a helpmeet who has been tried like himself, and is worthy of him. Common-place acquaintances but they mix very little with such think them both remarkably clever people; are somewhat afraid of them, perhaps; and would quite wonder at the little weaknesses which belong to warm hearts, and which they do not even struggle against indulging.

In Margaret's dressing-room stands an old-fashioned jewel-case of goodly dimensions, and which contains ornaments of diamonds and other gems of great value. But the setting is so out of date that she never wears them. Some day, no doubt, they will be re-set—Trevor indeed talks of having it done: but speaking of the jewels always makes them think of their benefactress, and they say they have not the heart to change anything she has worn—yet. At the bottom of the jewel-case, held more sacred than all the rest of its contents, are a few withered flowers—the reader knows whence they were gathered.

Margaret keeps all the precious things! And, by the way, the guard to her wedding circlet, constantly worn, is a certain sapphire ring, also it is hoped held in remembrance.

There is one of their household, too, who must not be forgotten—a spaniel that answers to the name of Victor; that is, when Trevor Sefton calls, for no one else does he think worthy to be followed or obeyed. Even his gentle mistress he endures rather than esteems. I love nearly all dumb creatures, and dogs especially; can watch with almost painful interest their struggling intelligence, but I must own Victor is an unamiable dog. Very much to be respected for his faithful attachment to his departed mistress, no doubt; but not in the least a loveable animal. He snaps and snarls at visitors, and even bites as much as a mumbling old dog with half a set of teeth can bite. And yet Margaret will not reprove him, nor forbid his jumping on the ottomans and sofas, "because he has been used so to do," to the great indignation of Mrs. Clifford, who, however, can really find no other fault in the arrangements of her daughter's household!

The Duke of Devonshire.—The Duke of Devonshire arrived in Rome at the end of last month, from Milan. His Grace contemplates a sojourn of about five weeks in that city, proceeding thence to Naples, in which capital the Noble Duke has made arrangements to pass the approaching winter

COUNTRY NEWS.

The Cobden Fund.—The usual weekly meeting of the Manchester Committee was held on Tuesday evening. Mr. G. Wilson reported that £318 16s. 2d. had been received since the last week; and that the total contributions to this fund now amounted to £76,938 6s. 2d. It was arranged that certain districts should be more strictly canvassed, and that deputations should hereafter be appointed for that purpose.

Meeting on the Ten Hours Factory Bill at Huddersfield.—A very large meeting of the inhabitants of Huddersfield was held in the Philosophical Hall of that town, on Monday evening last, for the purpose of expressing their opinions on the Ten Hours Factory Bill. At least 2000 persons were present. All passed off very tranquilly, and the meeting was very enthusiastic in favour of the immediate adoption of a Ten Hours Bill

Death from Cutting the Toe Nails.—One day last week, as Ebenezer Harris, Esq., who was many years a partner in the firm of Richard Hunt and Co., iron merchants, Bristol, and was well known as a commercial traveller in the western counties and South Wales, was cutting his toe nails, he let the knife slip, which produced blood; mortification and lock-jaw ensued, and he died at his residence in Bristol, on Saturday last. Mr. Harris was in his fifty fourth year.

A Man Stung to Death.—Yesterday week an inquest was held at Hemsby Suffolk, on the body of Mr. Palmer, a miller, in that village, who a few days before had, while employed in his garden, accidentally overturned a skep of bees. The insects attacked the intruder, and stung him so dreadfully, that he died a short time afterwards. The jury found a verdict accordingly.

THE MARKETS.

[illegible] We have had very little English wheat here since Monday A portion of that day's supply was on sale to-day, hence the trade was in a very inactive state, and the quotations suffered a further decline of 1s per quarter, without a clearance being effected. Free foreign wheat was freely offered, at the late depression, but the business passing in it was very trifling. Some sales were made in bonded wheats for shipment to France at fair quotations The best malting barley sold at full prices, but the middling [illegible] rior kinds—owing to the influx of foreign—were 1s per quarter cheaper. The supply of malt was small, yet sales were effected, at previous quotations. Oats, beans, and peas all dull at Monday's [illegible]

Smithfield (Friday). There were on sale here, to-day, 430 Dutch, and 30 Spanish beasts, [illegible] y in fair condition. The numbers of home-fed beasts were moderate: while the primest Scots, &c., moved off steadily at full prices; but all other kinds commanded very little attention. The supply of sheep being very small, the mutton trade was active, at extreme currencies, and at which a good clearance was effected [illegible] calves a steady business was doing, at an advance in the quotations of 2d per 8lb. The pork trade was firm but without alteration in value. Milch cows were very dull, at from £16 to £18 each, including their small [illegible]

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

In the last number of the Illustrated News a rise in the price of money was stated as being highly probable. The fact has proved the justice of the supposition. Money has advanced during the week nearly one half per cent., and the discount brokers are now asking a higher price for accommodation than the Bank of England In Hamburg, discounts are 5½ to 6 per cent. In Amsterdam £5 per cent. Money in Berlin is so scarce that two thirds of the proprietors of Railway Stock are unable to meet the calls, and in Paris, the Railway Market is in the same state of depression that existed here last November and December. The operation of these circumstances on our Money Market may be briefly stated. Bills from the cities where money is scarce will be sent here for discount, or as security for advances. The remittances must be made in gold, as the demand for bills on the several places will exceed the amount due from debtors in such places to the English merchants. As soon as the gold begins to flow outward the circulation of the Bank of England must be contracted, as it is based upon the bullion in its coffers. To prevent such an event, the Directors usually resort to raising the rate of discount, thus making the value of money here assimilate closely to the price abroad. The effect produced is an immediate rise in the Money Market generally, and a corresponding depression in all description of stock and securities [illegible]ess in the English House during the week has been almost exclusively c[illegible]ned to bonâ fide investments on the part of the public. These investments being met by a scarcity of stock, the price of Consols has risen about one-eighth per cent., although the general feeling of the market is in favour of depression Exchequer Bills have not varied in price, remaining at 11s. to 14s. pm. Bank Stock is good at 205⅞ No circumstance worthy of record has occurred beyond the trifling rise alluded to, and the market closes at the following prices:—Bank Stock, 205½; Three per Cent. Reduced Annuities, 93⅛: Three per Cent. Consols Annuities, 94¾; New Three-and-a Quarter per Cent. Annuities, 95⅝, Long Annuities to expire, 9⅞; Ditto 30 years, 10 3-16; India Bonds, £1,000, [illegible]; Ditto under £1,000, 19; South Sea Annuities, 94⅝; Consols for Account, 94⅞. Exchequer Bills, £1,000 1½d, 14 pm., Ditto, £500, 14 pm.; Ditto, Small, 14 pm.

Transactions in the Foreign House still continue very limited. Mexican improved on Monday about ½ per cent. The rise has been attributed to Santa Anna's determination of vigorously repelling the Americans, as well as the difficulties of the latter in advancing so far into an hostile country, and which every day seems likely to increase. Spanish has rather declined, but the bargains done have been very few, and to only a very limited amount. Portuguese remains at about last week's prices. In the remaining portion of the Foreign Securities no marked alteration has occurred, and the prices subjoined are the last bargains transacted. Granada Bonds, One per Cent, 20; Mexican, Five per Cent, Account, [illegible]; Portuguese Bonds, Four per Cent, Account, 38½; Spanish Five per Cent, Account, 26½; Venezuela Bonds, Two per Cent, 40; Dutch, Two and-a-Half per Cent, 5[illegible]; Ditto, Four per Cent Certificates, 92.

The Share Market opened actively and considerable business was transacted at the beginning of the week. Fluctuations have occurred in Oxford and Birminghams, in consequence of an engagement, it is said, having been entered into by the Great Western to purchase the line at ten guineas premium per Share of £20 payment to be made six months after the completion of the line, and 4 per cent. to be allowed on Calls. Towards the close of business, some flatness was perceptible in Scrips, but the dividend-paying lines were well supported. Eastern Counties Stock improved, upon the result of the Special Meeting, held on Thursday. The Old Shares are to be converted into £20 Shares, upon a payment of £1 4s each, and take dividends upon the increased amount after the 4th of December. Seven per cent. is stated to be the rate of the next dividend. The accompanying list contains the prices of the lines last dealt in:—Aberdeen, 18½; Ambergate, Nottingham, Boston, and Eastern Junction, 2[illegible]; Birmingham and Dudley, 6 pm.; Birmingham and Gloucester, 128½; Birmingham and Oxford Junction, 8⅝; Caledonian, 24[illegible]; Ditto Half Shares, 2¼; Cornwall, [illegible]; Direct Northern, 1⅞; Eastern Counties, 22⅝; Ditto New, 7⅝ pm.; Ditto No. Extension, 3⅝; East Lancashire, 18⅝, Ditto New, 9; Edinburgh and Glasgow, 75; Ditto [illegible] ½; Exeter, Yeovil, and Dorset, 3½; Great Western Quarter Shares, 19; Ditto Fifths, 31; Hull and Selby, 107½; Ipswich and Bury St. Edmund's, [illegible] Leeds and Bradford, 75; Leeds, Dewsbury, &c., 33½; Leeds and Thirsk, 15; Liverpool, Manchester, and Newcastle Junction. 2[illegible]; London and Blackwall, 8. London, Brighton, and South Coast, 59⅝; London and North Western, 197; Ditto Quarters, 23½; Ditto Ditto, New Shares, 15½; London and South Western, 67; Ditto New, 30; London and York, Half Shares, 1⅛; London, Salisbury, and Yeovil, 1; Lynn and Ely, 16; Manch. and Leeds ½ Shares, 48; Do Fifths, 8½; Do. Selby, 88; Do. Extension, 41⅝; Do. Preference, 11¼; Do. East and West Riding Extension, 21¾; Boulogne and Amiens, 14⅝; Direct Bombay and Madras, ¾; Dutch Rhenish, 5⅝; East Indian, ⅜; Louvain à la Sambre, 1⅞; Namur and Liege, 3¼; Northern of France Constituted, 11⅛; Orleans and Bordeaux, 7¾; Paris and Lyons Constituted, 5[illegible]. Paris and Strasbourg Constituted, 3⅝; Sambre and Meuse, 4⅝

Saturday Morning.—Consols were flat yesterday, at a decline of ⅛ per cent.: 94⅝ ¾ for Money and Time were the closing quotations. The Foreign Market was inanimate; Portuguese was a shade firmer. Eastern Counties Shares were buoyant, and Caledonians were firm. Eastern Counties are 22⅝; Caledonians, 24.

FIRST PRINCIPLES OF SYMMETRICAL BEAUTY. By D. R. HAY. With ONE HUNDRED ILLUSTRATIVE PLATES.—"This is a grammar of pure form, in which the elements of Symmetrical, as distinguished from Picturesque beauty are demonstrated, by reducing the outlines or planes of curvilinear and rectilinear forms to their origin in the principles of geometrical proportion. In thus analysing symmetry of outline in natural and artificial objects, Mr Hay determines the fixed principles of beauty in positive shape, and shows how beautiful forms may be reproduced and infinitely varied with mathematical precision. Hitherto, the originating and copying of beautiful contours have been alike empirical; the production of a new design for a vase or jug has been a matter of chance between the eye and the hand; and the copying of a Greek moulding or ornament a merely mechanical process. By a series of problems, Mr. Hay places both the invention and the imitation of beautiful forms on a sure basis of science; giving to the faculty of original minds a clue to the evolving of new and elegant shapes, in which the infinite resources of nature are made subservient to the uses of art. The volume is illustrated by one hundred diagrams, beautifully executed, that serve to explain the text, and suggest new ideas of beauty of contour in common objects. To designers of pottery, hardware, and architectural ornament, this work is particularly valuable; but artists of every kind, and workmen of intelligence, will find it of great utility."—Spectator, October 31.

NOTICE!! BERDOE'S WATERPROOF PALLIUM, and other OVER-COATS for the WINTER, may now be had at his NEW ESTABLISHMENT, 96, New Bond-street (near Oxford-street), just opened; also, as usual, at the City Ware-rooms, 69, Cornhill (north side.) At both Establishments will be found a large and superior stock of first rate Outside Garments adapted to every purpose, and guaranteed to exclude any rain whatever (or made to order at a day's notice). The PALLIUM is a universally admired garment, recently introduced by W. B.; and well adapted for the present weather. The long-established reputation of W. B.'s well known Waterproof Overcoats renders (it is presumed) any recommendation now unnecessary; they unquestionably continue the most permanently popular garment ever invented.

FEATHER BEDS PURIFIED by STEAM.—HEAL and SON have just completed the erection of machinery for the PURIFYING of FEATHERS on a new principle, by which the offensive properties of the quill are evaporated and carried off in steam, thereby not only are the impurities of the feather itself entirely removed, but they are rendered quite free from the unpleasant smell of the stove, which all new feathers are subject to that are dressed in the ordinary way.

OLD BEDS redressed by this process are perfectly freed from all impurities; and, by expanding the feathers, the bulk is greatly increased, and consequently the bed rendered much softer.

The following are the present prices of new feathers:—

Mixed	1s. 0d. per lb.	Best Foreign Grey Goose ..	2s. 0d. per lb.
Grey Goose	1s. 4d.	Best Irish White ditto ..	2s. 6d.
Foreign ditto ..	1s. 8d.	Best Dantzic ditto	3s. 0d.

ART-UNION.—TO PRINTSELLERS, GILDERS, &c.—C. F. BIELEFELD, having obtained her Majesty's Royal Letters Patent for Manufacturing Picture Frames by Machinery, begs to announce that Specimens, unique in design and perfect in execution, will be ready for inspection the second week in December. The Patent Frames, which are adapted for Art-Union and other Prints, Oil Paintings, &c. &c., may be had complete, or in lengths of twelve feet each, without join, prepared for gilding, or finished in a variety of styles. And, although the perfection and delicacy of the work are such as to defy even the remotest competition, yet, in Price, they will be found lower than the commonest wood frames now in use. Of this some idea may be formed from the fact that a beautiful frame, prepared for the forthcoming Art-Union Print, measuring more than nine feet, will be produced for about 7s. 6d.—Papier Mâché Works, 15, Wellington-street North, Strand.

ROWLAND'S ODONTO, or Pearl Dentifrice; a white Powder for the Teeth, compounded of the choicest and most recherché ingredients of the Oriental herbal. It extirpates all tartarous adhesions to the teeth, and ensures a pearl-like whiteness to the enamelled surface. The breath, also, from the salubrious and disinfecting qualities of the Odonto, attains a sweetness and fragrance truly grateful to its possessor. Its invaluable properties have obtained its selection by the Court and Royal Family of Great Britain, and the Sovereigns and Nobility throughout Europe, while the general demand for it at once announces the favour in which it is universally held. Price 2s. 9d. per box.

CAUTION.—To protect the public from fraud, the Government Stamp, with "A. ROWLAND and SON, 20, Hatton Garden," engraved thereon, is affixed on each box. All others are fraudulent counterfeits!

SOLICITORS.—Messrs. Palmer, France, and Palmer, Bedford-row.
MEDICAL REFEREES.—Marshall Hall, M.D., F.R.S., Alexander Anderson, Esq., F.R.C.S.
By the Act of Parliament [illegible] by the Company, it is expressly conditioned that the liability of the Shareholders under the Policies shall not be restricted by special contract, or [illegible].

INSURANCES AGAINST FIRE are undertaken on property of every description in the United Kingdom, the British Colonies, and in Foreign Countries.

LIFE INSURANCE.—Two scales of premiums, the one being MUCH LOWER THAN USUAL, securing the amount of the policy, without any addition; the other, lower than the participating scales generally adopted by Companies offering uncertain bonuses, and CARRYING GUARANTEED ADDITIONS on a plan entirely new and peculiar to this Institution.

BY THIS NEW PLAN the insured becomes entitled, after ten payments, to a fixed annual bonus, according to his age at the date of the insurance; and, at the end of each period of ten years, every policy, until its amount be doubled, will be increased, upon the system of the Equitable Society, by the addition, for every year it has existed, of a STIPULATED SUM.

Thus, a policy for £1000 on the life of a person aged 40 years will be subject to an annual premium of £32 14s. 6d.; and at the end of 10 years, it will represent £1101 13s. 4d., of 20 years, £1305, of 30 years, £1010, and of 40 years, £2000. But, should the death occur between two decennial periods—say, at the expiration of 25 years—the sum payable under the policy having been further increased by annual additions since the 20th year, will be £1355 16s. 8d.
ALEXANDER ROBERTSON, Resident Secretary.

EAST INDIA TEA COMPANY, (Offices, No. 9, Great St. Helen's Churchyard, Bishopsgate).—Six Pounds of good useful TEA are still sold for [illegible] or 2s. 6d. a pound; other sorts, 2s. 10d., 3s. 6d., and 3s. 10d. Coffee, 9d., 1s., and 1s. 3d.

TONIC ALE.—This splendid new description of Bottled Beer is now in high perfection. It is strongly recommended by the Faculty as possessing peculiar stomachic qualities, promoting appetite, &c. Sold in quart and pint bottles, secured by Betts's Patent Capsule. JOSEPH STOCKTON, Sole Agent, 51, Lamb's Conduit-street.

Also, a large stock of English Stays of the best description. Depôt for the above, Mrs. FLANAGAN'S, 35, Bishop-street, Londonderry.

DANCING TAUGHT, in the most fashionable style, by Mr. WILLIS, 41, Brewer-street, Golden-square. Private Lessons in the Polka, Cellarius Valse, and Valse à Deux Temps, at all hours, to Ladies and Gentlemen of any age wishing privacy and expedition. An Evening Class on Monday and Friday. A Juvenile Class on Wednesday and Saturday. Terms may be had on application as above.

DOUBLE-ACTION HARP by ERARD, a Great Bargain.—A splendid DOUBLE-ACTION HARP, nearly new, richly decorated, warranted in every respect. Price, for cash, only Forty-two Guineas (the property of a deceased Lady). To be seen at H. R. WILCOCKE'S, 61, London-road, Southwark, nine doors from the Elephant and Castle end.

PIANOFORTES.—The cheapest house in London to purchase these first-rate instruments is at H. TOLKIEN'S, manufacturer, 28, King William-street, London-bridge. H. T. having completed his extensive alterations, begs his friends to view his splendid stock of PIANOS, which is not to be equalled by any maker, and at about half the price charged by them. H. T.'s much admired piccolos, cash price £25. Old instruments taken in exchange.—TOLKIEN, 28, King William-street, London-bridge.

JONES' £4 4s. SILVER LEVER WATCHES are selling at the Manufactory, 338, Strand, opposite Somerset House. They comprise every modern improvement, and are warranted not to vary more than half a minute per week. The great reduction of price at once sets aside all rivalry, either of the Swiss manufacturers or any other house. On receipt of a Post-office Order payable to John Jones for £4 5s., one will be sent free.—Read Jones' Sketch of Watchwork, sent free for a Twopenny Stamp.

THE SEVENTH THOUSAND of the PATENT PORTABLE VENTILATING SUSPENSION STOVE is now on Sale, although it is the beginning of but the third season. It is the distinguishing merit of this admirable invention, that it purifies the surrounding atmosphere, and serves to ventilate the apartment which it warms. It is adapted for the smallest Chambers, as well as the Hall and the Church. From 40s. upwards. Prospectuses forwarded to all parts of the Kingdom. Four or five Stoves are in operation daily at GEORGE and JOHN DEANE'S Warehouses, Show Rooms, and Manufactories, opening to the Monument, 46, King William-street, London Bridge.

WINDOW BLINDS.—TYLOR and PACE having recently opened their new Establishment, No. 3, Queen-street, City, three doors from Cheapside, invite the attention of the public generally to their extensive assortment of every description of WINDOW BLINDS, consisting of Venetian Blinds, Painted Transparencies, Spring and Roller Blinds, Wove Wire, and Patent Zinc Blinds, and Outside Shades and Sun Blinds in every variety. All departments of the manufacture being conducted on their own premises, TYLOR and PACE are enabled to supply the above at very reduced prices. Wholesale and export orders executed on the lowest terms.

GENTLEMEN'S TOUPEES, SUPERSEDING WIGS.—The Toupée is intended for those who have good hair at the sides and back of the head, with paucity above the whiskers, and are compelled to wear a covering only from their susceptibility to cold at that most vulnerable part, the crown; the Toupée leaving the head free from the night-cap band of the wig. J. DICK, Practical Wig-Maker, 11, King-street, Cheapside.—Milne's Crystallised Hair Dye, in one bottle, is the only liquid dye that effectually changes grey hair to a permanent mouse brown, or black, in ten minutes. It cannot stain the skin, and is utterly free from that offensive effluvium and deposit peculiar to other dyes. Sold in bottles, at 5s. and 10s. each. N.B. Agent for Johann Grossmith's Eau de Cologne.

TO LADIES.—DELCROIX'S KALYDOR, a French Cosmetic, surpassing all others for preserving and beautifying the complexion, prepared for the use of her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen and her Majesty the Queen Dowager, by special command, and protected by letters patent. It effectually dissipates all redness, tan, pimples, spots, freckles, discolorations, and other unsightly cutaneous visitations. The radiant [illegible] it imparts to the cheek, the softness and delicacy which it induces on the hands, arms, and neck, render it indispensable to every toilet.—Ask for "Delcroix's Kalydor," 158, New Bond-street. All others are fraudulent imitations.

BUTLER'S VEGETABLE TOOTH-POWDER has now been in general use by the public, and as an appendage to the fashionable toilet for fully half a century. It was originally prepared (according to the direction of an eminent physician) of vegetable substances, without the admixture of any pernicious ingredient, so as to impart firmness and a beautiful redness to the gums, sweetness to the breath, and a delicate whiteness to the teeth; at the same time, by its regular daily use, preserving them from decay, and preventing the toothache. These distinguishing characteristics have procured for it the approbation of the Royal Family, and the most distinguished personages in the United Kingdom.—Prepared and sold by BUTLER and HARDING, Chemists, No. 4, Cheapside, corner of St. Paul's, London; and may be obtained of J. Sanger, 150, Oxford-street; Davenport and S[illegible], 20, Waterloo-place, Edinburgh, and of most Druggists and Perfumers in the United Kingdom, in boxes, at 2s. 9d. each.

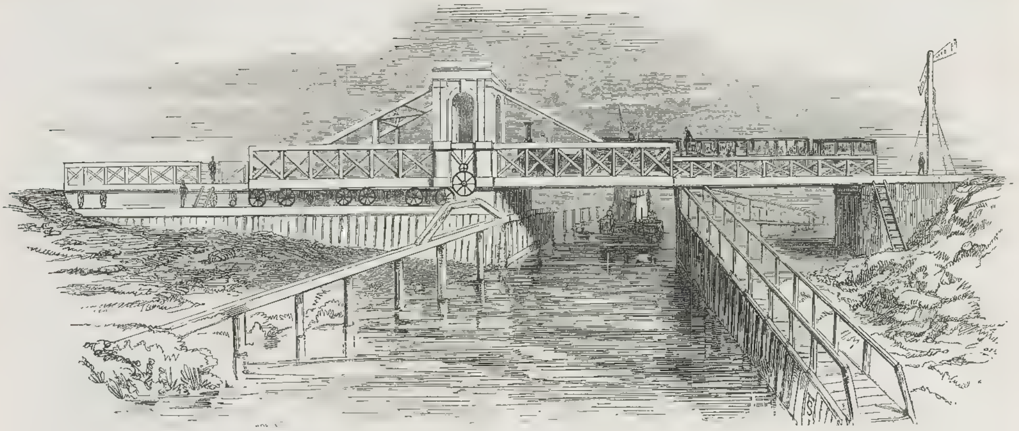
THE BRITISH COLLEGE OF HEALTH, New-road, London, are now in possession of upwards of 500,000 cases of cures effected by MORISON'S PILLS, which amply prove the truth of the Hygeian or Morisonian system of Medicine, viz., that all diseases arise from an impurity in the blood.



RAILWAY DRAWBRIDGE OVER THE ARUN, CALLED "THE TELESCOPE BRIDGE."—(CLOSED.)

TIMBER DRAWBRIDGE CARRYING THE BRIGHTON AND CHICHESTER RAILWAY ACROSS THE RIVER ARUN.

THIS Drawbridge (popularly, though not very appropriately, called the Telescope Bridge) was constructed to meet the requirements of the Lords of the Admiralty, who have the jurisdiction of the River Arun, over which the Bridge is built, it being required that the Bridge should be capable of leaving a clear space, when open, of the unusual width of sixty feet, for the passage of vessels navigating the river, which is a larger opening by many feet than any drawbridge hitherto constructed.

This Bridge, with the exception of the machinery for moving it, is constructed entirely of timber, and consists of two strongly trussed frames or platforms, one of which moves laterally or sideways; the other, or principal trussed framing, moves back to the extent of sixty-three feet, when the Bridge is opened, and occupies the space vacated by the first-mentioned moveable platform.

The principal trussed moveable framing is 144 feet long, 35 feet high, and weighs about 70 tons; it is supported by and traverses upon fourteen friction wheels, each six feet in diameter, and is easily moved by suitable wheels and pinions, acting on a fixed rack underneath the Bridge; two men and a boy readily opening the Bridge in from four to five minutes.

The total length of the Bridge is 273 feet, and the clear width is 12 feet; it is constructed for a single line of rails, but the Railway on either side has a double line.

From the great length of the moveable timber framing, it was requisite that it should be so braced and supported, that it should not change its shape, or become depressed at the end, when moved away from its point of support on the opposite pier. This object has been effectually accomplished by means of suspending slings and adjusting screws, by the use of which latter the whole framing can always be kept in perfect adjustment, although the extreme end of the framing overhangs upwards of 60 feet from the wheels on which it moves.

The strength of the work was severely tested before the opening of the line, both by Major-General Pasley and Colonel Codrington, the Inspectors-General of Railways; two of the heaviest engines and tenders being placed upon the Bridge, they expressed themselves perfectly satisfied with the result of the trial.

The Bridge was designed by J. U. Rastrick, Esq., F.R.S., the Engineer-in-Chief of the Line, and does credit to the careful workmanship of Mr. Butt, of Littlehampton, the contractor for the work.

SPEED ON THE NARROW GAUGE.—It is stated that a few days ago one of Mr. Robert Stephenson's outside cylinder engines, with six feet driving-wheels, took a train of eleven carriages, weighing about 55 tons, over the London and North Western line between Leighton and Tring—viz, nine miles in twelve minutes. This gives an average speed of 45 miles per hour, and seven of the nine miles must have been travelled over at upwards of sixty miles per hour.

THE LATE MR. OWEN'S BEQUEST.—It is stated, on the authority of one of the trustees, that the full amount of Mr. Owen's bequest for the foundation of a college near Manchester, will be about £100,000.

ACCIDENT ON THE BIRMINGHAM AND DERBY RAILWAY.—A few days ago, a rather serious accident occured on the above railway near Burton-on-Trent. At the spot where this casualty took place, the line crosses a canal upon the level by means of a swing bridge, and as the train to Birmingham approached it, a barge was passing along. Before the bridge could be turned to its proper position, the train was up, and the engine dashed across the canal and embedded itself in the opposite bank, the tender being dragged along with it. The engineer and the stoker jumped off, and escaped unhurt; but the guard sustained serious injuries. A second-class carriage next the tender was smashed to atoms; fortunately it did not contain passengers, and the other carriages escaped with a violent concussion, which alarmed the passengers, but not one sustained any injury. A messenger was sent fifty yards down the line to warn the engine-driver of the danger, but, although the engine was instantly reversed, and the breaks put on, the attempt to stop the train was ineffectual. The other trains were delayed for several hours. Mr. Commissioner Balguy was in the train, on his way to the Bankruptcy Court, and the cause of his non-arrival was communicated by means of the electric telegraph.

ALARMING RAILWAY ACCIDENT.—On Sunday night last an accident of a dreadful character took place on the Lancaster and Carlisle Railway, near Kendal, which is likely to terminate in fatal consequences. A party of sub-contractors and other persons engaged on the line had gone on a pleasure trip to Shap, a distance of about sixteen miles, to celebrate the completion of the railway, and for that purpose procured two engines belonging to the Company, entirely without their consent. On returning, one of the engines went on in front, and arriving at its destination first, was incautiously left standing on the rails when the second engine arrived. A collision ensued, which dashed the first engine to atoms, and dreadfully injured those parties who were on the latter, who were thrown off in all directions. One man, Smith, was dashed into the furnace of the engine, and dreadfully scorched and otherwise injured, so that no hope remains of his recovery. Another person had his thigh lacerated, and others were injured to a great extent. The engineer has absconded.

THE NEW RAILWAY OFFICE.

On Monday the new Railway Commissioners opened their office in Great George-street, Westminster, and began to act in execution of the statute of last Session, where specifications, &c., for intended bills in the next Session must be delivered by the end of the present month. The Commissioners are the Hon. Edward Strutt, M.P. (Chief Commissioner), Earl Granville, Sir E. Ryan, and Captain H. R. Brandreth. Her Majesty was empowered by the Act to appoint five Commissioners, but only four have been gazetted. The second section provides that from and after the day which shall be so specified in the Gazette (Monday last) as the day on which the said Commissioners shall begin to act in execution of the statute, all the powers, rights, and authority vested in or exercised by the Board of Trade under any Act with respect to any railway or intended railway, shall be transferred to and vested in and exercised by the Commissioners of Railways, as fully as if they had been named in the said several Acts of Parliament, and all the provisions of the said Acts shall be deemed to apply to the said Commissioners, instead of the Board of Trade.

OPENING OF THE CARLISLE EXTENSION RAILWAY.—The extension of the Carlisle Railway, from the temporary station at Scotswood-road to the Forth, at Newcastle, took place yesterday week, when the Directors, the Mayor, Sheriff, several members of the Corporation, the Town Clerk, John Adamson, Esq., John Challoner, Esq., and a large number of gentlemen connected with the town, proceeded a short distance along the line westward, by special train, and returned to the Forth Banks. The whole length of the part opened was crowded by the spectators, who loudly cheered as the train moved along.

MR. HUDSON, M.P., LORD MAYOR OF YORK.—It appears, from an article in the Yorkshire Gazette of Saturday, that Mr. Hudson has consented to become once more Lord Mayor of York.

ELECTION OF THE MAYOR OF BIRMINGHAM.—On Monday, Robert Martineau, Esq., brass-founder, was unanimously elected Mayor of Birmingham. Mr. Martineau is brother to Harriet Martineau, the celebrated writer.

THE NEW GOVERNOR OF BOMBAY.—On Wednesday a Court of Directors was held at the East India house, when Mr. George Russell Clerk was unanimously appointed Governor of the Presidency of Bombay.

THE ANDOVER UNION.—Two large Parliamentary blue books have just been printed, containing the report and the evidence taken before the Select Committee of the House of Commons on the Andover Union Inquiry, in the late session. The evidence extends to nearly 1800 folio pages, which, with the report, an analysis of the evidence, and an index, form two bulky volumes, printed by order of the House of Commons. In last week's paper we gave an interesting article upon Poor Law Unions, with illustrations.

THE SERIOUS ACCIDENT ON THE EASTERN COUNTIES RAILWAY.—It appears that in the action for damages brought by Mr. Cotton, the late Governor of the Bank, against the Eastern Counties Railway, for injuries sustained in the memorable accident of the 18th of July last, the Company have allowed judgment to go by default. Under this course the damages will simply be assessed in the Sheriff's Court, and the Company will escape the exposure of their negligence, which would have taken place upon the whole subject being brought before a jury. In proceeding for damages Mr. Cotton characteristically stated his intention to hand over to a public charity whatever amount might be awarded to him

IMPROVEMENTS.

COULD we make a list of the errors and blunders committed in Acts of Parliament (supposing the task to be possible), it would be an almost incredible display of the disastrous results of employing a language in the framing of our statutes which is not English, and disdains allegiance to the grammar; our laws are written in a jargon never employed in any branch of human affairs save that which lawyers take under their management; sometimes, and these are favourable cases, they understand it themselves; but often it cannot be understood by them or any one else. Thus, Acts to "amend and explain" another Act, abound throughout the statute-book, the explaining and supplementary portion being frequently the more unintelligible of the two. The omissions, contradictions, and inconsistencies arising from this cause are countless, and have repeatedly defeated the very specific object for which an Act was passed.

But legislators have other omissions to answer for, which are even less excusable, since they must be deliberate and intentional; a Bill with a sounding title is proposed, and all the world is led to expect something great as the effect of it; we examine the Act, and it is full of exceptions and exclusions, which narrow the field of its operation so much as to render it almost a matter of indifference whether it is passed or not.

Lord Lincoln's Act, proposed in the last Session, for the Improvement and Drainage of Towns, is a more than usually striking instance of omission, from what should be a general measure, of the places where it would be most useful and is the most required. It is not yet a statute, having only been proposed for the sake of testing opinion upon it; and it is to be hoped a general expression of dissatisfaction will lead whatever Government may be in power to give it more purpose and efficacy; as it stands, it is not worth passing. It is scarcely credible that, from this measure, Scotland and Ireland are expresaly excluded, and, still more significant, the City of London!

In this, we have an old evil over again; from every measure that touches, in order to improve, other places, the City of London is always exempted. Can any reason be given why, of all the Cities of England, the Metropolis should be exempted from regulation in such matters? Those who "are whole need not a physician;" can perfect soundness and health be ascribed to any of the many authorities who parcel out the City between them, and do, and, what is worse, undo pretty much as they choose? The great Leviathan always seems to escape the net of those fishers of men who sweep all the rest of the world into the shallows where they become the prey of taxation or any other development of legislative activity. In all other places, municipal reform has changed the face of things: London bids it defiance: the power of Parliament that can bind three Kingdoms, stops at Temple-bar. When Kings were needy, and merchants fed the Royal Exchequer for the sake of what they could extort from Kingly favour, there was a semblance of excuse for these exemptions; they were bought and paid for. But now that the City pays but its quota to the common revenue, has ceased to furnish either "aids," "benevolences," or "gifts," comes forward with no millions for Princesses' dowers or Princes' ransoms, and pays its Income-Tax just as grudgingly as any other part of the Island, we cannot see why it should be a sort of tabooed district, not to be touched by the House of Commons. It cannot be left, in the middle of the Metropolis, a sanctuary of abuses, which authority is strangling everywhere else. And, because the exemption of the City seems growing into a legislative precedent, gradually extending, till an Act for the Improvement of Towns is proposed which actually excludes the entire Metropolis, we take the opportunity of protesting against the practice generally, and as carried out in Lord Lincoln's bill in particular.

This measure has been ably analysed by a Committee of the "Health of Towns Association," and their Report points out many defects even as to what it undertakes to do; but the immense mass of business which it leaves untouched, by omitting London alone, is enough to reduce its value as a practical measure to something little more than nominal. No place is so afflicted with a variety of companies and corporations as the Metropolis. Paving Boards, Commissioners of Sewers, Water Companies, all severally and separately tear up the bowels of the City at their own will and pleasure, without the least concert or agreement. Every district has its separate board or authority, perfect nests of jobbing and small intrigues, of which the public know nothing, save by the payment of heavy rates for mismanaged works. While placing these things under one system of control in the provinces, why should similar abuses, ranker from the richness of the soil, be allowed to flourish in the capital?

Neither with improvements on the surface or beneath it will the Government interfere; it leaves all to private enterprise, which, in some things, is better than official supervision; but, nevertheless, it has evils of its own which should not be forgotten. In the first place, anything done by a company, being done only for profit, fixes a tax on the public for long terms of years, or in perpetuity: thus are created monopolies too powerful for public opinion to control, though they may grossly abuse the powers they have received. To give as little as possible to the community, and to extort as much as possible from them, is, with rare exceptions, the rule of all Corporations to which the State has delegated the power of taxation; and the demand of a board or a company may be as oppressive, and as little to be resisted, as the ukase of an Autocrat. The competition of a rival company is the only effectual check upon them, a remedy always difficult, sometimes impossible. The public pays at least twenty millions annually to private companies, over which neither the public, nor the Legislature, nor the Crown have, or exercise any control! In this fact lies a question of vast importance; one that will soon attract more attention than has yet been paid to it. It is not, then, with unqualified approval we witness the creation of new toll-taking and taxing companies, for the purpose of carrying out some improvements that might be easily and safely effected by the State, from the National Funds. Railways, at present, absorb nearly all this kind of speculation; but, as the surface of these Kingdoms is but a limited quantity, the day must come when every possible railroad will be made; what will be the next direction of capital? Foreign Loans are at a discount; Pennsylvania, Spain, and Mexico have cured John Bull of that delusion; Foreign Mines are little or no better; the money that has been, in every sense of the word, sunk in them, rarely comes out again. If another war, then, should not engulph and swallow up the accumulated wealth of Europe in the next generation or so, capital will probably find its employment in improving the means of living; it has created a new mode of communication, but that is only one of the things possible and desirable. At the present moment, something is being done in this way; for instance:

A Company has undertaken to rid London of the nuisance of Holborn Hill, by building a viaduct for the traffic; it is inconceivable such an annoyance should have existed so long, among men who constructed the Great Western Railway; but there it is, as monstrous an evil as ever. It will be a blessing to get rid of it anyhow, but the toll to be "levied by Act of Parliament," will be an abatement of the satisfaction.

A Company is forming to establish public Slaughter-houses in the outskirts of London, to prevent a practice which is not known in any other large city in Europe—one both dangerous and disgusting. As the City of London has a vested interest in this practice, of course it will oppose the plan tooth and nail; and as, according to Lord Lansdowne, the Legislature is determined to maintain the "privileges and immunities" of the City, it will perhaps succeed in "putting it down," as it has done similar good and reasonable plans on other occasions.

Another Company is going to purify the Thames, by catching the sewerage of its southern bank, and extracting from it the solid matter that will serve for manure. The City being "Conservator of the Thames," and to all appearance liking to preserve it in its richest state of mud and filthiness, will, probably, oppose this plan too, as an infringement on its "immunities."

Another Bridge is to be built over the river, also by a new Company, and also, of course, with a toll. Southwark Bridge is little used: Waterloo Bridge, for many years, was useless—most of its traffic even now is derived from the stoppage of its neighbour at Westminster. Build a Bridge without a main line of approach to it, and levy a toll for crossing, and all that ingenuity can do to make it useless is effected: it is a favourite plan in England.

And all this is going on in the Metropolis, to say nothing of the "City Improvements," hurried through the Common Council without consideration, and condemned by the only public meeting yet held upon them: still, with all this mass of confusion, immense expenditure, and mismanagement, there is no attempt made to establish supervision, regulation, or control.

MARIA II., QUEEN OF PORTUGAL.

Donna Maria del Gloria-Jeanne-Charlotte-Leopoldine-Isidore-da Cruz-Francoise-Xaviere-da Paula-Micaela-Gabriela Rafaela-Louisa-Gonzaga-de Braganza, Queen of Portugal, is the daughter of Don Pedro, late Emperor of Brazil, and Princess Leopoldine, daughter of Francis I., Emperor of Austria. She was born in Brazil, on the 4th of April, 1819; on the death of John VI., of Portugal, in 1825, Maria was selected as the bride of Don Miguel and successor to the Portuguese Throne. She accordingly sailed from the Brazils, in July, 1828, accompanied by the Marquis of Berberena, and landed at Cadiz; but here she learned the detestable character of Don Miguel—his horrible atrocities and his unpopularity with the people. The alliance was broken off, and the young Princess sailed for England, where she remained till August, 1829, when, with the Princess Amelie of Leuchtenberg, she returned to Rio Janeiro. Her father, as Emperor of Brazil, had declared his state independent of Portugal; and on the death of John he could not inherit the European crown, but he made over his right to it to Donna Maria, and fought stoutly through the civil war against his brother Miguel, in support of his daughter's claim. By the assistance of England and France, his party was successful: the character of Miguel was against him; and Don Pedro was a man of considerable talent, improved by education. On the expulsion of Don Miguel, Maria was declared Queen. Don Pedro died the 24th of September, 1834.

In 1835, her Majesty married the Duke of Leuchtenberg (eldest son of Eugene Beauharnais), who, however, died only a few weeks afterwards, leaving the Royal bride a widow. She gave her hand, in a second alliance, to Prince Ferdinand of Saxe Coburg Gotha, on the 9th April, 1836. Their Majesties have five children; their names at length would occupy half a column; the custom of giving such a string of patronymics to the members of the Royal Family is carried to a greater excess in Portugal than in any other Court in Europe. The Queen is at this moment engaged in a struggle with her people, by which her very crown is perilled. The rebellion may be considered as a continuation of that popular movement by which the Cabrals were overthrown. The more liberal Ministry that succeeded them had not the confidence of the Court, and the Queen, generally believed to have been ill advised, dismissed it summarily. The heads of that Ministry took advantage of the public indignation, and placed themselves at the head of the armed mobs that have attacked the Royal troops, levied contributions, and committed other acts of violence. But, by the last accounts, the Royal forces appear to have checked the rebellion; the insurgents have sustained some serious defeats; the nobles who have joined the insurrection are deprived of their titles, and will be punished as traitors if taken; the peasants made prisoners in arms are shot after an inquiry by "three soldiers and a sergeant!" If the army remains faithful, the Queen may triumph; but the want of discretion that has plunged the country into such horrors cannot be too deeply deplored.

FERDINAND, KING OF PORTUGAL.

Ferdinand Augustus Francois Antoine, Prince of Saxe Coburg and Gotha, the King Consort of Portugal, was born October 29th, 1819. He is first cousin to his Royal Highness Prince Albert. On the death of the Prince of Leuchtenberg, he was married to Maria Segunda, April 9, 1836. The interest taken by the English Court in the present state of affairs in Portugal is proved by the fact that Colonel Wylde, Equerry to Prince Albert, has been dispatched [illegible] on a special mission which it is to be hoped may prove successful—to adjust the existing difference, and put a stop to the calamities of a civil war.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE

PARISIANA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Paris, Wednesday.

At last, the grand struggle of diplomatic rivals for the office of Ambassador to the Court of St. James, is definitively over for this year. At the weekly Evening Meeting at M. Guizot's, the Count de St. Aulaire announced he would be in London on the 25th instant. This will be woeful news to many! Madame de Flahaut must remain to be victimised by the witty Princess Metternich; the Duke de Montebello must continue to waste his genius on the macaronic Court where the home of every Ambassador, in spite of the peculiar notions of home political economy prevailing amongst the astute fraternity, is turned into a sort of hotel or caravansery, for the reception of their erratic countrymen—Lord Palmerston's brother, the amiable Mr. Temple, for twenty years British Minister to Naples, being alone privileged against the infliction, on account of his being a bachelor. As to M. Bresson, whose undying wish it has been for years to be Ambassador to England, the very service he has rendered his Court makes the prospect more distant than ever; and at Madrid, in his now scarce tenable office, he is doomed to sigh out, for a year or two more, "O quando te aspiciam!"

The very imminent fall of Marshal Soult as President of Council will give rise to another change. His son, the millionaire Marquis de Dalmatie, whose handsome wife has never consented to accompany him out of France, to make use of a French expression, principally shines at Berlin by his absence, to which he devotes nine months of his official year, and three months of residence in fine weather. Latterly, however, the King of Prussia has shown himself seriously hostile to France, commercially by custom-laws, politically by articles on the Spanish marriage in the Official Gazette. M. Guizot is, therefore, very anxious to have a representative less strikingly angelic in the length of intervals betwixt his visits, and he has thrown his eyes upon the young Duke de Glucksberg as the successor of the Marquis. When this nomination takes place a complete revolution will have been operated in the personnel of the diplomacy at Berlin, for Lord Westmoreland, the dilettante Tory, is said to have requested his recall by the Whig Government. His colleague, that great diplomatist, Baron de Meyerdorff, the Russian Minister, is about to be promoted, and Baron de Renduff, another Plenipotentiary, has already fled to another post.

M. de St. Aulaire's return to the Embassy in London, independent of the reproaches he may have to endure from Lord Palmerston as regards the Spanish affair, will be anything but unalloyed enjoyment to our mercurial diplomatists. To the indescribable annoyance of the French Court it has now been announced that the Duke de Bordeaux, who has addressed himself lately in such an infallible pecuniary form of charity to the feelings of France, intends, in the course of the ensuing spring, to visit London, in order to have an opportunity of presenting to his liegemen of France his bride, their rightful Queen! No doubt all possible diplomatic means will be employed to prevent so unpleasant a consummation, but there is already a recent example of failure of such efforts on record. In the meantime, on all sides the Carlist parties are in motion; the dethroned families are resuming the offensive game. Cabrera and Count de Montemolin, after being long hidden at the Earl of C———'s, through his Lordship's exertions abroad and at home, have procured £75,000 to begin their campaign at the first opportune moment. Don Miguel has awakened from his very appropriate slumbers amongst the ruins of empires at Rome, and Don Antonio Ribeira Saraiva, his former representative in England, weekly sends from London 20,000 proclamations to awaken the Miguelites to exertion in the present revolution in Portugal, from whence many statesmen have been daily expecting to hear that the Queen has embarked aboard the English fleet—an event that would involve diplomacy in new and most serious squabbles. In the meantime, on the recent Spanish affair, two distinguished English noblemen are very singularly engaged in Paris in advocating opposite sides of the present Spanish question at issue. But as Lord Normanby gives admirable parties, and still more admirable dinners, and Lord Brougham, although a very distinguished player at knife and fork, has not this attraction, the representative of your Sovereign is daily converting a greater number of our leading epicures.

French tragedy has unquestionably reached the year of its doom—Rachel, but just reconciled to her brethren at the Théâtre Français, has had such a fierce personal encounter on the stage itself with Beauvallet, that she will not be pacified. She has appealed personally to the Minister of Interior, and that worthy functionary, mesmerized by the soul-subduing eyes of the fair tragedian, in "fine frenzy rolling," is said to be about to overthrow that republic of actors, on equal terms governing themselves, which was so singularly established by the most despotic Sovereign that ever ruled over France. The other refuge of classic French tragedy, the Odéon, is not more fortunate; it has quarrelled with its chief tragedian, Mdlle. Araldi, who is at this very moment engaged in an action against the lessee, and against the young dramatist, Ponsard, to get the part of the heroine of the latter's new tragedy, Agnes de Merante, restored to her. Every other species of dramatic style is, however, at the present moment, triumphant in Paris. Compositions of every description are pouring forth as unceasingly as the waters under Molière's feet in the Rue Richelieu fountain. The only hitherto unsuccessful theatre, now with a new lessee—the Vaudeville—has given two successful pieces on successive nights; whilst the Porte St. Martin produces the first play with an Algerine plot ever brought out since the Conquest of Algiers, and written by a traveller and eye-witness—the celebrated feuilletonist, Theophile Gautier. The Théâtre Français, in high comedy, there thought to be extinct, is still more fortunate. It is doubly so: for the new triumphant comedy, "The Gordian Knot," a work of intellectual and moral elaboration, is written by a fair blue-stocking, and one nowise suspected of such latent maternity—Madame Casamayor.

Although Paris is filling more and more daily, barring one or two diplomatic réunions, at M. Guizot's, at Lord Normanby's, and elsewhere, there are but few parties. The most interesting I have attended was the soirée at M. and Mdme. Ancelot's, a married couple of authors, who have written more vaudevilles, comedies, and novels, than any parties in holy wedlock since the world was created. Their house, on this occasion, was thronged by all the most noted artists, writers, &c., in France—the few guests without celebrity formed striking exceptions: all the most celebrated books, plays, pictures, statues, and engravings, appeared to have become animated, and walking about the salons. In the meantime, concealed from the vulgar eye, the heroes of the Jockey Club are engaged in deep discussion of their important mysteries, and their most excursive campaigns. One result of their meditations alone has reached the ears of the public, and it is that there is a monster steeple chase to come off in April: engagements and bets, to the amount of 12,500 francs, took place on the very first evening this equestrian festival was decided upon. Of all the new amusements of our country, this is the most correctly figurative of the tendencies of our young men.

FRANCE

It is evident, from the tone of some of the Ministerial journals, that Louis Philippe is considerably annoyed at the idea that the young Duc de Bordeaux, the only remaining scion of the elder branch of the Bourbons, should have contracted a marriage with an Italian Princess, the more particularly as the marriage could not have taken place without the consent of Austria. Perhaps the unkindest cut of all is, that Prince Metternich, in answer to the questions of the French Ambassador, merely replied, that the affair appeared to have been very suddenly concluded, and that if any one had to complain, it was the Emperor, who had not been informed of the matter till the event was on the eve of taking place. It will be remembered, that this Italian Prince was the only Sovereign in Europe who refused to acknowledge Louis Philippe.

Some further details of this marriage are given. It seems that the Duke de Levis, with full powers from the Count de Chambord (Duke de Bordeaux), went in his name to the Archduke of Modena, to claim the hand of the Archduchess Maria Theresa, his sister. The Duke de Levis having been introduced to the hall of audience, made the claim in appropriate terms. The Duke replied:—"I am much flattered with the request that you make in the name of the Count de Chambord, for the hand of my well-beloved sister, the Archduchess Maria Theresa, and it is with entire confidence that I give my consent to an union, which must draw closer the bonds of relationship so honourable for my family and myself. Persuaded that this marriage will ensure the happiness of a beloved sister, I shall be eager to hasten the accomplishment of the wish of the Count de Chambord. I am charmed that he has chosen you as his interpreter on this occasion—no choice could have been more agreeable to me; and I am pleased to give you the assurance of the esteem and confidence with which your noble conduct and devotedness have inspired me." The Duke de Levis having made the same demand to the Archduchess, her Royal Highness replied: "I consent, with joy, to unite my fate with that of the Count de Chambord, for I am sure that this union will render me happy. Firmly resolved to devote my life, my whole life, to the Count de Chambord, I shall love France as he does, and all my prayers, all my wishes, will be for our common country."

A letter from Mantua, of the 9th, says: "The Duchess de Bordeaux left Modena this day, accompanied by her brother, the Duke de Modena, who did not leave her until when near Mantua. Her Royal Highness passed through Mantua in an open carriage."

The Moniteur contains a Royal Ordonnance, founding two new professorships at the Faculty of Sciences at Paris—one for mathematics applied to astronomy, and the other for the higher branches of geometry. In the former professorship, M. Le Verrier, the discoverer of the planet for which our astronomers have been so severely abused in France, is officially appointed.

Yesterday week, Lord Normanby gave a brilliant soirée at the hotel of the Embassy, at which all the members of the diplomatic corps at Paris were present, those of the Spanish Embassy excepted. Neither the Spanish Ambassador, nor his secretaries, nor any of his attaches or employés, were seen there.

The Constitutionnel announces that the inauguration of the Rouen and Havre Railroad will take place in the beginning of January, 1847.

"The French Government," says the Courrier Français, "notified, as usual, to all the Courts with which it is on friendly terms, England of course included, the marriage of the Duke de Montpensier. We have been assured that Lord Palmerston not only did not forward to the French Court a letter of congratulation in reply, but that he has not even acknowledged the receipt of the letter of notification."

The Correctional Tribunal of Lille, which had been occupied for five days with the trial of four persons, accused of being concerned in causing, from want of care, the railway catastrophe at Fampoux, has delivered its judgment. The persons accused were Alexandre Petiet, working engineer, aged 33, of Paris; Joseph Hovelt, inspector of the first-class, 37 years, also residing at Paris; Alexandre Duthout, 26 years; and Antoine Bein, both engine-men, of Lisle. The evidence brought forward has added nothing whatever to the circumstances already known; and it will be seen by the following judgment that the cause of the accident still lies involved in the greatest mystery: "Whereas, it appears from the evidence that on July 8, 1846, a train of twenty-eight carriages from Paris, drawn by two locomotives, having gone off the rails at Fampoux, and separated in consequence of the rupture of the traction bars, was precipitated from an earthwork into a deep marsh, where fourteen persons perished, the greater number by submersion, and several others were hurt, five of them severely. And whereas the catastrophe of Fampoux has, consequently, for its immediate cause, a going-off the rails; but whereas the cause of this going off the rails has, notwithstanding all the efforts of justice, and the insufficient tribute of scientific research, still remained enveloped in conjectures, most of which are irreconcilable with each other, and which exclude all ideas of culpability, the Court acquits all persons accused, and without costs."

The Bey of Tunis arrived at Toulon on the 12th instant, and was received on his landing in the arsenal of Toulon by Vice Admiral Baudin, the civil and military authorities, and M. Desgranges, an interpreter, sent by the King to accompany him in his journey. The Bey wore the uniform of a Lieutenant-General, the grand cordon of the Legion of Honour, and a variety of other decorations. His Highness, after receiving the authorities, proceeded to the arsenal, which he visited, accompanied by Admiral Baudin; and in the evening a banquet was offered to him at the hotel of the Maritime Prefecture. The Bey will lodge, on his arrival at Paris, in the Palace of the Elysée Bourbon. The Bey was expected at Paris before the end of the week.

The Débats has an announcement which places the name of Lord Brougham in curious juxta-position with the Spanish Ambassador and the Russian Chargé d'Affaires: it is as follows. "On Sunday evening, their Majesties received the Spanish Ambassador, the Chargé d'Affaires of Russia, Lord Brougham, the Baron de Bussières (Peer of France), and General Hecquet."

SPAIN.

The Madrid papers announce that the Conde de Thomar, better known as Costa Cabral, has been appointed Portuguese Ambassador in Madrid, in the place of the Baron Renduffe, who has been offered the same post at Rio Janeiro. The object of placing Costa Cabral in such an office at the present moment appears to have been simply to keep him out of Portugal, where he had announced his intention of returning.

Several merchants, landowners, and public functionaries of Spain, gave a banquet to Mr. Cobden, at Seville, on the 2nd inst. The chair was taken by Senor Miguel Chacon y Duran, Director of the Economical Society of Seville, seven members of which were present. Senor Chacon proposed the toast of "Mr. Cobden, and the application of his ideas to the economical state of Spain." Mr. Cobden replied to the following effect in English:—"Gentlemen—I return you my most sincere thanks for the kind reception which you have given me in the beautiful capital of Andalusia. I am aware that, personally, I am not entitled to the consideration with which you so generously treat me. I have, however, had the pleasing satisfaction of finding at Seville a great number of enlightened individuals, who share those principles of which I have sought to be the interpreter. As I have already thanked you for the expression of your kindness, scarcely anything remains for me to say. If I had been a Spaniard, I should have given you the trouble of listening to a long speech. I should have endeavoured to show that Free-Trade would confer the greatest benefits on this country, that it would cause activity in your ports and markets, that it would enrich your agriculture, and that it would render your finances prosperous. I should have inculcated the moral advantages which result from the mutual communication of nations. I could have drawn you a very lively picture of the pacific benefits which would ensue from the general adoption of the principles of Free-Trade. I could have demonstrated to you that nations, greatly differing from each other, if it were possible for them to communicate their ideas, laying aside their mutual prejudices, would gain extraordinarily by the acquisition of information which would be useful to the country, and would increase its enlightenment. I should enlarge with pleasure on these principles, were I a Spaniard; but, as an Englishman, I think it more delicate to leave the defence of them to Spaniards, in order that I may not be blamed for seeking to propagate beyond my own country, doctrines of which the advantages are sufficiently known. I believe, however, that, in this enlightened assembly, there are persons who, with the eloquence natural to their nation, will know how to defend successfully those principless of humanity and philanthropy upon which it is not allowable for me to expatiate. I am glad that after I have communicated my sentiments to you, you will respond to them by showing the state of the country, and the application of my doctrines, of which it is capable, which it is not for me to explain. In conclusion, I would wish to propose a toast in favour of Andalusia; but I experience a difficulty in finding one in a country privileged by nature, and abounding in every kind of produce. What can I desire for this country? A single thing is wanting to double its wealth—freedom of trade. Let us drink to its attainment." Other toasts, among which were the healths of the Ladies of Seville, and of Mr Schwabe, Mr. Cobden's travelling companion, were proposed and drunk; and several speeches were delivered by other gentlemen.

ITALY.

We have letters from Rome of the 8th inst., containing an account of the imposing ceremony of taking formal possession of the Lateran Church. Three decrees of an important character gave value to the proceedings; the first nominating a commission of clergy and laymen to inquire into the best means of reforming the civil and criminal laws; the second appointing a commission to report upon a plan of municipal reform, such as shall, it is expected, greatly enlarge the privileges of citizens. By a third decree, mendicancy and vagabondism are prohibited. And, lastly, a notice appeared relative to railway projects, showing that such had his Holiness's best attention and encouragement.

Most overwhelming was the day's exhibition of physical strength along the whole line of the Pope's progress from his Quirinal Palace to the Lateran, amid shouts of enthusiastic devotion, such as the unanimous heart of a whole people, long estranged from such feelings, could alone give forth. The richest tapestries lined the Palaces on the line of procession; festoons, garlands, and silk hangings profusely ornamented the inferior dwellings, and every balcony was a focus of patriotic ebullition, as the Pontiff was borne onward in the midst of as picturesque a cortège as the imagination of this fanciful land could conjure into existence. An idea of the dresses worn by the Roman Court in this singular cavalcade, can be only conveyed to the English reader by referring him to the gorgeous picture at Hampton Court, of the "Field of the Cloth of Gold"; almost all the costumes in that glowing representation being reproduced in the retinue which rode with the Pope in this splendid revival of a mediæval ceremony. All the Judges were on horseback, as well as all the Prelates, Bishops, Pages, the Governor of Rome, the Senators, and other indescribable functionaries of a variegated and many-tesselated Government; men in armour, the Noble Guard, and the Pope's Standard-Bearer, on his mule, leading the van.

Formerly, the cavalcade mounted the steep ascent of the Capitol; but, since Ganganelli fell off his horse on getting down towards the arch of Septimus, it now enters the Forum by a circuit. An immense crowd of swarthy peasants from the Sabine, Volscian, and Latin districts, filled the Campo Vaccino, and rent the air with reiterated shouts on the Pope's entering the old Via Sacra, at which moment the great bell of the Capitol, which is only heard on such an occasion, roaring above the voices of the multitude, uttered its singularly deep vibrations, "pealing solemnly." At the triumphal arch of Titus, some curiosity was excited, in expectation of the Jews' representatives in Rome paying homage, as usual, to the new Sovereign, and craving toleration; but the Pope's good taste dispensed with this display. All the rising ground on the Palatine hill was densely covered with spectators; but the Coliseum, divided into boxes, and hung with silks, seemed to be what the great stand is at Newmarket Races.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.—THE WAR WITH THE KAFFIRS.

We have received Cape of Good Hope papers to the 18th of September. The latest intelligence from Graham's Town, the neighbourhood of the Kaffir war, reaches to the 12th of that month, at which date it appears, the Governor had fallen back to Line Drift, on account of the difficulty experienced in obtaining provisions for the troops. Sir Andries Stockenström had, it is stated, left the command of his force, and returned to his farm, in consequence of differences with the Governor. According to these advices, the aborigines continue their depredations, and a large number of oxen and sheep have been swept away from several of those farms which were not thoroughly protected. On the Baviaan River and at Bottas post the Kaffirs seem to have been irresistible. It appears that hostilities had been temporarily suspended, and that negotiations had taken place with Kreli, but the result was by no means favourable.

The South African Commercial Journal states that previous to the 5th of September the chief Stock had surrendered; Macomo and Umhala asked for peace; and Kreli accepted the terms offered him by the colonial authorities. As Macomo and Umhala were still at large, their offer was of little weight. Stock was to be allowed to remain at Fort Peddie, together with some councillors of the late chief Eno, the party supplying themselves with food. In the meantime, however, Stock had been allowed to visit the Kwaylaykay river (between the Gonubie and Kei) with all his people, leaving his two brothers as hostages at Fort Peddie. The negotiations with Kreli are the most characteristic part of the affair; and we therefore lay before our readers the principal points on which they turned, as recorded in the Graham's Town Journal. Sir Andries Stockenström visited Kreli at his kraal, and "conducted the whole of the diplomacy on four points." These are stated to have been

1. For Kreli's having permitted the Amakosa tribes, of which he was paramount chief, to make war upon the colony.—2. In having made war upon the colony himself, by permitting his people to join the Amakosa, or frontier tribes, against the colony.—3. In having imprisoned and put in fear of their lives the British Agent resident in his territory, and the missionaries at Butterworth.—4. In having given harbour to colonial cattle taken from the colonists by his countrymen.

To these charges Kreli replied:—

1. That the British Government could not consider him responsible for the acts of the frontier Kaffirs, inasmuch as the Governor of the colony had made treaties with them entirely independent of him. Besides this, why did our Government support them against him in the war of 1829, when his father Hintza was about to chastise them for their misdeeds?—2. That the colony ought not to accuse him with joining in the war, merely because some of his people had engaged in it, when it could be proved that he had not only forbidden his people to go, but had punished a chief and all his people who had gone.—3. That it did not become a great nation to make war on another nation upon the report of one man. On such occasions it was, he understood, customary to ask for explanation. The Resident Agent had been alarmed, and made a false report, whereas the truth was, that he, fearing for the Agent's safety, had sent to him, telling him not to leave his station, or he would be killed; and that, as the Agent disbelieved him and fled, he was unable to protect the abandoned station, but that, notwithstanding, he had sent many friendly messages to the Agent since.—4. He demanded proof that he had given refuge to colonial cattle. He denied positively having done so.

These exculpatory assertions Sir Andries believed, or affected to believe, and offered, on the part of Government, to conclude the following arrangements with Kreli:—

1. Kreli to be acknowledged paramount Chief of all Kaffirland, in that capacity to be responsible for the conduct of the frontier tribe towards the colony.—2. That he, as paramount Chief, should cede to the British Government all the Kaffir territory between the Fish and Kei Rivers, to be settled by the Queen of England, agreeably to the terms of the treaty of peace made by the Governor, Sir Benjamin D'Urban, in 1835.—3. That ample restitution should be made to Mr. Fynn, and the missionaries, for all the losses they had suffered, and that Kreli should permit and request the return of the British Resident Agent.—4. That Kreli should restore to the colony all the colonial cattle found in his country.

These terms Kreli, after some haggling about the fourth article, accepted, and the conference closed. After the return of Sir Andries to head-quarters, the following plan of operations was adopted:- The colonial forces beyond the Kei were withdrawn. Kreli engaged to guard the passages on that river. Sir Andries undertook to form a defensive line from Kreli's borders towards the boors' settlements near the Orange river. Colonel Hare fell back upon Fort Beaufort; and Captain Sutton occupied Eland's post. The burgher levies, to whom it had been intimated that their services would be dispensed with after the 9th of September, volunteered to continue in the field as long as they should be required.

The results of these negotiations and military movements will best appear from a private letter from the frontier, of the 9th of September, and from the statements of Sir Andries Stockenström's organ, the South African Commercial Advertiser. The letter states that the Amatola heights and ravines are again full of Kaffirs, and that Colonel Hare was going to make a combined attack to dislodge them. Major Hogg has been sent for from Tambookieland, to co-operate in this movement. Macomo is said to be almost daily sending in overtures of peace, but on terms that cannot be accepted.

The journal above-mentioned says 11,000 sheep are reported as having been carried off from Nell's lager, the spoor of which a party sent out stated on their return they were not able to find. There are 250 farmers in Beaufort, but all dismounted. Large numbers of Kaffirs are said to be collecting in the Baviaan's River, where there are numerous cattle and sheep yet left. Numerous parties of Kaffirs are said to be entering the colony from the Tarka to the sea.

THE UNITED STATES AND MEXICO.

The Caledonia has arrived with New York papers to the 31st of October. They state that the surrender of Monterey has been completed, and that General Taylor is in full possession of that city and all its defences and resources. The process of evacuating the city by the Mexican forces made manifest the fact that the defeated army outnumbered that of the conquerors, for General Taylor's force, which entered Monterey after the surrender, did not exceed 5000 men of all arms, while it is computed that Ampudia's retreating army numbered 7000.

From California, intelligence had reached Washington, just before the Caledonia was to leave, that the whole west coast was blockaded by the United States squadron, and the flag of the Union was waving on all the principal points, without having met with opposition.

It seems to be the determination of the United States Government to commence a most vigorous movement against Mexico, in the Gulf of Mexico, both at Tampico and Alvarado.

The prospects of peace are as distant as ever. The Mexican Congress does not meet till December, and it can only decide upon the proposals for peace submitted by the United States Government. But no one seems to entertain the belief that Mexico will consent to any terms which the United States have yet offered, or thus far are likely to offer.

A violent hurricane was experienced at Rey West, Mexico, on the 12th ult., which destroyed nearly the whole of the town, the lighthouse there, and at Sand Rey, and drove twenty vessels on shore.

A Philadelphia paper states that the brig Phœnix and bark Angelique had sailed from Maracaibo for Laguayra, with 500 Government troops, for the purpose of quelling a revolution which occurred at Caraccas during the latter part of September, at the instigation of an individual named Gusmanistos, publisher of a journal at Caraccas, and ostensible leader of a large body of partisans, known as the Gusmanistos party.

SCOTLAND.

ELECTION OF RECTOR FOR THE UNIVERSITY OF GLASGOW.

The annual election of the Lord Rector of this University took place on Monday. Two candidates were proposed for the office —Mr. Wordsworth, the Poet Laureate, and Lord John Russell. After a severe contest, the following was the result:—

		Wordsworth.	Russell.
In Natione	Glottiana	81	[illegible]
—	Rothseiana	[illegible]	[illegible]
	Transforthana	[illegible]	[illegible]
	Loudoniana	20	[illegible]
		211	[illegible]

So that on the gross poll, the supporters of Mr. Wordsworth were in a clear majority of 18.

By the University statutes, however, the Rector is elected by a majority, not of votes, but of "nations;" and in the event of an equality of "nations," the right of giving the casting vote devolves on the late Rector, or, in his absence, on his Vice-Rector, appointed by himself. The Vice-Rector on this occasion was Dr. Nicholl, the Professor of Astronomy, who gave his casting vote in favour of Lord John Russell. Thus, by the peculiar circumstances of the case, the Whig Premier has been preferred to his literary opponent, though opposed by the two largest "nations," and by a majority of the matriculated members of the University.

The candidates for the office are generally proposed without application to themselves. Their acceptance of office is, therefore, necessary; and if this is not intimated within fourteen days after the election, a new election becomes necessary.

It is expected that in the peculiar relations of "nations" and parties, Lord John will not feel himself justified in accepting the office, in the face of a decided majority of the comitia, on the strength of an accidental advantage obtained through an antiquated, and now most unequal classification of the students.

Approaching Marriage.—It is reported that the marriage of our respected county member, Captain Dalrymple, with the eldest daughter of the Duke de Coigny, which has been the subject of private rumour for some time, is to take place early in December.—Galloway Advertiser.

The Elgin Burghs.—George Duff, Esq., of Milton Duff, near Elgin, second son of General Sir Alexander Duff, and nephew of the Earl of Fife, has announced his intention of standing for the Elgin Burghs at the next election. Mr. Duff is a Whig.

Distress in the Highlands and Islands.—We (Greenock Advertiser) have seen a private letter, giving a very melancholy account of the destitution which prevails in several of the remote districts of the Highlands. In Long Island numbers are represented as being in a state of actual starvation: there is want of food even among those who could and would be glad to pay for it. They have the grain produce of last year, but if they were to thresh it all now, the straw, which is the winter provender for their cattle, would be useless before it could be used. The tenantry there, it is said, would gladly buy meal at the present time. Barra and South Uist are worse off, but neither is Benbecula, North Uist, or Harris, in a good condition. Parties competent to form a good judgment in the matter have stated that several parts of the Highlands are worse off than Ireland.

Health of the Metropolis.—The health of London continues to be above the average of the past five years. The weekly bill of mortality published by the authority of the Registrar-General, shows the number of deaths in the metropolis, during the week ending last Saturday, to be 916, or 52 less than the weekly average of the past five years, and 84 less than that of the past five summers. The number of births during the week was 1429; namely, 769 males, and 660 females.

Sanatory Condition of Marylebone.—A public meeting was held on Wednesday evening, of the parishioners of Marylebone, at the Literary and Scientific Institution, Edward-street, Portman-square, for the purpose of considering the best means of promoting the sanatory improvements of the parish; B. B. Cabbell, Esq., M.P., in the chair. The object of the meeting appeared to be chiefly to appoint a Sanatory Committee, such as already exists in Westminster and other districts of the metropolis, whose duty it would be to point out to the parochial authorities the various sources of disease in the parish, and to urge upon them the necessity for their immediate removal. Mr. Cochrane, the principal promoter of the meeting, and several other parishioners, addressed themselves to the subject, and referred to a number of reports, particularly that of the superintendent of street cleaning, which pointed out a vast number of lanes, alleys, courts, and small streets in the most filthy condition, many of them not having been swept, or the dust-bins emptied, for years, and all without any of those conveniences so necessary for health. It was stated that nearly 160 families in the parish have only the accommodation of half a room each for the entire family, and many whole families occupied one bed. A series of resolutions were agreed to declaratory of this state of the parish, and the necessity of a remedy by carrying out the objects of the meeting.

Curious Swimming Experiment in the Thames.—Some curious experiments in swimming were made on Wednesday afternoon in the Thames, off Westminster-bridge, for the purpose of testing the Royal Life Preserving and Swimming Apparatus, the invention of Mr. John Keyse. At half-past one, a middle-aged man, named Ward, who, it is understood, was in the employ of Messrs. Barclay and Perkins, the brewers, having been dressed in the apparatus, which consists of gloves with the hands webbed and extended, air-tight conical armlets, and cork clogs, concave at bottom, he dived into the water in the presence of several thousand spectators. The tide at the time was running with great force through the arches of the bridge, but the swimmer was enabled to make way against the tide, and he swam round several of the piers of the bridge with perfect freedom. Thus far the experiment proved eminently successful; but, instead of ending here, the man expressed himself perfectly able to swim down the river and round the piers of some of the other bridges. Whilst the attempt was being made, and when near the Hungerford Suspension Bridge, he became so completely exhausted, from the coldness of the water and the length of time he had been in, that the most vigorous exertions were forced to be made to get him into the boat that accompanied him. Having been got ashore, he was taken to the Feathers Tavern, in the Commercial-road, Lambeth, where he was put to bed and a surgeon sent for. In the course of a couple of hours, he so far recovered as to be pronounced out of danger. He was in the water upwards of an hour before he became exhausted.

Employment on the River.—At a meeting of the coal-porters and coal-whippers, held on Monday, in the Temperance Hall, Waterloo-road, one of the speakers said that there were 2000 men engaged on the coal-barges along the river, whose wages varied from £2 to £1 15s. a week.

American Soda Biscuits.—A new article of import has recently been brought into this country from America, called soda biscuits. Several shipments have been made; but, as yet, the demand exceeds the supply. The biscuits are made very light, about twenty to the pound, and are of excellent quality, eating as fresh as if they had just left the oven. They are retailed in Liverpool at sixpence a pound.

Boulogne and Calais.—The number of persons who pas[illegible] France by way of Boulogne during the week ending on the 15th inst., w[illegible] [illegible] by way of Calais 261. The numbers in the corresponding week of last [illegible] were, Boulogne 996, and Calais 217.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

Suicide of Mr. Alsager, the Official Assignee.—On Monday, Mr. G. J Mills held an inquest on the body of Thomas Massa Alsager, E[illegible], aged sixty-[illegible] residence, 26, Queen-square, Bloomsbu[illegible]. A number of witnesses were ex[illegible] whose evidence it appeared that Mr. Alsager cut his throat in several places on Friday, the 30th of October, and that he died from the wounds on Sunday morning last.—Mr. Oxenford, solicitor, and nephew of the deceased, stated that he saw Mr. Alsager on Thursday (the 29th ult.), when he was very low-spirited. Witness attributed the lowness to some of the occupations of the deceased having ceased.—A Juror: What were his occupations? Mr. Mills considered that a question which they had no right to inquire into what could the occupation have to do with this act of the deceased?—The Juror was anxious to ascertain the cause of this act.—Mr. Oxenford said he was very anxious to give every information that he possibly could. The Juror: Was he not connected with the Times?—Mr. Oxenford: Yes; the deceased wrote the City Articles; and having tendered his resignation, it was accepted. When witness met him, there was a lowness of spirits, but it certainly did not arise from anything that occurred with the Times, further than that an active mind was thrown out of its employment.—The Jury, after a short consultation, found that the deceased died from exhaustion, the effect of certain wounds inflicted on himself, but that no evidence had been produced as to his state of mind at the time he so inflicted the said wounds.—In addition to his official position, Mr. Alsager had obtained a high standing in the mercantile world, and being so well known as City Correspondent of the Times, possessed considerable influence in commercial circles, where he was universally esteemed.

Loss of Life from the Fall of a Railway Bridge.—A melancholy catastrophe has occurred at Mortimer, near Reading, occasioned by the falling in of a railway bridge recently erected over the Berks and Hants branch line of the Great Western Railway, now in the course of construction. The lives of three of the workmen employed on the line have been sacrificed: their names are Charles Bailey, Daniel Dibler, and Francis Kimber. Several other workmen are now lying in a precarious condition, owing to the accident. At the inquest, a verdict was returned of "Accidental Death," but not without some strong remarks from the Jury on the culpable neglect, with regard to the erection of bridges on this line, as no less than four lives have been lost, and other accidents occasioned.

Fatal Accident on the London and North-Western Railway.—On Monday, an inquest was held to investigate the death of Enos Lea, aged twe[illegible] nine, a porter in the employ of Messrs. T. Stinland and Co., railway car[illegible] who was killed by being jammed between the buffer of some luggage trucks, at Camden station of the above railway yesterday week. From the evidence adduced, it was shown that the luggage train, which ought to have left Birmingham at nine o'clock on Thursday evening, did not do so until an hour after. Its time of arrival at the Camden station is three in the morning, but, on the day in question, it did not arrive until forty minutes after seven, upwards of four hours and three quarters after its proper time. Shortly after its arrival, whilst the deceased was engaged in moving a truck from the turn-table to the weigh-bridge, the signal was given to the engine driver to close the buffers for the purpose of slackening the coupling chains, and, in doing so, deceased was crushed between the buffer of the truck he was moving and the one next to it, killing him almost instantly. The Jury returned the following verdict—"That Enos Lea was crushed to death between the buffers of two trucks on the London and North-western Railway, impelled by a certain locomotive engine which had brought the train of [illegible] four carriages on the previous night from Birmingham. That such train, being four hours and three quarters behind its time, coupled with the fact that there was a disregard of signals, was the main cause of the occurrence, and the Jury cannot but express their sense of the danger which must always result from such neglect of time signals."

Forgeries by a Deputy Post-Master at Barnet.—Mr Morse, late Deputy Postmaster at Barnet, recently absconded. It seems that he is accused of forgery to a considerable extent, and a reward of £50 has been offered for his apprehension. It was Morse's duty to receive the moneys from the payers, and to furnish in return a post-office order for the amount, such orders being duly advised to the post-towns or money-order stations upon which they were respectively drawn Thus his order became the authority for payment, and, taking advantage of such a position, he drew to the amount of £2000 in one day upon different offices throughout the country, making the orders payable to various imaginary persons. These orders were principally for £5, the highest amount for which a post-office money letter is given. He then went the round of the stations drawn upon, and signing the orders in the names by which they were advised, no suspicion was aroused, so that the money was paid without hesitation. At the office in Charing-cross nearly 200 of these orders were duly honoured.

Incendiary Fire in a Chapel at Nottingham.—A fire was discovered on Sunday night in Friar-lane Chapel, Nottingham, which is evidently the work of an incendiary. The pulpit was entirely destroyed, the gallery and organ extensively burnt, and the wood floor on which the pulpit stood, the reading desk, and several pews, were altogether destroyed and reduced to ashes. The firemen remained in the chapel, to discover, if possible, the cause of this disaster, when, at a quarter before three in the morning, a second fire broke out in a pew in the north-west corner of the Chapel, which had evidently been smouldering for hours, the articles burning not being of a very combustible nature. The second fire, however, was put out before much mischief had been done by it. A searching inquiry took place as to the cause of this work of destruction, and it was discovered that the vestry had been ransacked, a bottle of wine in a cupboard had been drank, a cash-box had been broken open, and the vestry door left wide open. The building was left safe at nine o'clock on Sunday night. The building is very handsome, erected at great cost, and had a fine-toned organ in it, which is seriously injured.

Ingenious Smuggling.—On Monday morning, a seizure of an extraordinary description took place at the St. Katherine's Dock Steam Packet Wharf. A ca[illegible] of live geese, brought over from Harlingen in the Magnet steamer, had been landed from the vessel, and was being examined by the officer, when he thought the geese appeared unusually tall. He made a more careful scrutiny, and ascertained that a quantity of hay, forming a false bottom, had been made, on which the geese were standing, and on removing that, he discovered beneath a quantity of very thin deal boards. These were also removed, and a quantity of cigars, weighing 44lbs., were exposed to view. The case, geese, twenty-eight in number, and the cigars, were immediately seized and conveyed to the Queen's Warehouse

Lamentable Suicide.—A dreadful case of self-destruction was committed on Sunday night, in Bridgewater-square, Barbican, by a gentleman named Benjamin Crootes, who resided at No. 7 in the square. The deceased until very recently held a lucrative situation at Harmer and Pearson's, distillers, Red-cross-street, Cripplegate, but having left that house, he had entered into business on his own account, and was erecting a distillery a few miles from town. During the last week or two a marked change had taken place in his manner. On Sunday night, between ten and eleven o'clock, whilst his daughter was in one of the lower rooms, she was alarmed at hearing a heavy fall in the apartment in which her father was. She immediately repaired to the spot, where an awful spectacle presented itself: her unfortunate parent was on the floor, with a frightful wound at the lower part of the body, which he had inflicted by plunging a sword into himself. A medical gentleman was promptly in attendance, but not in time to render any assistance. It appears that, to accomplish his object, the deceased had first cut himself over the bowels, and afterwards placed the handle of the sword on the floor, and then threw himself on the point of the blade. The verdict of the Coroner's Jury was "Temporary Insanity."

Death of Two Brothers at Brighton.—A gentleman named Champion who had been staying for some time at No. 45, Marine-parade, died last week; and on Saturday last, Mr. Thomas Champion, brother of the deceased, came down from London to superintend the funeral arrangements. Mr. Thomas Champion was 72 years of age, and he was very much unnerved at the loss of his brother. On Sunday evening he went into his bed-room, and whilst there he fell down, and almost instantly expired. A Coroner's inquest was held on the body on Monday evening, when the Jury returned a verdict of "Natural death."

Fatal Accident on the Manchester and Leeds Railway. On Saturday night a fatal accident occurred on this line, at Luddon Foot station, by which one of the guards, named William Worthington, lost his life. It appears that about dusk a luggage-train, on its way to Leeds, stopped at the station to detach some waggons, which had just been done, when another luggage-train came up in the same direction, and, there being no signal up, ran into the first with fearful violence. The unfortunate guard was on the last truck, which was shattered to pieces, and he was killed on the spot. His head, when found, was several yards from the body, which was fast under the wheels of the engine. The engine was destroyed, and several of the waggons broken to pieces, and others seriously damaged.

Forged Orders on the Birmingham Stock Exchange.—On Tuesday the members of the Birmingham Stock Exchange discovered three forged orders to purchase upwards of three hundred shares of the Birmingham and Stour Valley Railway Company, at a price considerably in advance of the current rates, which had been declining during the day. It appears that the prices, which, on Monday, were as high as £4 18s. premium per share, opened on Tuesday, at 3½, but subsequently fell to 2⅛. In the afternoon, three orders were sent in, purporting to be from "E. Massey," and Mr. Onions, two sharebrokers in the town, to buy upwards of three hundred shares at £2 17s. 6d. Surprised at the suddeness of the advance, one of the brokers called on Mr. Massey to ascertain the reason of the rise, when it was found that the orders were forged, neither that gentleman nor Mr. Onions having sent any orders in to purchase shares.

Death from Starvation.—An inquest was held on Tuesday, by Mr. Baker, at the Halifax Arms, King Edward-street, Mile-end New-town, on the body of Mary Ann Ryan, a widow, aged forty-five years. The body lay in a parish shell at the house, No. 5, Spring-gardens, King Edward-street, a narrow row of houses, between which ran a black muddy ditch. The room was on the ground floor, about six feet square, and destitute of every article of furniture, bed, or bedding. The body was found lying doubled up near the fire-grate. Elizabeth Simmons, widow, said she occupied the room in which deceased lay, for which she paid one shilling and sixpence per week rent; the deceased had lodged with her for some months, and paid her sixpence a week for the accommodation. She obtained a few pence per week by making up men and boys' cloth caps for a person in the same street. Could not obtain more than would get her a cup of tea and dry bread, and was frequently without that. She had no bedding, but lay on the ground beneath some rags, her head being supported by a wooden box for a pillow. She owed witness 2s. for the last four weeks' rent, having had but a few [illegible] to make during that interval, and very little to eat. Her apparel consisted of only the remnants of an old chemise and ragged gown, without stockings or shoes. On Sunday night, witness went to her own bed, which is only a heap of rags, with scarcely any covering, witness obtaining a scanty living by vending nuts in the streets. About two o'clock in the morning, she awoke and found deceased stiff and cold.—Verdict, "Found dead; death being accelerated by long-continued privation and starvation."

Letters from Leghorn of the 7th state that the population of Fano (delegation of Pesaro and Urbino) has risen against the Jesuits of the town. The people, imputing to the Jesuits a conspiracy against the Pope, and, believing that their convent was the centre of the conspiracy, forced an entrance into it, and after doing much damage, ill-treated some of the members. A demonstration has also, it is said, taken place against the Jesuits at Perugia.

Accounts from Constantinople to the 28th ult. have arrived. Cholera was raging at Bagdad; several thousands had fallen victims, and little or no business was doing in consequence. Many of the inhabitants had fled from the scene of death to the mountains and the adjacent towns and villages. The Sultan had issued an edict, restricting the exportation of grain, notwithstanding the harvest throughout Turkey had proved most abundant.

Letters from Berlin, of the 8th instant, give a deplorable account of the Money Market in that capital. The Bourse is in a state of financial crisis, which is the more alarming and embarrassing in so far as it does not proceed, like the depression in Paris, from political causes. Over-speculation in railways appears to have been the origin of the embarrassment.

The French Government has received the important news of the discovery, at Guadaloupe, of a considerable mine of sulphur in the Solfa-Terra of Basse-Terre, the surface of which sank during the late earthquake.

A letter from Vienna, dated the 7th inst., says:—"The ordonnance issued by the Bavarian Government, imposing an ad valorem duty of 25 per cent. on the exportation of corn, has produced alarm in the Tyrol, inasmuch as that province derives the greatest part of its supplies from Bavaria, and at the same time enjoys the advantage of paying only one-half of the ordinary entrance duties of Austria. Our Government has, with great regret, been forced to depart from its principle of not fettering the corn-trade, and has also put restrictions on exportation."

A letter from Berlin states that a petition to the Provincial Diet, praying for a constitution of States General, was in circulation in that city. "This fact," says the letter, "is important, as hitherto the middle classes of our city have exhibited but little interest in the constitution question."

Another serious slip of earth, on the Bishopstoke and Salisbury branch of the South Western Railway, took place a few days ago, to a greater extent than the one which occurred about three weeks ago. It was fortunate no men were at work near the place at the time. There is not the least probability of the opening taking place on the 1st of December next, as has been reported.

On Monday there were several dishes of raspberries exhibited in Covent-garden market. These were not the produce of forcing, but were natural crops grown in the open air in a garden near Turnham-green, being the second supply this season.

The Duchess of Braganza (widow of Don Pedro) and suite passed Dover on Monday last, in the Duke of Cornwall steamer, for Ostend.

The former chief of the Libanus, Emir-Beschir, has received permission from the Turkish Government to fix his residence at Broussa.

We are sorry to find that unfavourable intelligence has been received of the Ethiope steamer, and of the consequent relinquishment of her attempt to re-ascend the Niger. Mr. Jamieson, in a circular addressed to the gentlemen who aided him in fitting out the last expedition, states that he has received from Captain Becroft and Dr. King the information that, when the steamer was upon the Gaboon River, her boilers suddenly gave way, and that, although the engineer succeeded in repairing them so as to complete the exploration of that river, they afterwards burst so frequently as to render it altogether unsafe to hazard another ascent of the Niger with them. The vessel has accordingly been laid up at Fernando Po, under the care of Captain Becroft, and Dr. King is on his way to England.

A Bal Masqué of a singular character was given on Monday evening at Blackheath. Near Trinity Church, on Blackheath Hill, is a cavern, supposed to have been constructed by the Danes, 180 feet below the surface. In this unpolished ball room 1500 persons assembled, and kept up their amusements with spirit until daybreak.

The Board of Ordnance has rejected the proposal for the use of Schonbein's gun cotton in the British army.

Madame Auchard, the nurse of the King of Rome, the son of Napoleon, died at Lagny on the 15th inst. King Louis Philippe revived in her favour, in 1831, the pension of 2000f. granted to her by the Emperor, and which was suppressed under the Restoration.

A letter from Paris has the following:—"Such is the demand for Irish labourers on railways in France, that they can earn 5f. to 6f. a day, wh[illegible] the native workman only receive 3f. to 3½f."

Another extra number of the London Gazette was published on Wednesday night. It contains above 90 notices of intended applications to Parliament for private bills, most of which are for making or extending railways The time for the deposit of the plans and sections and books of reference, with the clerks of the peace and parish clerks, will expire next Monday week. There was an extra number of the Gazette, devoted to a similar purpose, a few days previously.

The act providing for the establishment of baths and washhouses has been taken advantage of by many towns. It has already been adopted by the boroughs of Worcester, Birmingham, Leeds, Stockport, and Bath, as well as by the metropolitan parishes of St. Martin-in-the-Fields and Marylebone. The parishes of St. George, Hanover-square, Paddington, St. James, Piccadilly, and St. Andrew, Holborn, will probably be soon added to the list, as well as Exeter and other boroughs

It is in contemplation to form an omnibus company in Liverpool, on a very extensive scale. The establishment is first to consist of 100 omnibuses, and 800 horses, at an estimated outlay of £35,000; the profit upon which, charging passengers at the rate of 1d. per mile, is calculated at £14 [illegible] £835 per annum, provided the vehicles fill pretty well.

A letter from Roverdo, of the 1st inst., states that the Tyrol has had its inundations also. From the 28th to the 31st October it rained so incessantly that the Elsch rose above its banks, and did great damage. For several days all communications between the two banks of the river were interrupted.

A Berlin Correspondent of the Journal de Frankfort writes on the 11th:—"M. de Gerolt, the Prussian Chargé d'Affaires in North America, has prolonged his stay here several weeks, in order to receive instructions on the conclusion of a treaty of commerce and navigation between the United States and the Zollverein; M. de Gerolt will take his departure this week for Washington."

The Silesian Gazette contains correspondence from Warsaw, of the 8th instant, in which it is stated that eighty Jews, with their Rabbi at their head, had applied to the authorities of that city for permission to wear their ancient costume. A disturbance took place at Annaberg (Saxony) on the 10th inst., owing to 600 workmen having entered the manufactory of Messrs. Eisenstuck and Co., demanding the destruction of a piece of machinery which they said threw many of them out of work. No such machine was found. They smashed some of the other machinery. Order has since been re-established.

FORT ST. JULIAN, ON THE TAGUS.—FROM AN ORIGINAL SKETCH.

THE INSURRECTION IN PORTUGAL.

In our latest impression last week we gave an account of the progress of the insurrection in Portugal to the 7th instant. We have since received Lisbon letters to the 10th instant.

A conflict had taken place, on the 7th, between a body of troops and the insurgents, near Cintra. The firing lasted for some hours. A few were killed and wounded on both sides. The people escaped in various directions.

An official account has been published at Lisbon of the affair between the troops and the insurgents at Cintra. The loss on either side is not stated; but there is reason to believe that the troops lost between forty and fifty men, killed or wounded. The insurgents fought desperately, disputing the ground inch by inch, as they retired across the mountains, and got away without leaving any prisoners, so that it was no great victory after all. The only advantage gained, in fact, was the temporary dispersion of the armed peasants, only to assemble again as soon as the soldiers' backs are turned.

By the last accounts received, the Duke of Saldanha was at Sobral; and, if it be true that Antas has advanced to Cadaval, they are only fourteen miles distant from each other, and a battle may be daily expected, unless Antas should be wise enough to retire upon Coimbra or Santarem, and there wait his enemy's attack

Intelligence of the fall of Evora is hourly expected. Schwalback was to begin shelling that town on the 7th.

It was reported at Lisbon that the Oporto insurgents, under the command of Viscount Sa da Bandeira, had sallied out and defeated the Queen's troops, under Baron Casal, and that Sa da Bandeira had been wounded in the leg

The people of Cacilhas and Almada, on the south bank of the Tagus, and right opposite Lisbon, from which they are not two miles distant, are in open revolt against the Queen's Government. They have destroyed the telegraph at Almada. The Government has its hands so full of work in putting down insurrection on every side, that it cannot spare troops to send over. The insurgents there are said not to fall short of 500 armed men

Colonel Wylde had arrived at Lisbon, and great interest was excited to know the object of his mission. In the best informed quarters, it was supposed that he was sent to act as mediator between the contending parties.

The leaders of the insurgents are determined to fight obstinately. The struggle will be sanguinary and tedious.

A loan with the French Bank was in negociation; but the terms were so extravagant that they could not be accepted. It is not likely the loan will be effected.

The Diario contains a decree degrading from their rank, and depriving of their titles and honours, the following persons, for having taken part in the rebellion, viz.:—Counts Bomfin and Taipa, Baron Almargem, Brigadier Celestino, Colonels Cesar Vasconcellos, Avila, Conceiro, and Horta, Majors Correa and Leopoldino, Captains Jose Estevao, Corea, and Giton (a Frenchman).

Letters from Madrid assert positively that accounts had been received there from Lisbon, announcing that, immediately after the departure of the troops for the capital, the people rose against the Government, and the Queen, in order to save her life, took refuge on board the Hibernia. An attempt was made at the Paris Bourse on Tuesday to turn this statement to account, but it was generally discredited. It will be seen by subsequent intelligence, to be found at page 327, that the rumour was unfounded.

THE ILLUSTRATIONS.

We are indebted to the Portfolio of an obliging Correspondent for the pair of Sketches annexed. The first shows the entrance of the river Tagus and Fort St. Julian. This broad river gives to Lisbon a most splendid and safe harbour, which, it is said, might contain all the fleets of Europe. It will be perceived by the above intelligence that the Revolution had extended to the south bank of the Tagus, opposite to that on which Fort St. Julian is placed.

The second Engraving presents a view of the Town of Santarem, situated upon the right bank of the Tagus; the district of Santarem, of which the above is the capital, extending for nearly thirty miles on both sides of the river. By letters from Lisbon to the 8th inst., Santarem had been evacuated by the Queen's troops, and immediately occupied by the disaffected.

In former times, the town was fortified by the Arabs with thick walls and strong towers; but no trace remains at present of the ancient fortification except the five gates, which serve as entrances to the town, and a ruinous old castle. Near this place, the French, under Massena, remained for some time, being unable to penetrate to Lisbon. The town is well built; and there is an Academy here, instituted in the year 1747.

OLD PALACE AT CHESTER.

This is a fine specimen of the half-timbered houses of the ancient City of Chester, rich in antiquities, military, ecclesiastical, and civil, probably, beyond any other place in the kingdom.

The mansion before us is one of the picturesque dwellings of the sixteenth century, and is situated in Watergate-street. It was originally a palace of the Earls of Derby; and, as it bears the date 1591, two years before the death of Henry, the fourth Earl, one of the Peers who sat upon the trial of Mary Queen of Scots. At present, it has occupants of a different rank; but the timber gables, the carved pilasters and panels, carry us back to one of the most interesting periods of English domestic architecture.

THE THEATRES.

DRURY LANE.

A very agreeable ballet has served to introduce to the London public a very agreeable dancer, destined, if we mistake not, to take the very highest rank in her profession—and that at no distant period. Mademoiselle Sophie Fuoco—a name which, should she perform Alma, would be superlatively appropriate to "La Fille de Feu"—has been for some little time the idol of the Académie Royale, and report had spoken loudly of her talent and attractions. But we hear and read such wonderful accounts of artistes in foreign countries, and meet with such sad disappointments when they arrive in our own, that we did not place any very great reliance upon the anticipatory puffs of the papers and bills. Our pleasure was, in consequence, twofold at witnessing the triumphant success achieved by the danseuse in question. She is evidently very young—we were told, not more than nineteen—and her features are remarkably prepossessing and expressive. Her school of dancing partakes rather of that which the inventors of nice distinctions in Terpsichorean styles have christened the Real, and possibly this is the most attractive. She reminds us more of Carlotta Grisi than any of the other leading favourites. Her activity and lightness are remarkable; and she lacks only a little more of earnestness in her pantomime to at once challenge comparison with any female dancer of the day

The ballet of "Betty" was chosen for her début. In this she has been playing the chief character, with the greatest success, in Paris. With the subject we expect all our readers are familiar: it is that of Mr. Howard Payne's pleasant comedietta of "Charles the Second" -the piece in which the madcap King and Rochester get into such scrapes at Captain Copp's Tavern, at Wapping.

As a set-off against the pilfering of English dramatists from their French brethren, the latter have lately taken a vast liking to English subjects, invented or ready-made; one of the last instances, in ballet, being the "Diable à Quatre." But as, with us, "Betty" is not a very euphonious name—reminding one rather of mops, brooms, and "all work," than flirtations with Royalty—the title of the ballet, which, by the way, follows the incidents of the comedy pretty closely, has been changed to "The Wags of Wapping," and a very pleasant entertainment it makes; beautifully got up, with charming scenery, and tasteful costumes, and admirably performed by everybody—from whom we may select two clever German sisters, the Sœurs St. Louin, for especial notice. Their double hornpipe was a very spirited affair, and uproariously applauded. The success of dancer, ballet master, and auxiliaries, was, in a word, unquestioned; and Mr. Bunn will find that he has made a "hit" in engaging Mademoiselle Fuoco. She will fill the house at all events, at half-price for some time to come.

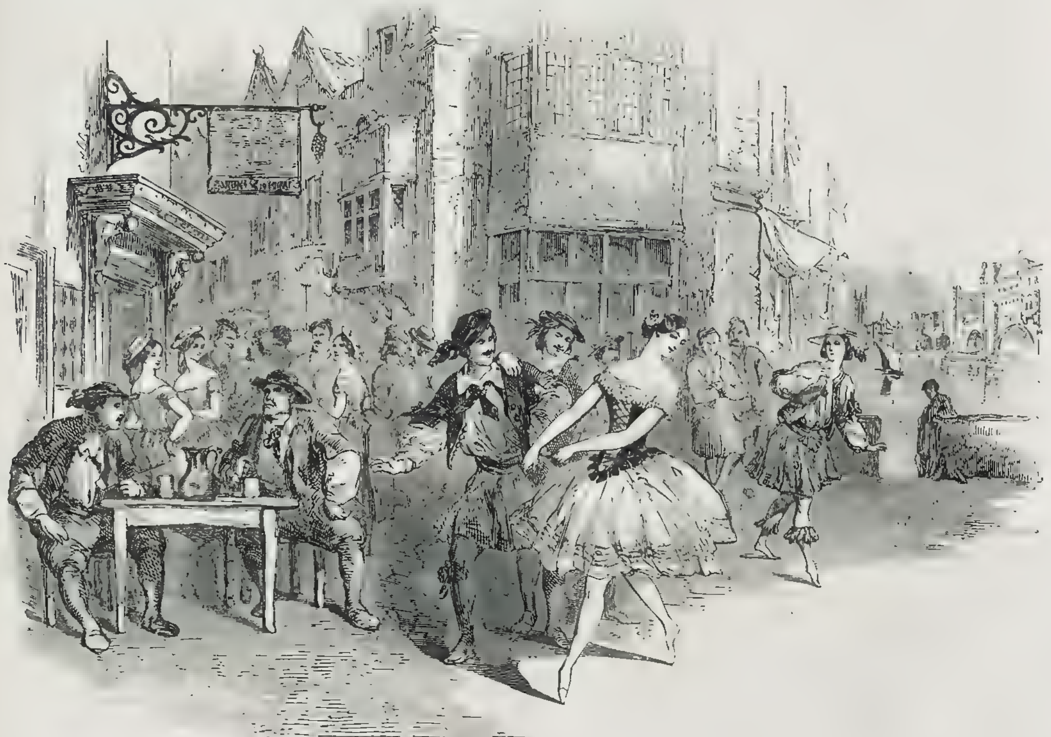
In the Morning Chronicle, we find the following curious history of the drama on which the ballet of "Betty" has been founded. "It must now be more than forty years since the late Tom Dibdin produced his 'Waggeries at Wapping' at the Surrey Theatre, having taken a tradition from one of the chroniclers of Charles's times as the basis of his plot. It was a popular piece, in which Elliston subsequently played at the Olympic. On the 27th of May, 1824, under the title of 'Charles the Second, or the Merry Monarch,' a comedy was performed for the first time at Covent-Garden Theatre, with a similar story. The authorship of the drama was claimed by Mr. Howard Payne, an American actor, who was lessee of Sadler's Wells Theatre, and who concocted the tragedy of 'Brutus' for Kean, and made a tragslation of Schiller's 'Robbers' for himself. Dibdin, however, protested against Mr. Payne's claim for originality; when the latter was constrained to admit that 'Charles the Second' was a translation from the French comédie by Alexandre Duval, called 'La Jeunesse de Henri Cinq,' performed, by the way, on the opening night of the French Plays last Friday. Duval originally intended his piece as an opera, for which Mehul was to have composed the music; but having had a dispute with the manager of the operatic Théâtre Feydeau, Duval transformed it into a comedy: the censorship, however, of the Empire, objected to the title of 'Charles the Second' as that Monarch succeeded Cromwell, an historical reminiscence that might not have proved agreeable to Napoleon. The order was given that the piece should be designated 'La Jeunesse de Henri Cinq,' despite the protest of Duval that, with such a title, the favourite of the King ought to have been a Falstaff, instead of a Rochester, to which historical objection the censorship replied, 'C'est la meme chose.' Hérold, the French composer, when in Naples, wrote an opera for Duval's libretto, called 'La Gioventu di Enrico Quinto.' Its next transformation was into a ballet pantomime, in two acts, entitled 'Betty,' invented by M. Mazilier, and the music by M. Ambroise Thomas. The English piece has returned to this, its original country, at Drury-Lane Theatre, with the title of 'The Wags of Wapping,' in the same shape as at the Parisian Académie Royale de Musique, only that M. Barrez, one of the best of European ballet-masters, has invested it with stronger couleur locale and nationality than in the French version. We may add, that Howard Payne's translation and M. Mazilier's adaptation are close transcripts of Duval's comedy, as the latter was of Dibdin's burletta."

OLYMPIC.

We never before sat out a five act piece—paying great attention to it, and studying the cast on the bill with extreme care; and then, at the conclusion being utterly bewildered as to what it all meant, until the other evening, when we were present at the representation of a new comedy called "Life," at the above house, written by "P. Palmer, Esq." How it was that "Life" did not terminate in its natural opposite state, we cannot tell: except that the fate of a gentleman in the pit, who entertained his own notions upon the subject, and, upon hissing lustily, was incontinently expelled, held up a severe example to those who wished to stay for the divertissement, and kept them quiet. There was a curious state of mind produced by this comedy; you constantly thought you were going to hear something smart, and it never came; the dialogue was a series of verbal fireworks, with the bangs cut off. Despite its name, there was an absence of all the principles of life in the play; its action was the galvanised vitality of nothingness; and, as such, it was a great curiosity, very well worth going to see. We must confess, for our own part, that it made us laugh heartily; but we cannot say whether this was at those points intended to evoke hilarity. The intelligent critic of the Times has called it "a great dramatic enigma:" we think if the solution was played as an afterpiece, it would be a commendable arrangement.

Where one could not discover what traits of character the performers were expected to pourtray, there is not much to be said respecting their acting Now and then, however, the haze that enveloped the plot cleared away a little for a few seconds, and then Mrs. R. Gordon, Mr. Leigh Murray, and Mr. and Mrs. Walter Lacy, came out vividly enough. Mr. H. Lee played a sharper very creditably, reminding us singularly of poor Yates.

The piece was very nicely put upon the stage; and a park scene, in the second act, was loudly and deservedly applauded. The cast included all the members of this really excellent company; it is to be regretted they had not a better vehicle for the display of their talents. We have given the best description of it that we can; and, in conclusion, we quote the motto above the ship, on the cheap glass seals, "Such is Life."



SCENE FROM THE NEW BALLET OF "THE WAGS OF WAPPING," AT DRURY-LANE THEATRE.

FRENCH PLAYS.

Mr. Mitchell commenced his season, as we announced, on Friday evening last; and with every prospect of making it a prolonged and lucrative one. There are few entertainments in London more refined and agreeable than that offered at the St. James's Theatre; and the appearance of the house, both on Friday and Monday evening, proved that this was acknowledged by many, whose presence is at all times the best warranty of attraction and excellence.

Duval's comedy, "La Jeunesse de Henri V." was the opening piece—the original, as we have stated, of our "Charles the Second." We think the name might have been altered, on its representation in London; for there was something very comical in making Rochester the favourite of Henry the Fifth, King of England; although, when the play was first produced, there was a reason for this. It served to introduce our old favourite Cartigny as Copp, and Rhozevil as the King, and they were warmly greeted. But the attraction of the evening was the début of Mdlle. Brohan who played Lisette afterwards in Regnard's three-act play, "Les Folies Amoureuses;" and Lisé, in "Les Rivaux d'eux Mêmes." This young lady, who is the "first chambermaid," in our own dramatic nomenclature, of the Théâtre Français, at once established herself as a great favourite with the audience. indeed, we have rarely witnessed so satisfactory an introduction; for the subscribers to Mr. Mitchell's theatre are at times very fastidious. Mdlle. Brohan is young, pretty and expressive. Her acting is chiefly characterised by a most agreeable vivacity and archness of manner, and that perfect concealment of all art and study, so necessary to form the accomplished artiste. It is to be hoped that her congé from the Théâtre Français is of some little duration; for most assuredly she will prove an attraction. It was announced in the bills that Monsieur Perlet's arrival in London had been retarded by indisposition. He will appear, we believe, on Monday evening

PRINCESS'

Mr. J. R. Scott, the American tragedian, played Richard the Third, from Cibber's version, at this theatre on Wednesday evening: but the performance was not, upon the whole, a satisfactory one. He has the common fault of those transatlantic artists we have yet seen that of ultra-vehemence and the mistaking of rant for power. His effects are all physical: and the applause of the house, when gained, is rather of the kind that would greet Mr. N. T. Hicks, of the transpontine theatres, when he threw himself from the top of the theatre into a chasm, than a tribute to a judicious impressive interpretation of the author. We think that Mr. Scott would appear to far greater advantage as a melo-dramatic actor than as a tragedian. The crudity of his style was less visible in the rough Sir Giles Overreach than in Richard, whose delicate villany can only be properly depicted by consummate artistical skill. There was no attempt to pourtray diplomacy in Mr. Scott's impersonation; every motive was palpable enough We do not deny that he has a certain degree of talent, but it is very far from being of a first-rate description. And at the same time it is due to him to state that he was loudly applauded, both during the progress and at the conclusion of the tragedy, which was put on the stage in a style deserving commendation

Much sympathy has been expressed in the profession for the sufferers by the late fire at the Garrick. Several of the performers have been engaged at different houses. Amongst them, Mr. Gomersal is going to Astley's, where he will sustain his original character of Napoleon, in "The Battle of Waterloo." Mr. Broadfoot, the stage manager, informs us that many of the points in "The Demon Horse" which called forth our remarks last week have been amended.

A performer new to the London boards—Mr. Lester—has been playing at the Haymarket, in "The Little Devil," and with good effect. He promises to become an acquisition to the already excellent corps of that establishment.

The Lyceum will re-open on the 21st of December, with the dramatic version of Mr. Dickens's Christmas story, on which Mr. Albert Smith is already engaged. The cast will comprise all the strength of the company, and, in addition, Mr. Leigh Murray and Miss May are, we belive, engaged.

Mr. Weippert's Soirées Dansantes, at the Princess' Concert Rooms, deserve to be praised for the admirable manner in which they are conducted. The band is of first-rate excellence, and the programme always attractive, and judiciously selected.

The manager of the Victoria announces the reduction of the price of admission to his gallery to threepence. This is at the rate of a penny a play!

THE POLISH BALL.

Guildhall never presented a more brilliant scene than on Wednesday evening, when the ball took place in aid of the funds belonging to the Literary Association of Poland. The old stonework glowed with light and warmth, and there was something exceedingly beautiful in the twinkling jets of gas that outlined all the arches and pillars of the interior. Gog and Magog looked perfectly astonished. The expression of their countenances always betokens a certain degree of bewilderment; but last night this was increased to utter incomprehensibility as they stared so fixedly at the whirling, many-coloured crowds below them

We should imagine that there could not have been much less than two thousand persons present, but the company was so divided in the different rooms, all of which were thrown open, that it is difficult to arrive at a correct estimate of the numbers. There was a Concert in the Council Chamber, of which we only heard a few distant notes over the heads of the densely-crowded company; but it was spoken of in raptures, afterwards, by everybody. The Ball, however, was the great feature of the evening. There were more fancy dresses than we have seen upon any former occasion; and many more dancers: in fact, at half-past four, there was no apparent relaxation in their unwearying energies. One of the chief objects of interest was the tapestry woven by the ladies of Poland, and presented to Lord Dudley Stuart: and this was well displayed on the wall opposite the entrance, brilliantly illuminated. There was no lack of refreshments, which were included in the price of the tickets; and these were very good. Mr. Adams conducted the band, and played all the popular waltzes and polkas of the season, which found, if anything, too many votaries. The dances were well arranged, confined almost exclusively to the two above named, alternating with quadrilles, with a Spanish dance, and the Caledonians for those who still clung to the dark ages of Terpsichore. The large number of pretty faces was the subject of general remark; nor did the ball lose in spirit from the indefatigability of a party of guardsmen, who kept everything alive. Besides the officials and the patrons of the society, there were present Lords Munster and Adolphus Vane; Sir Charles Shakerly; Captains de Barth, Purves, Seymour; Messrs. Jesse, Montgomery, Somerset, Ellison, C. Ellison, and many other members of the fashionable world.

IRELAND.

THE REPEAL ASSOCIATION.

The proceedings of the Repeal Association, on Monday, were only remarkable for an exhibition of sympathy from the United States

Mr. O'Connell announced subscriptions from America, the chief of which was one of £200 from the Repealers of Boston. (Great cheering)

The Right Rev. Dr. Browne, the Roman Catholic Bishop of Elphin, here rose, and was received with immediate attention. He was deputed, he said, by a preponderating majority of the Catholic prelates and of the priesthood generally, to [illegible] unaltered and unalterable attachment to O'Connell and his p[illegible] acting principles. The right rev. gentleman attacked the Nation newspaper as essentially "infidel," and denounced the Young Irelanders with great emphasis.

At the conclusion of his speech, Mr O'Connell proposed three vast "hurrahs" for the Bishop of Elphin, which were given accordingly

Mr. Curtis, barrister, announced a sum of £83 from the Roman Catholic Bishop of Waterford and eighty two of his clergy. (More cheering)

Mr. O'Connell (to the upper galleries): I will tell you a secret, and there's enough of you there to keep it "I do not care twopence for the Young Irelanders." (Laughter.)

After an unimportant speech from Mr. O Connell, the rent for the week was announced to be £372 3s. 2d.

Lamentable Affair.—The Galway Mercury contains a notice of an appalling occurrence, which took place last week at Lurgan, near Loughrea, when Mr. John Lalor, who had been for a considerable time past labouring under insanity, set on fire the house in which he resided at Lurgan, and it was consumed to ashes He also shot his sister Sarah, aged 30, whilst endeavouring to induce him to leave the house when burning. The Kilchrist police were immediately on the spot, and it was not until having threatened to fire at him, that they succeeded in removing him from the room; they were then relieved by a few of the Loughrea police, who conducted him to the Loughrea Bridewell. The gun-shot wound inflicted on his sister at once put an end to her existence. She was frequently besought by the servant-maid not to venture into the room, yet she unfortunately persisted, and, on catching hold of him, he pushed her from him, and seized a gun which had been loaded in the room, and at once committed the fatal act. An inquest was held on the body, and the verdict was according to the above circumstances.

Another Murder A man, named John Wallace, residing at Stony Island, near Portumna, county Galway, was inhumanly murdered on Wednesday night (last week), by three armed men, who broke into his house. The taking of land which another tenant had given up, or been obliged to leave, is the only reason that can be assigned.

Death of Lieutenant-Colonel Phillott.—We have to record the demise of this veteran officer, whose name is so familiar to those acquainted with military history. The melancholy event took place a few days since at the gallant officer's residence at Kensington Gore. Though comparatively in subordinate rank, the deceased has seen some distinguished service, during a connection with the British army of upwards of fifty years.

Mr. Ferrand and the Poor-Laws.—It has been arranged between the counsel for both parties that Mr. Ferrand shall show cause in the Queen's Bench on Tuesday next, against the rule obtained by Mr. Lewis, the Poor-Law Commissioner, for alleged libel.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 21, 1846.

The controversy excited by the late Brevet between "the Guards" and "the Line" still continues, and really involves some points of interest beyond the profession itself. The complaint of the Line is, that for a light and honorary service the Guards get an undue and disproportionate share of substantial rewards; they have a marked preference shown them in regard to promotion. The dispute turns upon the state of things since the Peace; as in the last war the Guards were employed abroad, and did their duty, as English soldiers, of whatever branch of the service they may be, will do it. The Guards do not appear able to disprove the rapid advance of their officers over the heads of those of the Line; but, in defence, or we should rather say reply, allege the foreign service above alluded to, and state they furnished two battalions in the disturbances in Canada, and others which were, under Mr. Canning's Ministry, sent for five months to Portugal. Of this there can be no doubt; but to build on this, or on the nature of the duties at home, a claim of hard service, as hard service is understood in the Line, is scarcely a successful attempt.

All our Indian wars and the Colonial service for the last thirty years have been carried on by the Line; the duties of the privates of the Guards cannot, with the quicker military reliefs, equal those of the London Police, in which force the hours of duty, in all weathers, are from nine in the evening till six in the morning; and, in bad neighbourhoods, the men are exposed to peril of life and limb from all kinds of ruffianism and violence. Mounting Guard at Windsor, St. James's, the Bank, and the door of the Opera, can hardly be compared in hardship to this; and, in proportion, the duty of an officer of the Guards must be still lighter; indeed one can hardly conceive how he gets rid of his time; his greatest enemy must be tedium and ennui. We may rely on it, the contrast of duties between the Line and the Guards is often made, especially when one of the privileged body is raised per saltum over the heads of his harder working comrades. This state of things is the remnant of a very ancient system; when Monarchs had great power, they had often great interest in attaching to their persons a body of troops, especially if the people were disaffected and turbulent. In the richness of their dress and arms, and greater pay, the Guards of the Palace and the Royal Person have generally been on a superior footing to the rest of the Army. It is not improbable that the same cause of complaint existed between the soldiers of the Roman legions (the most hard-worked troops that ever existed) and the pampered and insolent cohorts of the Prætorian Guard at Rome; by continually purchasing their zeal and fidelity, the latter Roman Emperors at last converted their Guards into their masters, and those who were retained to defend the Imperial person, frequently assassinated their Sovereign to sell the throne to the highest bidder. Their profligacy was the cause of the Roman sceptre falling into the hands of such worthless wretches as we find among the rulers of that Empire in its "decline and fall." A sufficient "donative" would secure the election of any man, even of one they personally despised. The Jannisaries of Turkey, and the Mamelukes of Egypt, became in the same manner powerful and dangerous, and were exterminated. The favour and preference of the Sovereign drawing a distinction between the troops attached to the Royal person and the bulk of the army, has an injurious effect both on the privileged and the (by comparison) slighted; one becomes supercilious, the other discontented. In England, the causes that led Monarchs to draw an armed guard round them with such jealousy and care, have ceased to exist; the people at large are the defenders of their Queen, and the service of a special armed force is now only an honorary one—part of the retinue and splendour of Royalty, but not needed for its safety. It becomes then a matter of consideration whether, by retaining any privileges like those complained of, the shadows of the old "donatives," which were but the compelled generosity of suspicious or worthless Monarchs, we do not sow dissensions between different portions of the army, without even the semblance of a reason for it.

When a steady sailing ship is seen "steering wild" it is probably because the strong hand has been taken from the helm. If it was not known, from direct evidence, that Prince Metternich, aged and infirm, is no longer what he has been, it might be guessed that his shrewd, cold, intellect has ceased to be the guiding power of Austria; the wild, sanguinary, and foolish policy that Court has lately pursued belongs to a rasher, younger, more unpractised, school; the Galician massacres exhibited hatred, national and religious; and hatred, or, indeed, feeling of any kind, so savagely displayed does not enter into the older system. Metternich, like Talleyrand, would at any time have committed a crime rather than a blunder; the arming the peasants of Tarnow against the proprietors, was both blended together; nothing could furnish stronger evidence of the decay of the great Minister's powers, than the possibility of such an occurrence under his Administration. Of many a coolly-calculated deed of cruelty and oppression has he been guilty; but, of folly and insanity he could never be accused. Two other events have just occurred, in which we imagine the decay of Metternich's influence may be traced. The marriage of the Duke de Bordeaux is openly stated to have been arranged by the family of the Empress of Austria, against the Minister's advice; and, now, his work at the Congress of Vienna is undone—the independent existence of Cracow, as a Republic, is destroyed. It is to be absorbed into, or "annexed" to, Austria; the last faint shadow of Polish nationality disappears with it. Is it not to be apprehended that an extreme or violent party is getting the ascendancy at Vienna? This step will, or ought, to draw Protests from all the powers who were parties to the Treaty of Vienna; but a Protest will not restore even the pitiful mockery of a State that Cracow presented; it was established as a sacrifice to appearances: real intention of fostering a Polish nationality the statesmen of the Congress could have had none: what a magnificent contempt must they have had of a world they thought it possible so to blind, and how they must have laughed in secret at the idea of one small city being "independent" so surrounded! The bark canoe of the Indian, wedged among the crashing and grinding of mighty icebergs, has much the same tenure of existence.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

Return of the Court to the Isle of Wight.—The Queen and Prince Albert, accompanied by the Royal Family, and attended by the ladies and gentlemen of the Royal suite, arrived at Osborne House, Isle of Wight, at half-past one o'clock on Wednesday, from Windsor Castle. In the afternoon, the Royal children rode on ponies, and walked in the pleasure grounds. It is understood that her Majesty will again hold her Court at Windsor Castle on or about the 11th of the ensuing month, and that, in the meantime, on Tuesday, the 1st of December, she will honour the Master of the Horse with her presence for a day or two at Arundel Castle.

Visit of her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent to the Queen Dowager.—The Duchess of Kent has left Frogmore House for Cashiobury Park, to pay a visit to her Majesty the Queen Dowager, where her Royal Highness will remain for a week or ten days, during the absence of the Court from Windsor Castle.

Privy Council.—Last Saturday, the Queen held a Privy Council at Windsor Castle. It was attended by his Royal Highness Prince Albert and the Ministers. At the Council, her Majesty having been pleased to appoint the Right Hon. George Earl of Cowper to be Lord Lieutenant of the county of Kent, his Lordship was introduced, and took the customary oaths. A déjeuner was served to the Ministers in the Castle after their arrival. At half-past four o'clock the Ministers took their departure, proceeding to the Slough station, and left for London by a special train.

Lord Palmerston's Cabinet Dinner.—Viscount Palmerston gave a Cabinet Dinner on Wednesday evening, at his residence, Carlton-terrace, when, among those of his colleagues present, were the Marquis of Lansdowne, Lord John Russell, the Lord Chancellor, the Earl of Clarendon, the Earl of Minto, Earl Grey, Viscount Morpeth, the Marquis of Clanricarde, the Right Hon. Charles Wood, Lord Campbell, the Earl of Auckland, the Right Hon. Sir George Grey, the Right Hon. T B. Macaulay, and Sir John Cam Hobhouse.

Party at Kensington Palace.—The Duchess of Inverness received the Earl and Countess Grey, and a distinguished circle, on Tuesday evening, at Kensington Palace.

Aristocratic Marriage.—We have to record the celebration of an alliance between the members of two of the principal families of South Wales, namely, the marriage of the only child of Sir Benj. and Lady Hall, of Llanover and Abercarn, to J. Arthur Jones, Esq., of Llanarth Tre Owen and Penllwyn, which took place on Thursday 12th inst. A large party of wedding guests, consisting of the friends and relatives of both families, assembled at Llanarth, Clytha, and both the houses of Llanover, the beginning of the week, when dancing and music enlivened the assembled guests, balls taking place every evening, attended by the neighbouring families. On the morning of the 12th, at about nine o'clock, the procession started from Llanover, preceded by a large escort of the Llanover tenants, on horseback, two and two, each bearing a small white flag. The cavalcade was met within four miles of Llanarth by the bridegroom and his uncle, the Earl of Fingall, and O. Morgan, Esq., M P., leading the Llanarth tenantry, who in like manner preceded the company on horseback to the mansion, contiguous to which is the chapel of the family, where the Right Rev. Dr. Brown, Roman Catholic Bishop of South Wales, had already arrived to perform the ceremony. There were also assembled the Lady Harriet Jones (the mother of the bridegroom), his grandmother (the Venerable Mrs. Jones, of Llanarth), and a large party of the numerous branches of their family. Immediately after the ceremony, the procession returned in the same order in which it came, and being joined by a considerable addition of carriages and four which had arrived from different quarters, during the absence of the party at Llanarth, the procession extended the whole mile from the mansion to the church, where the Bishop of St. David's, the Chancellor of Llandaff, and the Vicars of Abergavenny, Llanover cwm dû, and Nevern had already arrived. The ceremony was performed according to the rites of the Protestant Church, by the Right Rev. Bishop of St. David's, assisted by the Venerable and Rev. Bernard Port, Vicar of Ilam, now in his 90th year, grand uncle to the bride.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

CAMBRIDGE. Nov. 14.

John Wardale, B.A., has been elected a Fellow of Clare Hall.
Henry Keary, B.A., has been appointed Assistant Master of Harrow School.
John Smith, B.A., has been appointed one of the Masters of Brighton College

The Bishopric of Sodor and Man.—We understand that the Rev. John Graham, D D., master of Christ's College, and rector of Wilingham, Cambridgeshire, has been appointed to the Bishopric of Sodor and Man.

Church for the Seamen of the Port of London.—In May last the foundation stone of this church was laid by his Royal Highness Prince Albert, and the building is nearly completed, and will be ready for consecration early in the ensuing year.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

PROPOSED IMPROVEMENTS IN THE CITY.

A very numerous meeting of the inhabitants of the Ward of Farringdon Without, was held on Wednesday at the New Court, Old Bailey, "For the purpose of taking into consideration and protesting against the recently proposed enormous outlay of the Corporation funds in the formation of a new street, whilst the conservation of the health of the citizens generally, and of the poorer fellow citizens, especially, demanded the adoption of the best means for securing such sanatory regulations as the present painful exigencies of the case required."

The subject had been taken into consideration by a meeting of the inhabitants and householders of the ward, on the 11th inst.; but, in consequence of the conflicting opinions then expressed, Alderman Sir James Duke was requested to convene the present meeting, in order that the opponents of the contemplated new street from Cannon-street to Queen-street, might have an opportunity of urging their objections, and stating the measures which, in their judgment, ought to be adopted to improve the sanatory condition of the district.

Sir James Duke was called to the chair.

Mr Walker moved the first resolution—"That this meeting observe with deep regret that the mortuary registers of the last year afford evidence of the great increase of deaths by epidemic diseases in the metropolis and other large towns in the kingdom, arising out of the want of those proper sanatory regulations which it is the bounden duty of the Legislature and of the local authorities to adopt, and the immediate adoption of which this meeting would most earnestly press upon the Corporation of the City of London, including improved habitations for those of the labouring classes who are compelled to dwell within or are contiguous to the City, and that a memorial, founded on this and the preceding resolutions, be presented to the Court of Common Council by Dr. Lynch, and that the other Councilmen of this Ward be requested to give it their most strenuous support."

Mr. Seeley seconded the resolution, which was put from the chair, after considerable discussion, and passed unanimously.

Mr. Anderton, Mr. Taylor, Mr. Bacon, Mr. Gresham, Mr. Carpenter, Dr. Lynch and other gentlemen, having addressed the meeting, and dwelt upon the necessity which existed for the outlay of the Corporation funds in improving the sewage, and in otherwise promoting the sanatory condition of the people, rather than in the construction of spacious streets and imposing public buildings, a memorial to the Common Council was adopted, and copies were directed to be sent to the Chief Secretary of State, the Chief Commissioner of Woods and Forests, and the Commissioners for Metropolitan Improvements.

A vote of thanks was then passed to Sir James Duke.

The Meeting of Parliament.—The Times states that Parliament will assemble on the 19th of January.

Electric Telegraphs in the City. On Tuesday, a deputation waited on the Court of Sewers, at Guildhall, to make an application for permission to lay down the electric telegraph in a part of the City of London. It was stated in the court that, for the protection of the City, it had been enacted that the consent of the Commissioners of Sewers was necessary to lay down any pipe or tube under any street in the City. The deputation stated that the object of the company was to unite the various lines of rails by means of an electric telegraph, and that it had been intended to make the central terminus at the West-end, but it was now resolved to make it at Lloyd's, and the company requested permission to take up the pavement for that purpose. At present the plans of the company were not matured sufficiently to enable the deputation to enter into details. The Commissioners, after deliberation, granted the required permission, and Lloyd's, therefore, will be the great central terminus of all telegraphic communication.

Construction of a New Bridge at Westminster.—It has been definitively arranged by the Westminster-bridge Commissioners, that the present bridge shall be removed. It is therefore intended to apply during the next session for an act to pull down and sell the materials, and to appropriate the proceeds towards the erection of a new bridge, which will be built from the eastern end of Whitehall-place, to Sutton-street, in the York-road, Lambeth. Powers will also be taken in the act to allow the Commissioners to make the following new streets in connexion with the bridge: 1st. A new street from the south side of Charing-cross by the south-west side of Northumberland-house to the north bank of the Thames, near the end of Whitehall-place, passing over Angel-court, Craigs-court, the eastern ends of Great Scotland-yard and Whitehall-place. On the Surrey side of the bridge there will be a new street in a direct line to the east side of the Westminster-road, to Mason-street, Lambeth. On each side of the bridge it is intended to construct large and commodious piers for the use of the steamers plying on the river. The bridge will very much resemble Waterloo-bridge, as it is to be constructed of granite.

Low-priced Autographs.—On Wednesday a sale by auction took place at the auction rooms of Messrs. Southgate and Co., Fleet-street, of a number of autographs, letters, franks, MSS., &c., of several celebrated personages in the English history. The following were the prices realised for some of them: An autograph letter from the Duke of Wellington to Wm. Wordsworth, dated Strathfieldsaye, 10s. 6d.; signatures of the Dukes of Kent and Sussex, as Presidents of the Committee held at Mr. Dent's, Mayfair, July 17, 1813, on the subject of insanity, £1 1s.; an important document on vellum, with the autograph of Charles II., King of England, containing original powers for treating with the French for a neutrality in the West Indies, 6s. 6d.; an autograph of Charles Prince of Wales to a document on vellum, ordering the payment of £50 to the yeomen and grooms of the buckhounds, Sept. 28, 1622, 6s. 6d.; an autograph of Henry VIII. to a document on vellum, ordering the delivery of various articles to one of the ladies attending upon Queen Catharine of Arragon, and another of King Henry VII., also went off at low prices. Among the lot were an autograph letter of John William, Elector Palatine, to King William III.; an autograph of Leopold, Emperor of Germany, to a letter addressed to William III., relating to the siege of Limerick (Vienna, Jan. 4, 1692), the marriage contract between Henry III., King of France, and the Duchess of Angoulême, 1576, &c.

Abolition of the Taxes on Food.—On Monday evening a public meeting was held at Hill's Riding School, Albany-street, Regent's-park, for the purpose of presenting a memorial to the Government to procure the total abolition of all taxes on the importation of food into this country. There were about 700 persons present, who were addressed by Dr. Birt and Mr. Cochrane. A memorial, calling upon the Government to consider the present dearth in this country of a proper supply of food, and to open the ports immediately, was read and agreed to, and a deputation was appointed to present it to the Lords of the Treasury.

Important Reduction in the Price of Bread.—On Tuesday the price of bread underwent a reduction; most excellent quality can now be obtained for 7d. and 7½d., and the best, or "full price," for 8½d. and 9d., being about the same amount as previously charged by the undersellers.

Cheap Metropolitan Travelling.—On Wednesday, a number of omnibuses were started from the Bank to Oxford-street, charging threepence for each passenger. Several omnibuses, on Wednesday, started from between the Bank and Brompton, at the extremely low fare of 2d., being considerably less than one halfpenny per mile. A further reduction has taken place in the fares of the steamboats running from London-bridge to Chelsea, the charge being now twopence the whole distance, or any intermediate station.

POSTSCRIPT.

ANOTHER SERIOUS FIRE AT GRAVESEND.

Early yesterday morning, another fire broke out at Gravesend, which consumed forty houses and numerous other buildings. Singular to say, its locality was the same as the former fires, West-street, extending along the water side from near the Town Pier to the Rosherville Gardens. The fire was first observed from a body of smoke hovering over the premises occupied by Mr. Garretts, grocer, adjacent to the Pier Hotel, at the corner of West-street. The inmates having been got out in safety, steps were taken to bring the Corporation engines, which were soon on the spot, into operation; but the defective state of the water mains enabled the flames to extend themselves to the buildings on each side. The military at Tilbury Fort were mustered by the commanding officer of that fortress, who with every promptitude forwarded them to the assistance of the townspeople. Their efforts, however, were of little avail in stopping the conflagration; for at least four hours the wind, which was blowing a violent gale, completely baffled their operations, and increased the magnitude of the fire to a frightful degree. The scene by four o'clock was most awful; the flames had crossed the street and seven or eight houses were in flames, besides the whole of the premises from the Town Pier to considerably below the Talbot Inn, which was also amongst the number. From the south side of West-street the fire raged upwards, in the direction of the centre of the town, destroying in its course a great number of low dwelling houses in the various courts. These were principally tenanted by poor fishermen, hawkers, labourers, &c, &c In one court there was no thoroughfare, except from the approach in West-street, and that being stopped by the dense body of fire, the greatest anxiety was entertained for the safety of the poor creatures who tenanted it. The police and soldiers, however, bravely exposed themselves in rescuing them, in which they succeeded, by dragging them in at the back windows of the adjacent houses. It was reported, notwithstanding, that one or two persons were missing. No check to the fire was effected until near seven o'clock in the morning. At ten o'clock, however, an immense body of fire existed in every part of the ruins.

The principal portion of the houses that were erected on the site of the fire in West-street are consumed, together with both sides of the street from High-street to King-street. Amongst the buildings destroyed we may mention the Pier Hotel, Talbot Inn, Punch Bowl Tavern, and all the intermediate wharfs and buildings

With respect to the origin, suspicions are entertained that it was not the result of accident. The chief bulk of the property is insured in the Sun, Phœnix, Exchange, Licensed Victuallers', and Kent Fire Offices.

Cabinet Council.—Another Cabinet Council is to be held to-day.

The Ministry.—In the Court of Queen's Bench, yesterday morning, Lord John Russell (First Lord of the Treasury), the Marquis of Lansdowne (Lord President of the Council), Earl Grey (Secretary for the Colonies), Lord Palmerston (Secretary for Foreign Affairs), the Right Hon. Charles Wood (Chancellor of the Exchequer), and Lord Auckland (First Lord of the Admiralty), severally took the usual oaths of allegiance and supremacy, and that they would not exercise any authority they might possess, in virtue of their respective offices, to the injury of the Established Church.

Compensation for Injury by a Railway Company.—On Wednesday a writ of enquiry was heard before the Sheriff of Warwickshire, in the Shire-hall, Warwick, to assess damages in an action in judgment by default, brought by Mr. Haywood, attorney in Birmingham, against the London and Birmingham Railway Company, for injuries sustained by his wife through alleged gross negligence of their servants. The damages were laid at £500. Evidence was given that Mrs. Haywood had sustained severe injury from a concussion which took place on the line, near Coventry. One of her eyes had been much injured; she had lost her sense of smell, and her mental powers had been deteriorated. The Jury found for the plaintiffs Damages, £300; costs, 40s. In a second case, in which Mr. Hayword alone was plaintiff, to recover expenses to which he had necessarily been put by the illness of his wife, such as medical attendance, travelling, &c., a verdict was taken for the plaintiff, by consent, for £70; costs, 40s

Outrage and Attempted Robbery near Preston.—On Tuesday night, a daring outrage occurred at Broughton, about three miles from Preston, at the residence of W. Miller, Esq, surveyor and land steward. Mr. Miller's house is at some distance from any other residence. About six o'clock in the evening, Mr. Miller and his daughter being in the house, and no other persons there but a female servant, a smart knock was given at the front door, on which Mr. Miller observed, "It is some gentleman from Preston who wishes to see me on business." The door was opened by Miss Miller, when six men, armed with pistols, made a rush into the house, two of them subsequently retreating back, and remaining in front of the house. Miss Miller, terrified by the villains, cried out, "Thieves, thieves," making at the same time a rush towards the lawn in front of the house, when one of the men outside shouted out, "Grab her." At the same moment a pistol was fired at her, which was immediately followed by the firing of another. Miss Miller then ran to the house of a neighbour, screaming out "Murder." Meanwhile the villains had gained full access to the house, and one, presenting a pistol at Mr. Miller, said, "We want your money." He told them he had none; upon which the men said, "We know you have." Mr. Miller again denied it, and called to the servant, whom the robbers had forced into an adjoining room, to ring the bell. At her master's call, the servant commenced ringing the bell, on which the men looked one at another in amazement, and then ran away. In less than ten minutes from the alarm bell having been rung, a number of neighbours arrived. From the cool determination evinced by the whole gang, there can be little doubt that the lives of the whole family would have been sacrificed, had it not been for the escape of Miss Miller and the ringing of the alarm bell. On Miss Miller returning home, with a neighbouring farmer, she was much exhausted, and it was discovered that her life had been in the most imminent peril, the contents of one of the pistols having grazed the front part of her head, to the extent of about three inches. She bled considerably, but we are glad to say is in no danger.

LATEST FOREIGN NEWS.

FRANCE.

Considerable excitement has been caused in Paris by the announcement that the three Northern Powers intend to place Cracow under the direct influence of Austria. The fact is looked upon as a determination to deprive Poland even of the slightest power, particularly as three Polish newspapers which had existed for some time in Paris had been suppressed. The news created a sort of panic on 'Change on Wednesday, and had great influence upon railway shares. All the railways without exception declined, the North falling from 636f. 25c. to 627f. 50c., indeed, at one time during the day, these shares fell to 625f.

A very useful Royal ordonnance has been issued for the future regulation of all railways in France. This ordonnance contains not less than 78 articles. The following are the principal points referred to:—The stations are to be considered part of the public domain, and as such to be regulated by the superior authorities. Locomotives are in the first instance to be subjected to certain proofs of strength, for the boilers, axletrees, wheels, &c. All companies are bound to furnish a sufficient number of carriages of every description to supply the wants of each station. The hours fixed by the company for departure are to be rigorously observed. As the public, in a great measure, are dependent on railways for their mode of transport, these two regulations are absolute on all companies whatever; when any exception to this rule is permitted, as in the case of direct trains, it is the Government authorities who must regulate the matter. In cases of fête, or extraordinary movement from one point to another, the company is obliged to provide an additional and sufficient number of carriages of every class; the number of carriages for a single train is not to exceed twenty-four, and this is to be considered rather as the exception than the rule. Double locomotives are permitted, as otherwise trains would be multiplied to a dangerous extent. A means of communication must always be established between the conductor and the engine-driver. A number of articles refer to the measures of precaution to be used in starting trains at proper hours, so as to leave a sufficient time between each; the maximum of speed, the precautions to be taken in passing through tunnels, &c.; they also regulate the passage of extraordinary trains; the obligation of communicating by signals; and the general superintendence of the line. Registers are to be kept at every station for marking down the causes of all delays. No train is ever to leave before the hour appointed in the printed lists. The conditions of the concession generally regulate the tariffs; but a company may lower its prices, if it thinks fit, subject, however, to the condition of keeping them so for a certain time. As a general rule, however, no changes whatever can be made by the company without first submitting them to the Government authorities. Railways that have been conceded prior to 1835 will not be subject to these regulations until April 1, 1847. All persons unconnected with the company and the service are forbidden to enter the premises of a railway without permission, or to there stand or circulate, or to place there objects of any kind, or to introduce horses, dogs, or other animals, or to cause vehicles of any kind to circulate there. Every person employed by a railway company must wear a uniform, [illegible] that the public may at once see, in case of need, to whom they are to apply. Signal-men, guards, and barrier-keepers may wear a [illegible]. At each station a book must be kept to receive the complaints of passengers.

The Paris papers of Wednesday state that M. Very, son of the celebrated restaurateur, died on Sunday, in that capital, under extraordinary circumstances. He had been spending the day in the country; and, on returning to Paris, complained of being rather chilly; but, having warmed himself at the [illegible] to table, and made a hearty dinner. After dinner a rubber of whist was played, and, about eleven o'clock, M. Very, who had his wife for partner, was chatting good-humouredly with one of his friends. The conversation turned upon age; and his friend remarked that he felt he was growing old, as he was fifty-three past. M. Very replied: "At fifty a man is still young. I am fifty myself; and was never in better health!" Before finishing what he had to say, his head fell, and he gave a convulsive laugh. His friend placed him on a sofa, but life was already extinct.

THE REVOLUTION IN PORTUGAL.

We yesterday received news from Portugal by the smack Marys, which left Lisbon on the 11th inst. [illegible] some importance, alt[illegible] packet left the Tagus, Lisbon was in a state of great confusion and excitement, and fears were generally entertained that the success of the Queen's troops was very doubtful, although no news had reached of any decisive engagement having taken place between Saldanha and the popular faction. The British squadron was in a state of instant preparation for receiving and protecting the Queen and family, if deemed necessary, and no sailors or marines had landed. The American frigate which had sailed for Oporto was not only not allowed to enter, but had been fired upon by the batteries and totally dismasted, and had been towed into a neighbohring port. Business was completely at a stand-still when the Marys left. The Marys has brought no letters whereby to gain detailed information. Under these circumstances, the next arrival is looked for with great anxiety.

COUNTRY NEWS.

EXPLOSION NEAR BIRMINGHAM, AND LOSS OF NINETEEN LIVES.

On Tuesday morning an explosion of fire-damp took place in one of Mr. Parker's high-pressure pits at Round-green, New Colliery, near Oldbury, about five miles from Birmingham, by which nineteen men were killed. Another lies in a hopeless state, and several others are severely injured. About half-past 5, the first relay of the colliers went down the shaft. About half an hour after, the "bulty," or manager, and his son, went down in a skip; at six, four others followed; and by seven, five-and-twenty men had descended to the works. One of these was the "doggy," or person whose duty it is to prove the pit with a safety-lamp before the colliers go to work, but who, on this melancholy occasion, does not appear to have taken this precaution. After the men had sent up four skips of coal, an explosion took place, shaking the ground to a considerable distance. and followed by the emission of smoke and flame from the shaft. The banksman in attendance at the mouth of the pit instantly gave the alarm, and several men from the neighbouring quarry went down the shaft. With difficulty the bodies of sixteen men were got up, the shaft being 180 yards in depth. Three were subsequently recovered alive, but died soon after they were brought to the top. Another was almost hopelessly injured; the remaining four escaped unhurt. The dead bodies presented a shocking sight, the whole being dreadfully scorched and burnt; and, altogether, the scene was one of the most calamitous description.

The following are the names of the sufferers; they are nearly all married men, and most of them have left families in very distressed circumstances:—Joseph Troth, aged 22; Jacob Boden, 15; John Windmill, 48; Samuel Boden; George H[illegible]; William Tarrant, 28; Josiah Parkes, 23; John Garbett, 25; William Price, 35; William Lyman, 14; Isaac Duffield, 10; William Masefield, 23; John Hampton, 16; William Hampton, 10; James Wilcox, 33; Job Holland, 56; James Elwell, 32; Joseph Smith, 34: James Shakspeare, 53.

On Wednesday morning, an inquest was held at the Talbot Inn, before Mr. Hinchley, on four of the bodies. At the commencement of the inquiry, the Coroner expressed the difficulty he experienced in obtaining evidence which could throw light on the cause of the sad accident. The "bulty" and "doggy" were both killed. Three-and-twenty men went down the pit; of that number 19 were already dead, and of the four survivors one was severely burnt. With a view to facilitate the proceedings he would classify the cases, but the same evidence would apply to each case. Those he intended to take first were Joseph Troth, Jacob Boden, John Windmill, and Samuel Boden.

The Jury, having been sworn, proceeded to view the bodies of these four men. They were laid out in the cottages of their families, and presented a dreadful sight, being so scorched and disfigured as to make it difficult to identify them.

Harriette Latimer gave evidence in regard to the identity of the bodies.

Thomas Royle said—I live at Brown's Green; am banksman at Mr. Parker's coal-pit, at Newberry-lane, Oldbury. I was there when the men went down into the pit yesterday morning. The first men went down about half-past five o'clock. I saw Troth, Windmill, and the two Bodens go down about six o'clock. I saw Holland, the "bulty," go down the pit, but whether it was before or after the four men named went down I don't know. I generally went down with them. That was my practice. Joseph Smith was the "doggy" of the pit, and submanager under Mr. Holland. He went down before Mr. Holland about half-an-hour yesterday morning. Five-and-twenty men went down the pit on that occasion. Mr. Thomas Haines was the ground bailiff of the works. It was not his business to attend regularly and go down the pit. I knew nothing of the accident until after the explosion. Mr. Haines went down several times afterwards. A little before seven o'clock, I heard a great noise, as if gunpowder had gone off, and the fire showed itself at the top of the pit. I made an alarm immediately, and several men came from a stone pit adjoining. When they came, we got the ropes as soon as we could, and some men went down, when, amongst others, the persons respecting whom this inquiry is instituted were brought up. Some of the men who went down to assist the sufferers were brought up insensible. Sixteen were brought up dead out of the pit; five others were seriously injured, and four escaped unhurt. Three out of the five who were seriously injured, have since died. I cannot say whether or not the doggy took down the safety lamp with him yesterday morning. Sometimes he did, and sometimes he did not. There are generally safety lamps in the pit, but sometimes they are brought out to be cleaned.

Some other witnesses were examined, but nothing additional of interest was elicited, and the inquiry was adjourned.

Another inquest on some of the bodies was also held at Dudley on Wednesday, but it was ultimately adjourned until Monday next.

The Cobden Fund.—The increase during the past week amounts to £207 10s. 8d. making a grand total of £77,145 16s. 10d.

Movement at Liverpool for the Reduction of the Duty on Tea. On Tuesday a deputation from the Liverpool Association for the Reduction of the Duty on Tea, met a number of gentlemen of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce and the Manchester Commercial Association. Some conversation ensued as to the objects of the Liverpool Association, the evils of the high duties on tea, and the means it was taking to awaken attention to the subject in various mercantile and manufacturing communities. It was stated in the course of the conversation, that the Liverpool Association had sent deputations to Leeds and other towns in England, and also to the principal cities and towns of Scotland and Ireland, with the view of establishing local associations, and obtaining the co-operation of these communities in the movement to be made for the reduction of the tea duties.

Opening of the Bedford Railway.—On Tuesday the line of railway recently completed betwixt Bletchley and the town of Bedford, forming a branch of the Great London and North-Western Railway, was formally opened by the Directors, who, with a large party of their friends, chiefly belonging to Bedford and its neighbourhood, passed and re-passed along the newly-formed line, preparatory to its being opened for traffic to the public. The Duchess of Bedford and a party from Woburn Abbey were among the spectators at the station, when the train arrived. The Bedford Railway, which has been thus opened, is about 16½ miles long, and has been of very easy construction. It runs almost upon a dead level, the gradients being what are called first-class, with the exception of a short run of 1 in 128 The cost per mile was from £16,000 to £17,000. The district through which the line has been carried is purely agricultural; but there are, nevertheless, five stations, at which exceedingly neat offices have been erected, all in the style of those built by the Duke of Bedford over his estate. The prospect from the railway embraces few points of interest to the casual traveller. At a little distance may be seen the village where the celebrated John Bunyan was born; and a short line of rail which leaves the main terminus at Bedford is carried down to the banks of the Ouse—a stream which will recall to the visitors the memory of the hapless poet Cowper.

THE TEMPERANCE CAUSE:

OPENING OF THE MATHEW AND CITY OF LONDON TOWER, AT MOUNTPATRICK.

A magnificent Testimonial to the exertions of Father Mathew in the Temperance Movement has just been completed at Mountpatrick, by Mr. William O'Connor, and was opened, with due ceremony, on the 9th instant The day may appears to have been singularly chosen; for the occasion and the proceedings were antipodal to our metropolitan festivities, on the time-honoured 9th of November; and, by the way, the intention of the Testimonial is to commemorate the hospitable reception given to the Temperance Missionary by the citizens of London. However, there are various kinds of hospitality: it may be as genuine over tea and muffins as over oceans of claret; and this we take to be the Milesian view of the matter. The Temperance Movement has, at all times, received due illustration at our hands; and, by the aid of the clever artist, Mr. James Mahony, we are now enabled to present this additional commemoration in our pages. We rejoice in doing so, for two reasons: first, because the cause is a righteous one; and, secondly, because it has called forth much artistical taste in the present design and execution.

The Testimonial is a massive Tower, which has been erected at the sole expense of Mr. O'Connor to celebrate the kind reception given to Father Mathew by the right-minded Londoners in the year 1843, upon the occasion of his first Temperance Visit; and the 9th instant being the anniversary of laying the foundation-stone, that day was appropriately chosen for the opening of the building, and the hoisting, for the first time, of the Union Jack, on its summit; where, despite of all brawlers to the contrary, long may it continue to wave!

About half-past one o'clock, a great number of ladies and gentlemen assembled in Mr. O'Connor's demesne, and were conducted by that gentleman to the Tower, where he pointed out to them the many objects of interest which it presents. The visitors were first conducted to the second apartment, or what might be called the dining-room. It is circular, about sixteen feet in diameter. The windows are in the Gothic style, the upper portions being filled with stained glass. The window frames and cases are of fluted oak, and the latter are surmounted with carved heads; over these is some splendidly executed stucco work, which is continued along the entire ceiling, and gives the apartment a classic air. In a niche between two of the windows stands, on a handsome rosewood pedestal, and covered with a glass shade, an exquisite marble bust of the Very Rev. T. Mathew, by Hogan; and above this is a bust of the venerable Bishop, the Right Rev. Doctor Murphy. This apartment is also adorned by a massive chimney-piece, on the front of which is a small basso-relievo figure of Father Mathew, holding Britannia and Erin by either hand, surrounded by the emblems of both countries; and from the centre of the ceiling hangs a very beautiful chandelier. The party next proceeded to the top of the larger portion of the Tower, to see the flag hoisted on the Staircase Tower, which is 20 feet higher, being nearly 100 feet from the base. Amongst the gentlemen then present were Father Mathew; the Rev. James O'Regan; the Rev. Michael O'Donovan, Captain Irvine (who laid the foundation stone), J P.; Charles Mathew and son; Thomas F. Meagher, Waterford; Henry Meagher, Waterford; Michael J. Barry; —— Flanagan, Tullamore; Robert D. Beamish; William O'Connor; John Donegan; Daniel Keleher; and Daniel Casey.

The splendid flag, presented by Captain Waggett, is in size 20 feet by 14, and was prepared for hoisting, amid the firing of cannon and the music of several bands.

Mr. O'Connor then came forward, and having presented the cordage, &c., to Captain Irvine, said It was now three years since that respected and dignified gentleman had laid the foundation stone of the edifice on which they were assembled, and though he (Mr. O'Connor) regretted his inability to do justice to his merits, he was satisfied that such as knew him felt there was no necessity for eulogizing his worth (Cheers.) He had not the least regret for the motives which actuated him in building that edifice (hear, hear), for though many said it was an expensive undertaking, yet, with the same views he then and still entertained, he would not consider ten times the expense misapplied for such a purpose (hear, hear), and if he could raise the tower to ten times its present height it would still be unequal to the dignity and moral grandeur of the services of him of whose labours it was commemorative. (Hear, and cheers.) A greater impression was never made on an individual than upon him at witnessing the kindly reception Father Mathew met with from the highest classes of society in London. He (Mr. O'Connor) was walking in the Strand with an English gentleman, when they heard of the meeting, and his friend having expressed a desire to be introduced to Father Mathew, he (Mr. O'C.) introduced him, and he was so struck with the respect and attention evinced towards Father Mathew by all the nobility and men of distinction present, that he resolved, on his return to Ireland, to commemorate it in some manner; and soon afterwards, when walking over the grounds they were now on, it struck him that the site would be a most eligible one to build a tower on, which would perpetuate Father Mathew's fame, and, at the same time, signify his gratitude for the reception he had met with in London (hear, hear)—and he felt assured that it was only necessary the people of both countries should know each other better and more intimately to create more kindly feelings between both. (Hear, hear.) He never thought he should see English noblemen and men of wealth kneel before an Irish Priest to take the pledge of Temperance, for though intimate he (Mr. O'Connor) was with Father Mathew, he had not yet converted him. (Laughter.)

Father Mathew—(To the Reporter)—I beg you won't take that down. (Great laughter.)

Mr. O'Connor, in conclusion, expressed a hope that Father Mathew would be long spared to bless the country by his services, and he begged to thank the gentlemen present for their attendance on the occasion. (Cheers.)

A letter was then read from Colonel Cruttenden, regretting his inability to be present.

Captain Ivrine then addressed the party assembled, and congratulated them on the erection of the tasteful and liberal testimonial of Mr. O'Connor to the merits of Father Mathew. The cord which bound the Union Jack was then handed to the gallant Captain; and, in an instant after, the flag floated in the breeze from the summit of the Tower, amid the firing of guns and the enthusiastic cheering of those assembled.

The Very Rev. Mr. Mathew expressed his deep gratitude to his much respected friend Mr. O'Connor, for the elegant and tasteful manner in which he had complimented him by the erection of so noble a building; and he felt also most grateful to his friends around him, for their presence on an occasion which to the last hour of his life he should remember with pride and pleasure. (Cheers.)

The Rev. Mr O'Regan then made some able and eloquent observations, which we regret not being able to give at length; after which, two oak trees were planted near the house, one by Father Mathew and the other by Master Robert Delacour Beamish, the bands playing "Hearts of Oak," and the company then separated.

In the evening, a party of friends were most hospitably entertained at Mount Patrick; and next day five hundred quartern loaves were, on the order of Mr. O'Connor, sent from Mr. W. Casey's bakery, and distributed to the poor.

On Monday night, the Tower was brilliantly illuminated, and the effect, from its elevated situation, was very grand and imposing. Upwards of a thousand variegated lamps were tastefully arranged in the windows; and a profusion of lamps the same size as those used for the street gas-lights, were arranged on the balustrade round the building, which, with lighted tar barrels on the hills about, formed a most attractive spectacle.

On this balustrade, too, are stone figures of Faith, Hope, Charity, Fidelity, &c. Lamps were also hung round a stone statue of Father Mathew, which stands behind an elegant jet-d'eau.

From seven to nine o'clock, a display of fire-works of every variety was kept up; rockets in quick succession shot up in the dark clouds, while blue lights, wheels, and every other form of illumination, afforded amusement to the crowds who thronged the grounds to a late hour.

Our Artist has sketched the principal room in the London Testimonial or Tower, and a view of the exterior. Of the latter, Mr. Mahoney has had the honour to present to her Majesty, enclosed in a highly enriched Arabesque border, in gold and colours.

THE GREAT WELLINGTON STATUE AND ARCH.

THE GREAT WELLINGTON STATUE.

Ecce, iterum! the Wellington Group, placed upon the pedestal for which the Artist's Commission strictly stated it was to be executed, namely, the Green Park Arch; after the Royal consent had been given to that arrangement.

Yet, the Committee and Sub-Committee of the Subscription were not permitted to carry out their compact with the subscribers to the fund, without assenting to the location of the Statue being subject to the decision of "competent persons," as to its artistical fitness.

The question has been submitted, by the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, to the Royal Academicians, a large majority of whom have given their opinion in favour of the removal of the Statue from the position which it occupies in our Engraving; and this recommendation will, doubtless, be carried into execution; we suppose, so soon as a pedestal suitable for the reception of the Statue shall have been designed by other "competent persons."

We do not admire the taste, nor the sense of propriety, which has dictated this shifting of the Statue; for, just as the public opinion began to be pretty decidedly expressed in favour of the location, the dicta of a few were allowed to set aside what was fast growing to be the opinion of the public: besides winning some influential converts to its appropriateness.

We have already fully described and graphically illustrated the design and execution of this magnificent group, (see No. 219 of our Journal); as well as the effective ceremonial of placing the great work upon its promised pedestal. (See No. 231, in which we have detailed the Statue and the Arch, at considerable length.)

Again, at No. 224, page 105, our Artist has placed the Statue, as it were, experimentally, upon the Arch, viewed from two prominent points. Therefore, little remains to be said, upon our own part, but to express our opinion that the removal of the Statue from its present position is neither justified by rule nor circumstance

Here, par parenthése, we may quote the opinion of one of the "competent persons" (before the group was fixed), that "the solecism consists in the proposition to place a statue of colossal dimensions as an ornament to a triumphal arch of disproportionate magnitude, so that the ornament and the principal are in danger of changing places, and the major may become subordinate to the minor." How far this apprehension of "one of the responsible professors of fine art in the metropolis" has been needless, we need scarcely point out to the reader; for, since the raising of the Statue, little or nothing has been heard of its colossal disproportion to the Arch!

In conclusion, we must observe that the Statue, in its present position, has not been seen so as to be properly estimated. It is notorious to all who inspected the Group before it was fixed, that the three-quarter, or almost front view, (engraved at page 213 of the present Volume), is by far the finest portion of the design; yet, owing to the scaffolding not being entirely removed, the great work has not been seen at its best point since it has been fixed. Again, the pedestal has not been completed; and, altogether, the decision for "the removal" can scarcely meet with the approval of the unprejudiced.

The annexed View, we should add, has been taken from the archway of the Hyde-park screen, next Apsley House.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

We have now turned the Feast of All Souls, and the season of Diana has set in. Hunting has everywhere commenced—nowhere more earnestly than in those districts known as the metropolitan countries. We purpose a few pen-and-ink sketches of these for the amusement, haply, of our readers; at all events, for their guidance, what time the bent of their inclinations or convenience may lead them to cultivate woodcraft. As becomes us, we address our first essay to our brethren of the great capital. Need we say that for them we design the sport of Hunting the hart in forest green?

Fox-hunting within five-and-twenty miles of Charing-cross is, at best, but sorry work. It was but the other day that, dining in company with a right good old sportsman who don't live a thousand miles from Windsor Castle, we heard him declare that, during the last hundred times he was out with a well-known pack which occasionally draws the Park and forests, he never saw a fox that gave a half hour's run. The Staghunter, then, has to choose between the Royal, Baron Rothschild's and the Surrey; we mean, of course, the London particular. Most probably he will select the former; comparisons are odious but they "cap" half sovereigns with the Surrey—it's no libel to state that small peculiarity. If he will accept our counsel he will eschew the Queen's, when they foregather at such places as the Magpies, or the Harrow country, and the like, and taste the flavour of my Lord Grenville's bow-wows farther afield. Those who reach the meeting by means of the Great Western Rail, over a champagne luncheon at Dotesio's, get their gallop, but sadly sacrifice the picturesque Suppose, for instance, that the turn out is fixed for Ascot Heath, or say an extreme outside meet, Binfield or Winkfield. Let them order their grooms to go forward with their horses overnight to Sunninghill Wells, and follow themselves in the morning, by the seven A.M. train of the South-Western Railway, which will never stop till it deposits them at Woking. Thence a fly, or some such contrivance in locomotion, will carry them to the Wells, through such a territory as no Cockney could compass to conceive existing this side of the Oregon frontier. Within fifty minutes or thereabouts of Temple Bar lies a mighty wilderness yclept Woking Common, containing—modesty prevents our stating how many thousands of acres. The people, like the place, are perfectly primæval, having literally the land in common among them. But the term wilderness is not to be taken in disparagement. Woking Common is no worse than all things in nature—human nature included—are prone to be when neglected. Here and there the cultivated patches show like golden oases. The allotments apportioned to the poor of the parish of Chobham bear as fine crops of wheat as the best farmed land in Norfolk but this is a digression.

The advantages of stag hunting to the dwellers in this mighty metropolis are manifest. It insures them sport. There are no blank days for those (no banyan days, as Jack would say) who carry their venison with them. The certainty of a run is a commercial consideration to a man who, perhaps, don't get a peep at a horse more than once a-week: living is four-and-twenty shillings and sixpence for seven days—nil including the ostler. That individual—always supposing him possessed of a hunter—cannot do better than betake himself to the Royal pack, when it hunts anywhere beyond Windsor, or its circle. He will meet a sportsman in the master, first-rate artists in the servants, and such a lot of hounds as Actæon would have thought it a compliment to have been eaten by. What character of sport he may anticipate he will probably gather from the samples of it which anon we will lay before him.

TATTERSALL'S.

Monday.—Businesss continues surprisingly brisk at the Corner, that is, brisk for the season. But there is a great majority of round betters, and, in consequence, the prices in some cases are downward, a natural result of competition The quotations underneath show very few changes worth notice; we may, however, select the Sister to Cobweb colt, the Marpessa colt, and Old Port, as having been slightly on the decline, not from any want of friends, but from the cause we have mentioned. We subjoin the latest averages:—

M. Minasi.—The Election of the National Benevolent Institution, at which the venerable and distressed artist, Minasi, is a candidate for the third time, will take place on Thursday next, the 26th instant, when we hope to see this meritorious claimant successful.

The National Club.—On Tuesday evening, a public meeting of the inhabitants of Kennington and its vicinity was held at the Horns Tavern, in support of the recently-formed National Club, at which Lieutenant-Colonel Sir Digby Mackworth, Bart., presided. The meeting was addressed by the chairman and several other speakers, and resolutions were passed for the formation of a branch association, under the title of "Surrey Protestant Alliance."

Fall of Three Houses and Loss of Life.—On Thursday, last week, three newly-erected and unfinished houses in Alfred-place, Brompton, fell down. Three men were at work, and one of them, named Casey, was buried in the ruins. One of the other men was much hurt. The mutilated body of Casey was discovered, and an inquest held on Wednesday last. After hearing several witnesses, as to the nature of the materials and the character of the work, the jury returned the following special verdict:—"That the deceased, James Casey, was killed by the sudden falling of certain houses in Alfred-place, West, and that the houses so fell because they were not securely built; and in returning this verdict the jury express their consideration (founded on the evidence and opinions laid before them) that the said houses were built more rapidly than they ought to have been built, considering the dampness of the weather, the height of the houses, and the directions of the Act of Parliament, which compelled the builders to construct the party walls without bond timber. At the same time the jury hope that next year the erection of party walls with and without bond timber, will be made the subject of legislative investigation, through the evidence of practical working builders, carpenters, and bricklayers, with a view to ensure a safe mode of erecting places constructed chiefly of bricks. The jury, moreover, cannot separate without stating their conviction that an effectual supervision of the work in all its divisions was not exercised by the persons having authority over it at the time when the houses in question were being built.

MUSIC.

SOCIETY OF BRITISH MUSICIANS.

The scheme for the Second Concert was better in quality, and executed with more steadiness, than the opening programme. The Director was Mr. C. E. Stephens, and the accompanyist Mr W. S. Rockstro. Two German songs, composed by the latter, the poetry by Eichendorff and Goethe, were well rendered by Miss Duval, and are clever inspirations. There was merit, also, in a Bacchanalian song, given with correctness by Mr. W. H. Seguin, composed by Howard Glover, a son of the actress, and a musician of promise. Mrs. G. A. à Beckett's song, "My home must be," the words by Mark Lemon, was expressively interpreted by Miss Rainforth, who also joined Miss Duval in Mendelssohn's two-part song, "Greeting." Mozart's terzetto from "Figaro," sung by the above-named vocalists, completed the vocal gleanings. The instrumental pieces were Beethoven's Trio in E Flat, No. 1, op 1, for piano (Miss Calkin), violin (Mr. Gattie), and violoncello (Mr. W. L. Phillips); Haydn's Quartet in G, No. 1, op. 80, for two violins (Mellon and T. Westrop), tenor (Boileau), and violoncello (W. L. Phillips); and Cipriani Potter's Duo in F, for two pianofortes, finely executed by the composer and Mr. W. H. Holmes. There was also a Sonata for piano and flute, in A minor, played with spirit and precision by Miss Binfield Williams and Mr. H. Winterbottom, the clever composition of C. Horsley, the son of the glee writer.

MR. ALLCROFT'S VOCAL AND INSTRUMENTAL PROMENADE CONCERTS.

We are glad to find that instrumental music is so popular, that no less than three speculations are now before the public at cheap rates of admission. We wish them all success, and we have no preference for names. The promotion of art, and the prosperity of artists, are our leading principles; and we regard, therefore, competition as highly useful. We have no notion of vested interests in musical matters—we are totally opposed to monopoly in any shape. Let the race of rival speculators be for supremacy in effective execution of great works, and we shall judge of their claims to patronage by that standard. We heard the first part of Mr. Allcroft's programme on Monday night with almost unalloyed gratification. Signor Negri is an excellent Conductor, and his nice attention to the nuances was remarkable in the overture to Rossini's "Guillaume Tell;" the leading soli were Hatton (Violoncello), G. Cooke (Oboe), Carte (Flute), Irwin (Trumpet), &c. Auber's lively overture "La Barcarolle" was well played. Pugni's Polka "Victoria and Albert" was as good as any other Polka, for the forms are the same, and as for ideas, what new ones are to be found in these days. Mr. J. G. Callcot's Quadrille "The Royal Hunt" was clever but a little too long, and the leading theme was reiterated too frequently. Handley, the Cornet-à-Piston; Mr. H. Distin, on the Saxe Tromba; Master Thirlwall, a miniature Paganini, also distinguished themselves. Sinclair and Henry Russell are the vocalists—the glory of the former is now only on the past, the latter is an impressive singer to harrow up the feelings of the masses. Messrs. Thirlwall and W. Thomas act alternately as Leaders. We should add that the performances of the Distin family on the Saxe Horns whould alone be a source of gratification at these concerts—their execution is most surprising.

Philharmonic Society.—Mr. Costa, the conductor, and Mr. Turle, organist of Westminster Abbey, have been elected Members, and Mr. R. Costa, F. Lablache, J. Bennett, and C. Taylor, Associates.

MUSICAL CHIT CHAT.

Mr. Benedict has returned to town after a visit to Stuttgardt, his natal city, and to Paris. M. Léon Pillet, the Director of the Académie Royale de Musique, has given Mr. Benedict the commission to compose an opera for that establishment, the libretto of which has been written by M. Lucas. Benedict's "Crusaders" will be represented in Stuttgardt, in December, conducted by himself, and it will be afterwards produced in Vienna.

Miss Romer will be the prima donna in Balfe's new opera, which will be brought out early in December, at Drury-lane Theatre.

Duprez, the great French singer, is to sing at Berlin in German. The success of Pauline Viardot Garcia in that capital has been immense. Mendelssohn is composing an opera for Jenny Lind. There are now four English singers creating a sensation in Italy—two tenors, Mr. John Reeves and Mr. Travers; a basso, Mr. Jones, and a prima donna, Miss Hayes. Dohler, the pianist, is composing an opera for Florence. Liszt is also writing an opera. A new danseuse, Mdlle. Paderna, a pupil of the ballet master, Blasis, is much vaunted of in Milan.

Mr. Wilson will give a series of Concerts at Crosby Hall, in December. Mrs Phillips, the singer of Irish melodies, has had great success in the provinces. Mr. H. Phillips also continues his entertainments. Mr. Lover was quite popular in the United States. Sivori, the violinist, and Leopold de Meyer, the pianist, were starring in America. Mr. Henry Russell gave a Concert at Sussex Hall, in the City, on Wednesday, and repeats it to-night. Mr. H. Field gave his Musical Entertainment in the City Lecture Theatre, on Tuesday, and Miss Wheadon a Concert at the Southwark Institution the same evening. M. Ponchard, a son of the once celebrated tenor of that name, and now a singing master, has been engaged by M. Léon Pillet, to supply the place of Gardoni at the Académie, in Rossini's pasticcio, "Robert Bruce." An appeal has been made by the Director to the Government Theatrical Commission, to prevent Gardoni from singing at the Théâtre Italien. At the latter lyrical establishment, Pacini's "La Fidanzata Corsa" was produced last Tuesday, with Madame Persiani, Mario, and Coletti. Verdi's "I Due Foscari" was in active rehearsal for Grisi, who, it is anticipated, has a part in which she will create a sensation. The composer has paid Mario the compliment of re-writing a scena for him in this opera, in which Coletti is included in the cast. Spontini's "Vestale" is to be revived in the French Opera for Duprez and Madame Rossi-Caccia.

Pischek has positively consented to appear, next season, at her Majesty's Theatre. He was offered a six years' engagement, which he declined, not knowing as yet how far he may prove successful on the Italian stage. He is to receive £2000 for the season, and the privilege of singing at concerts. The King of Wurtemberg has given him a congé of six months from his duties at Stuttgardt, where he is engaged at the Royal Opera for life, with pensions for his wife and children, in the event of his decease. He is now studying Italian and English assiduously. His principal parts will be Don Giovanni, Zampa, Belisario, Nabucco, &c.

THE LATE MR. ALSAGER.

Mr. Alsager was in his sixty-seventh year, and for a quarter of a century had been connected with the Times as the writer of the Money Market article. He commenced his career with Mr. Barnes and Mr. Murray—two editors of rare intelligence in their respective departments—the former being the editor, and the latter having the foreign department. We cannot afford a more striking evidence of the estimation in which Mr. Alsager was held, than in quoting the opinions of two writers in the Morning Chronicle of Tuesday last. The first is from the City Correspondent of that paper

"A feeling of extreme regret has been manifested in commercial circles throughout the City to-day at the melancholy end of this much-esteemed gentleman, and deep commiseration for his friends. Mr. Alsager has for very many years most deservedly enjoyed the highest regard and respect of a numerous and highly-respectable circle of influential friends in the City, who had learned to appreciate not only his distinguished talents and acquirements in commercial matters, but also the strict honour and integrity which he maintained for so many years in the responsible position which he held in the mercantile community."

The second article is from the Musical Critic of the Chronicle:—

"The lamentable decease of this distinguished amateur has caused universal regret in the musical circles. Mr. Alsager was the founder of the celebrated "Beethoven Quartet Society," the influences of which in the advancement of high art have been incalculable. For many years Mr. Alsager invited to his house in Queen-square, the élite of the musical profession, native and foreign, for the practice of quartet-playing. He was equally the friend and supporter of the rising native artist as of the most accomplished foreigner. It is to Mr. Alsager that the credit is due of having removed many prejudices as to the later productions of the immortal Beethoven; and the system of conversion, commenced in his own private circle, was rapidly extended by the matchless performances in Harley-street, where the society was duly organised in 1845. Vieuxtemps, Sivori, Sainton, Teresa Milanollo, Hill, and Rousselot, were the artists who interpreted Beethoven's inspirations, after a series of the most careful rehearsals. Mr. Alsager was also a steady supporter of the Philharmonic Society. His loss will be severely felt, and a gap has been left in musical patronage difficult indeed to be filled up."

Mr. Alsager has left nine children to mourn his loss—one daughter, married to a clergyman, in Bombay, and seven daughters and a son at his country residence at Kingston. Only a few days prior to his decease, he remarked to a friend that few men had worked harder during his life than himself, and it was time for him to enjoy himself a little for the remainder of his days. He was devotedly attached to his late wife, on the anniversary of whose funeral he committed the fatal act which led to his death.

Death of Mr. Richard Younge, the Comedian.—This esteemed performer who was many years at Drury Lane Theatre, but latterly almost exclusively at the minors, expired on Tuesday at his residence in Warren-street, White Conduit-street, Pentonville. Mr. Younge embraced the stage at a very early age.

Death of Mrs. Lover.—Mrs. Lover, wife of Mr. Samuel Lover, died on Tuesday morning, in Baker-street, after a short illness, leaving two daughters to lament their loss. Mr. Lover is in America, giving his "Irish Evenings" with great success: and a public dinner was recently given to him at Boston, by the literati of that city.

Death of the Hon. Saville Lumley.—We have to announce the demise of the Hon. Saville Henry Lumley, who expired on the 11th, at his seat, Cooley Lodge, Nottinghamshire, at the advanced age of seventy-eight years. He was uncle to the present Earl of Scarborough, and, consequently, brother to the late peer. In 1806 he was married to the daughter of H. Tabourdon, Esq.

Death of Lady Hamilton.—This benevolent lady, whose name is connected with so many of the public charities of London, died on Friday evening (last week), at her residence, in James-street, Buckingham Gate. Her Ladyship's health had been somewhat declining for some time, but her active mind and cheerful disposition occasioned her family to be totally unprepared for the melancholy event. Lady Hamilton was the relict of the late Colonel Sir R. Hamilton, of Olivestob, N.B., formerly of the 3rd Foot Guards.

A Duchess Amenable to the Game Laws. A paragraph in the papers recently announced that the Duke of Marlborough was accompanied in a shooting excursion by his lately married Duchess, and that the latter personally took part in the amusement of the day, and with her own hand killed several head of game. Of the fact there is no doubt; but it has been followed up by consequences little apprehended at the time. Informations have been lodged against the Duchess for shooting without a licence. It is supposed that this unusual step, which if followed up must in all probability lead to a conviction, has been adopted in retaliation for some severe measures recently taken by the Duke to punish certain trespassers upon his manorial rights.

LITERATURE.

The Buchanites, from First to Last. By Joseph Train. Blackwoods.

Some of the strangest records of the human mind are to be found in the history of Fanaticism, to which the work before us is a very interesting, and, in many respects, a valuable contribution; for, its statements are so well authenticated by contemporary evidence, as to place them above suspicion.

The Buchanites were a class of enthusiasts named from their founder, Elspath Buchan, or "Luckie Buchan in the West," as Scott calls her, the only alewife that he ever heard of turning preacher. Elspath was the daughter of John Simpson and Margaret Gordon, who kept a small way-side public-house between Banff and Portsoy, where she was born in the year 1738. When a child, she was sent out to service, and was employed in herding her master's cows; she was taught to sew and read by a relative; but, when a mere girl, she fell into idle company, at Greenock, and there "contracted those depraved habits which she afterwards inculcated respecting matrimony." She next trepanned, at Ayr, a working potter, named Robert Buchan, to be her husband, according to a contemporary account; but, says Mr. Train, in the work before us, "if the union was legally solemnised, it does not appear in any of the registers of the parish of Ayr." Buchan, growing ashamed of Luckie's licentious conduct at Ayr, removed to Banff, and there left her with one son and two daughters. She then kept a school, and might have made a comfortable livelihood, "had not her other and stronger propensities interfered with the sedate carriage necessary to the success of a schoolmistress." She seems to have neglected both her family and school to carry out the details of a divine apocalypse, charging her with a heavenly mission: this was in 1774, when Elspath so overcame the flesh as not to make use of earthly food for some weeks, and many came to hear her speak "all about God's love to mortals." She attended the "fellowship meetings" regularly, disputed fiercely on religious subjects, and made several converts, notwithstanding the clergy raised the populace against her doctrines. In 1781 Elspath rejoined her husband at Glasgow: she next became acquainted with Mr. Hugh White, minister of the Relief Congregation of Irvine, and then the most popular preacher of his sect in the west of Scotland. In 1783, Mr. Andrew Innes, of Crocketford, formed an unalienable attachment to Elspath's person and pretensions: in 1784, he aided in forming a Buchanite Society, of which he remained an effective member to the last: in right of survivorship, he became possessed of all the property that pertained to that body; and has materially assisted Mr. Train in the narrative before us. This details how Hugh White was dismissed from the ministry for embracing Elspath's visionary doctrines, and how the people of Irvine maltreated her for bewitching the minister; how White proclaimed her to be the woman mentioned in the Revelation of St. John; and how the people of Muthill and Irvine rejected these impious whimsies. Their several journeys and encounters with infuriated mobs, their blasphemous pretensions—not forgetting their circumstantial description of the end of the world, their midnight manifestations, their great fast of forty days (in which several converts nearly died), their visions, and Elspath's attempt to scale the sky all form the staple of two very attractive chapters of accidents and adventures. At length, the reaction came: the disappointed expectants of immortality grew disaffected: Luckie and her coadjutor were imprisoned and tried for their licentious conduct; the Buchanites were next banished from Dumfries-shire, and fled to Auchengibbert, where they worked for wages; the "romantic enthusiasm" having now settled down to real life. We may here mention that Elspath's English followers were almost exclusively of the Methodist persuasion, and believed that "they had been sanctified before they saw Mrs. Buchan, and only wanted glorification by her," which proved a sort of Harris-ian delusion. The poor English then turned round upon Elspath, to whom they had given all their worldly wealth: ashamed to return home, they begged their way through the greater part of Scotland, and published the miseries they had brought upon themselves and their families by listening to Luckie Buchan's irreligious fooleries. The story of the Sunderland tailor, who, with Luckie, held a sheet upon a hill to catch money falling from heaven, is a violent, though not rare specimen. At length, a squabble arose about the Society's funds, and White and Luckie (?) were thrown into Dumfries gaol, but were bailed out; White and "the greedy lawyers of Dumfries" appearing to have fared best.

The Buchanites do not seem to have supported themselves by collections after their preachings, as the pastors of most other sects do: they lived on the means of those who joined them, or, in their own phrase, "God carried their expences" still, some turned out to work in the fields, others bedaubed great folks with doggerel praise; but the blasphemies of Auchengibbert made few converts, notwithstanding the cooking miracles, and making of better broth from a spoonful of butter than a joint of mutton and vegetables. Meanwhile, White, like Ephraim of old, "waxed fat, and kicked," taking good care of Number One. At length, Friend Mother, as Buchan was now styled, died, somewhat suddenly, in 1791, exhorting the bystanders to adhere to her doctrine.

Luckie's funeral was, indeed, a gross exhibition, her disciples asserting the body to have been carried away by angels, through a hole in the roof of the barn, which the cunning wights had cut!—the place of her actual interment being concealed.

The bubble had now burst: White publicly recanted his belief in the divine mission of Mrs. Buchan, and, with some followers, proceeded to America—[illegible] providing for themselves in the best way they could. Of Mrs. Muir, the friend and correspondent of Mrs. Buchan, no satisfactory account ever reached this country; and, with the exception of Joseph Innes, who died in 1835, possessed of property worth upwards of £8000, all the others were peculiarly unfortunate. Burns, by the way, in one of his letters, mentions his acquaintance with several persons who afterwards became zealous Buchanites: one of these, Jean Gardner, is referred to in the epistle to David Sillar:

> You have your Meg, your dearest part,
> And I my darling Jean.

This has been mistaken for a reference to Jean Armour, afterwards Mrs. Burns, as Mr. Train proves; Burns often visited her in the Society, both at New Cample, and Auchengibbert, though she has escaped the notice of all the biographers of the bard: she was a young woman of surpassing beauty; and is yet remembered in the neighbourhood.

There was, however, a remnant of the sect left at the place of Mrs. Buchan's death, and with £60, their share of the stock at Auchengibbert, they commenced a new struggle for existence, on a dreary waste in the parish of Urr; but this failing, the women took to spinning, introduced the two-handed wheel into Galloway, in the use of which they were unrivalled in the south of Scotland. They were all—males and females—dressed in light green clothes, were of small, elfin, stature; had all their farm utensils marked "Mercy's Property;" and built the first house at Crocketford, now a village of 200 inhabitants. Year after year, they became assimilated to the people about them, and thus the sect disappeared.

We must, not, however, forget old Andrew Innes, who lived many years at Crocketford, but had long thrown aside the green uniform of the Buchanite corps. He paid eightpence per quarter towards reading a local newspaper, which would have been heresy in Mrs. Buchan's lifetime, seeing that a newspaper was never seen in the hands of any member of the Society, nor was any attention paid to passing events, whether local or general. Mr. Train has received much assistance from Innes, who lent our author a copy of White's "Divine Dictionary" One of his letters, dated 1839, evidently alludes to the near approach of the general judgment; and in another, dated 1840, the old man says: "I sleep every night in my Friend Mother's house, and breakfast with her family in the morning. I go there in the capacity of your errand-boy, and am, consequently, well received." We agree with Mr. Train, that this fantasy is worthy of Mrs. Buchan herself. In 1843, Andrew was as fast as ever in his faith, believing that "the second coming" would take place long before the expiry of the Income Tax: he kept old Luckie's bones in a little charnel-house attached to his dwelling, and spent much time in devotion over them, especially towards March 29, 1841, the expiry of the full space within which Mrs. Buchan declared she would return to the world. In this belief he stood alone, not even countenanced by his wife, who died in November, 1845; old Andrew followed her in January, 1846; and with his remains was interred the chest containing old Luckie's bones.

We have thus glanced at the extraordinary career of this fanatic and her pretended mission; referring the reader to Mr. Train's very attractive volume for the details of the Faith and Practice of the Buchanites, whose history, "from first to last," authenticated in this volume, is worthy of a very attentive reading.

The Comic Almanack for 1847. With Twelve Illustrations of the Months, by George Cruikshank. Bogue.

The Plates in this annual budget of fun are, to our thinking, superior to those of late years. The facete George Cruikshank certainly is unrivalled in the picturesque of broad humour. then, his designs are not mere sketches, but compositions, full of nice detail, and overflowing with mirth-moving incidents. Of the present series, we like best "Where Can the Police Be?"—a drunken fellow kicking over an apple-woman's basket, in half the plate, and in the lower half, a policeman supping in a kitchen; "The Scholastic Hen and her Chickens"—Miss Thimblebee ordering her school-girls "Noses to the North," to avoid "two horridly handsome officers;" "The Bright Poker," a whole family outraged by the head using one the expression of the folks at the table is excellent; "The Stag, the Bull, and the Bear," a Railway Fable, very droll; "Born a Genius," a poor painter in despair, and "Born a Dwarf," a pampered imp almost smothered with gold—the pair having a touch of "virtuous indignation;" "I Dreamt I Slept at Madame Tussaud's," the wax figures animated very cleverly; and "The Banquet of the Black Dolls, in Commemoration of the Reduction of the Duty on Rags," is good: the dishes—"Paté de Horse Shoes," "Grand Potage de Dripping," "Fricassé de Broken Glass," "Ragout de Superior White Linen Rags"—all are very ludicrous; though to write the points of a picture joke indicates a want of confidence in the wit itself. The plate "Born a Genius and Born a Dwarf," we should add, belongs to a much higher order of satire than either of the other illustrations; it is a bitter moral reproof upon false taste, and scornful neglect of Genius; it is, besides, artistically clever.

The comic letter-press of the Almanack, mostly written to the plates, as usual, relates to "Domestic Miseries" common to middle class life, with point and pungency. Here is the accompaniment to St. Swithin.

THE CLOUD

(Another version of Shelley's partial view of the subject.)

I bring cats and dogs, and November fogs,
For the folks of Cockney land;
And I brew the flood of slush and mud,
In Fleet-street and the Strand.
From my watery bed spring colds in the head
And highly inflamed sore-throats;
And I'm the Mama of the bad Catarrh,
And the Mother of Waterproof Coats.
I gave birth to Goloshes, and Macintoshes,
The clog—the cork sole—and the patten;
And I act as wet Nu's' to each Omnibus,
For 'tis on my moisture they fatten.

I come down pretty thick, at every Pic Nic,
And throw my cold water upon it
And delight at each Fête that is called a Champêtre,
To spoil every new silk bonnet;
I'm more kind to each Jarvey than was Wittle Harvey,
When he was Commiss'oner of Stamps;
I'm the foe of Vauxhall's Grand Fancy Dress Balls,
Where I love to extinguish the Lamps;
And whenever a fellow leaves at home his Umbrello,
Oh Lord! how I chuckle and grin!
For then you may warrant, I'll come down in a torrent,
And soak the poor wretch to the skin.

Theodore, his Brother and Sisters; or, a Summer at Seymour Hall Edited by the Rev. W. Stevens, Rector of Miningsby, Lincolnshire. Sharpe.

This little work has somewhat of a higher aim than is generally taken by books of its class: its principal object is to show a practical application of baptismal privileges and duties, in a Narrative of every day occurrences. A further object is to develop the workings of the minds of children, at the period when baptisma. grace is fresh and unsullied, and when the clearness of a child's perceptions, and its discrimination between right and wrong, are much stronger than is generally supposed. These we take to be normal errors among parents and teachers, which it is very desirable to correct; and this is sought to be done in a tone of "practical piety, and sound judgment," which the reverend Editor describes to have been the characteristics of the Author's mind. There is another feature of his book which deserves mention: it contains several short stories, which were mostly written at the respective ages of the supposed children to whom they are appropriated. we find among the subjects so illustrated by narrative, "Lying" and "Disobedience," two of the most dangerous sins of early nature. There are, besides, a few fairy tales, with excellent morals, so that the sugar and salt are judiciously made to succeed each other. The work is altogether of that class which aims at amusement and instruction, though at the latter by better method than usual.

CHESS.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"Argus."—The December (double) Number of the "Chess-Player's Chronicle," completes the Volume for 1846. This Volume, in many respects the most interesting of the series, contains the whole of the Matches between Messrs. Staunton and Horwitz; Horwitz and Kieseritzky; Staunton and Harrwitz; the celebrated Blindfold Games at the London Chess Club; and every game of note and interest which has been played throughout the world, during the past twelve months.

"D. C. L."—The collection of Problems published in the Illustrated London News can only be obtained by the purchase of the Paper

"A. B."—"An Old Soldier."—"L. S. D."—"Timon."—Mr. Staunton's offer is to play Mr. George Walker a Match upon the same terms as that recently concluded with Mr. Harrwitz, viz.:—In seven games, to give the odds of the Pawn and two moves; in seven, to give the odds of the Pawn and one move; and, in seven more, to play without giving any odds. Nothing has been said about the amount of stakes to be played for—Mr. S. being willing to play for one hundred guineas on each of the three matches, or for the same amount on the best of the twenty-one games, or for any lesser stake, at the choice of the challenged party.

"W. H. R.," Pater.—It shall be duly examined.

"J. B.," H— The position you send is incorrectly described; the Black King being already mated by the adverse Rooks.

"J. N. S." Right in the Enigma; but you have failed in Problem 146. (See our Solution.)

"L. E. C. J.," Wilton. Your Pawn having reached its 8th square, and that square being a White one, you can claim another Bishop, although you have a Bishop on the board which moves on diagonals of White squares—thus, having two White Bishops on the board at the same time.

"R. V. M." Your opponent having lifted up your piece, or even touched it, is obliged to take it if he can, or move his King if he has no piece to take it.

"Fg."—You may open the game with any one of the Pawns, or with either of your Knights. There are exactly twenty moves at your command.

"W. H. A."—In the opening so much played by MM. Harrwitz and Horwitz, in their present Match, K Kt to B 3rd, as the third move for the defending player, is considered to be a very good move; and is recommended as the best by Jaenisch, in his excellent Treatise.

"J. B. C."—The solutions you ask for shall be given shortly.

"Marazion."—In the Game you cite between Messrs. Harrwitz and Perigal, it is evident that Mr. P. had a forced mate in six (not seven) moves, at his 26th move. The omission to see that such advantage presented itself, was certainly remarkable in two players of so much ability

"Badmansir."—Tomlinson's little Manual is a useful treatise for young Players.

"G. A. H."—M'Donnell and La Bourdonnais played in all, not as one set match, but in several matches, 88 games. Of this number, 14 were drawn battles; and, of the remaining 74, La Bourdonnais won 44 and lost 30.

"C. F. C."—Your four-move Problem, despite the subsequent correction, may be done easily in three moves. The other is altogether a failure.

"W. P.," Plymouth. Our attention has been called by three or four parties to the Problem 285, in the October Number of the "Chess-Player's Chronicle." Upon referring to it, we find too clearly that the Author has overlooked the move you and others suggest, and hence that the mate is impracticable in three moves.

"G. S. S.," Liverpool.—Always acceptable. Many thanks both for the Games, and the consideration exhibited in the offer which accompanies them. We have little hope, however, now, of the matter in question being brought about.

Solutions by "Sopracitta," "Cur," "Badmansir," "J. B. C.," "G. A. H.," "J. N. S.," Liverpool; and "W. B. R.," Ipswich, are correct.

This singular example of a drawn game is the invention of Mr. R. A. B., of Leeds.

In this position, it being White's move, he dexterously contrives to draw the game.

15. K Kt to B 3d (f)	Kt to K Kt 5th	30. Q to K 2d	K R to R 3d

And White surrendered.

(a) An error, we think. The pieces are wanted to bear upon the adverse King. Q Kt P one, and presently this Kt over to the King's side, would have been much more to the purpose.

(b) This is to enable him to advance the K B P, but Black cleverly manages to anticipate his movements in this game, and is, somehow, always a move beforehand with him

(c) Intending to throw forward his K Kt Pawn, and so prevent the advance of the K B P.

(d) Too late—too late

(e) There is no faltering, no hesitation, in the conduct of the attack here. Black goes "right on," and every move tells. From the first step forward of this Pawn the fate of the game is determined

(f) With the object of giving up a piece, to stay those terrible pawns. A sacrifice, however, which Black declines

(g) The operations of White's cavalry throughout this game are not certainly upon a very extended scale. Their movements remind one irresistibly of the famous exploit of the Gallic Monarch who

> "With twenty thousand men,
> Walked up a hill, and then—walked down again."

(h) Poor White is in the toils, enmeshed beyond a chance of extrication.

 The present is the terminating Game—Mr. Harrwitz scoring six to his adversary's four. By this victory, fairly and gallantly achieved, the winner has added a proud feather to his plume. He has fully verified the predictions of his numerous admirers, and shown himself entitled to an indisputable place by the side of the ablest players of the day.

Our next Game is an amusing Partie, lately played at the London Chess Club, between Messrs. Harrwitz, Medley, and Von Carnass, in consultation against Messrs Horwitz, Jones, and Burghess.

POLICE.

A Romantic Affair.—A day or two ago Maria Rosina Cook, a young female dressed as a sailor boy, was charged at Lambeth Office, before Mr Norton, with attempting to destroy herself by taking a quantity of laudanum.—John Constable, 43 L, gaoler at the police-station in Tower-street, Waterloo-road, stated that, while on duty on Saturday last, about ten o'clock, a person entered the station-house, and requested his attendance at a coffee-house in the Waterloo-road, as a young sailor had just taken a quantity of poison there. He, in consequence, hastened to the house; and, finding the prisoner in a very drowsy state, with her head upon the table, and also two bottles by her side, from which laudanum had just been taken, he went in search of a doctor to attend her. The first shop he went to, the person there asked him if it was not a young sailor that had destroyed himself, as he had been there a short time before, and wanted threepennyworth of laudanum, but they would not serve him. Witness, on the recommendation of Dr. Brooks, took her to Guy's Hospital, when the stomach pump was used; and, having sufficiently recovered from the effects of the poison, he took her back to the station-house, and had the charge of attempting to destroy herself entered on the sheet. From the statement made by the prisoner to him (the constable) it appeared that she was the daughter of a veterinary surgeon, residing at Chulton, in the county of Somerset; but, having become attached to a private in the 37th Regiment of Foot, she had left her home, and had latterly lived at Chatham, where her lover was quartered. The regiment had lately been ordered on foreign service, and was about to embark for the island of Ceylon; and the prisoner finding that her lover was to proceed there by a vessel lying in the West India Dock, she sold her female apparel at a great sacrifice, and purchased the sailor's suit she then had on. She next proceeded to the Mariners' Register Office, and procured the necessary ticket, wherein she described herself as David Cook, born at Bristol, in the county of Gloucester, August 3, 1830, "capacity boy," and with this she made her way to the West India Dock, and presented herself to the captain, whom she requested to employ her as cabin-boy. The captain told her that he had already engaged with and shipped his necessary number of hands; and, being thus frustrated in all her hopes of being able to accompany the object of her affection, she had made up her mind to commit suicide. At the coffee-house a letter was found, which had been written by the prisoner just before she had taken the poison.—Mr. Norton here read the letter in question, which was as follows:—

> Dear Thomas,—I have overstepped the bounds of prudence and modesty, in hopes of being able to reach Ceylon with you. I have put on boy's apparel, and come to this sink of iniquity, London, to enter the Minerva as a boy, but when I got here, the captain had shipped all his hands. I have tried to get on board several other vessels, but cannot, on account of not being able to find money enough to procure sufficient clothes to go to sea with. I have sold all my own to get what I have on, and have no money to get others. I have no friends here no place to go to: I cannot blame any person but myself. Think of me no more, Thomas, as it is useless; you will never see or hear from me again. Remember me to Harriet and Charles. Don't make yourself at all uneasy about me. I have no more to say, but remain yours till death,

> London, Nov. 14, 1846.

The Constable 43 said that the prisoner had acknowledged to him that she was in such a state of exhaustion at the time she took the poison, that she could hardly keep up her head, the fear of the disclosure of her sex preventing her from taking off her clothes from the moment she put them on. One night she slept in the hold of a vessel in the dock; and on another occasion, at the coffee-house, she sat in a chair all night, while her companion, a sailor boy, had slipped off, and went to bed. She had also been afraid of washing her hands or face, but allowed them to be black and dirty, lest the fairness of her skin should disclose her real sex.—In reply to the questions of the magistrate, the prisoner, who kept her face concealed from the gaze of the crowd in court, by placing her hands over it, said that she had become acquainted with the soldier about three years ago, when he belonged to a recruiting party at Bristol, and then conceived a strong attachment for him. She did not then leave her home with him; but about six months ago, finding that the regiment was quartered at Newport, in Wales, she left home, and joined him there. She next accompanied him to Chatham, where she took a lodging, and he was quartered in Brompton Barracks. She declared that it was her intention to have destroyed herself, and only regretted that she had been prevented, and added that it was impossible to endure greater tortures than those which she had experienced for the last three days.—She was remanded, to give time to communicate with her friends.

Alleged Attempt to Murder.—On Monday, Henry Wilmott was charged at Clerkenwell Police-office with attempting to murder Harriet Haines, wife of a plumber and glazier, residing in Paradise-terrace, Islington.—A number of witnesses were brought forward by the police to substantiate the charge, from whose evidence it appeared that on Saturday last the prisoner went into Mrs. Haines's house, for the purpose, it was surmised, of getting some money on account of a previous transaction between Mr. Haines and him. A person named Gilbert, who lodged next door, heard, soon after the prisoner was seen to enter the house, a noise of struggling and blows, which latter were so violent and long continued, that he was induced to go into the house to see what was the matter, when he saw some person, whom he could not identify, escaping by the back door, and found Mrs. Haines lying in a state of insensibility in the hall, her face covered with blood, and several severe wounds in her head. On searching the premises afterwards, a large metal candlestick was found, with which the woman had apparently been wounded, as it was all covered over with blood, and a quantity of hair sticking to it. A hat was also found in the drawing-room, which it was afterwards discovered belonged to the prisoner, upon which he was taken into custody, when several spots of blood were observed upon his trousers and waistcoat. Mrs. Haines was taken as speedily as possible to Bartholomew's Hospital, where she lies with but little hopes of her recovery. No ostensible motive could be assigned for the savage act, as the prisoner and Mrs. Haines and her husband were on the most intimate terms, and he was in the habit of visiting them almost every day.—Mr. Greenwood ordered the prisoner to be remanded for a week. Mrs. Haines was so much worse on Monday night, that Mr. Greenwood went to her residence to take her deposition. It did not vary from the above statement.

Cabinet Council.—A Cabinet Council was held on Monday afternoon at the Foreign Office. The Ministers present were Lord John Russell, the Marquis of Lansdowne, the Earl of Minto, Sir George Grey, Viscount Palmerston, Earl Grey, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Earl of Auckland, Lord Campbell, Viscount Morpeth, the Earl of Clarendon, the Right Hon. T. B. Macaulay, and the Marquis of Clanricarde. The Lord Chancellor subsequently joined his colleagues. The Council sat two hours.

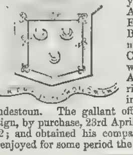
OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

GEORGE LIPSCOMBE, M.D.

Of all the works peculiar to this country, there are, perhaps, none so valuable as County Histories; and he who writes a good one, deserves that his memory should be regarded. Dr. Lipscombe, the subject of this notice, was a man of great erudition, and one whose various writings have enriched our literature, and whose valuable compilation of the "Topography of Buckinghamshire" would place him in the very first class of County Historians. This able author died on the 9th instant, and was buried in the Cemetery of St. George the Martyr, Southwark, by the remains of his wife. He had just lived long enough to witness the termination of his History, in eight folio parts, after a labour of some twenty years.

MAJOR CHARLES HENRY EDMONSTONE,

Captain, 81st Regiment, died on the 12th inst., at Edinburgh, in his 35th year. He was third son of the late Sir Charles Edmondstone, of Duntreath, Bart., by his second wife Louisa, youngest daughter of Beaumont Lord Hotham, and younger brother of the present Bart., Sir Archibald Edmonstone. The family of Edmonstone is of great antiquity in North Britain, and derives its name from Edmundus (supposed to be a younger son of Count Egmont, of Flanders), one of those who attended Margaret, daughter of Edgar Atheling, into Scotland, and, subsequently rising to distinction, had a grant of land in Edinburghshire, which he called Edmundestoun. The gallant officer just deceased entered the army as Ensign, by purchase, 23rd April, 1828; became Lieutenant 2nd March, 1832; and obtained his company, also by purchase, 13th Nov., 1835. He enjoyed for some period the brevet rank of Major in the army.



NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

LAUNCH OF THE "NIGER" STEAM SLOOP,

On Wednesday morning, the Niger steam-sloop, designed and built by Mr. Lang, master shipwright, was launched from Woolwich Dockyard. A large number of officers of the army, navy, and the dockyard, their ladies and families, and a very respectable body of other spectators, being assembled, Mrs. Dyer, wife of Commander Dyer, residing at Woolwich, performed the ceremony of naming, and at twenty-five minutes to one she emerged from the slip, amid the usual spirited cheers on such occasions, and, for the first time, floated on the water. The following are the principal dimensions of the Niger:—

	ft.	in
Length between the perpendiculars	185	0
Length of keel for tonnage	161	7½
Breadth, extreme	34	8
Breadth for tonnage	34	4
Breadth, moulded	33	8
Depth in engine-room	21	6

Her burden in tons, old plan, is 1013 51-94, of which her engine-room is 491 139-925. Her engines will be of 500-horse power. The Niger is the 63rd ship, large and small, that Mr. Lang has built.

Haslar Hospital.—Captain Sir Edward Parry, the celebrated Polar voyager, is to succeed Captain Carter, as superintendent of Haslar Hospital.

Commander-in-Chief in Canada.—Lieutenant-General Sir Benjamin D'Urban will, it is understood, according to the present arrangements, proceed to Canada as Commander-in-Chief, in the room of the Earl of Cathcart, who held that appointment with the Governor-Generalship.

Inspector-General of Cavalry.—Major-General Brotherton, formerly of the 15th Dragoons, will, we are informed, receive the appointment of Inspector-General of Cavalry, in the room of Lieutenant-General Lygon, lately promoted.

Execution of a British Seaman in the American Navy.—We copy the following from a New York paper. The unfortunate victim to the extreme penalty of martial law was an Irishman, who after great provocation knocked down a Lieutenant of the American vessel on board of which he had entered. He made a most eloquent defence before the Court, and excited the sympathy of all but his obdurate judges:—"Off Vera Cruz, Sept. 25, 1846. On the 17th instant I was one of the edified witnesses of the supremacy of the law over natural right. A sailor named Samuel Jackson, belonging to the sloop St. Mary's, was hanged at the foreyard arm, pursuant to the sentence of a Court-martial, before whom he had been tried for striking a man named Taylor, one of the officers of that ship. The preparations for the execution were numerous and solemn, a regular programme having been issued by Commodore Connor, and circulated through the squadron several days previously. All labour in the different vessels was forbidden for the day, and the crews were directed to assume their holiday attire. At eleven, a.m., the signal, 'Prepare to execute the sentence of the court-martial,' was displayed at the mizen of the Cumberland, when a yellow flag was hoisted at the fore-yard-arm of the St. Mary's. The officers and crews of all the vessels at the anchorage were then mustered on deck, and distributed in such places as would best enable them to take as much of the spectacle in view as possible. Here they were kept on the tiptoe of anticipation for more than half an hour, when the same signal that I before mentioned was hoisted, without the 'preparative,' and the curiosity of the spectators was very materially enhanced thereby. In a few moments more the victim made his appearance on the 'top-gallant forecastle' of the St. Mary's, attended by two or three officers and the master-at-arms of the ship, and by the Rev. Fitch W. Taylor, chaplain of the Cumberland. Stepping over the forecastle railing on the scaffold, which had been erected there for the occasion, the prisoner seated himself on the railing, apparently on account of nervous deficiency. The machinery fitted for the principal act was simple, but strong and effective. A thick rope was rove through a block at the yard-arm, leading along the yard into the foremast, where it rove through another block, and made fast to a weight of near four hundred pounds. After some additional minutes of suspense had been inflicted upon the thousands of spectators, a flash issued from the gun over which the scaffold had been raised, and at the same instant a human form was seen flying in a curved line through the air with astonishing velocity. When the body reached the yard-arm, so great had been the impulse that the check threw it perpendicularly into the air, feet upward; and, rebounding against the 'fore lifts,' it passed over the fore brace, split the halter block, and then, after a few violent vibrations, it assumed the usual dangling attitude of a hanging man."

EMBARKATION OF TROOPS.

The town and port of Gravesend has not unfrequently presented the tableaux which our artist has delineated in the accompanying Engravings, sketched from "the life." Their several incidents are versified in the pendent epigraphs.

A scene of this description has been witnessed at Gravesend, within the past week, on the Embarkation of the 3rd Regiment for Ceylon. On Saturday, a division, consisting of 478 men, under the command of Major Franklyn and Captain Hamilton, marched from Brompton Barracks to Gravesend, for Embarkation: of these, 275 men, with 10 women, and 18 children, were to go out in the Sybella, under the charge of Major Franklyn; and the remainder, with 12 women, and 25 children, in the Romeo, under the charge of Captain Hamilton.

In a very life-like picture of the life of the soldier, entitled "Camp and Barrack-Room; or, The British Army As It Is," we find the following picture of an Embarkation for India, and the preparation for the service. The narrator says:—

"At the expiration of the second week from my admission, I was discharged from hospital; and as my clothing meanwhile had been prepared, I returned to my barrack-room in undress uniform; so that I was now to all intents and purposes a soldier. On the ensuing morning I was sent to drill, with the club or awkward squad; our instructor being a corporal lately returned from India, who was as cross as possible at having been ordered to teach us; considering that more forward recruits should have been placed under his care.

"Probably some reader may wish to know the daily routine of my duties and amusements at this period. I rose at five o'clock in the morning, and made up my bed: which occupied at the least a quarter of an hour, and was rather a troublesome job. I then made my toilet, and at six turned out for drill, from which we were dismissed at a quarter to eight, when we breakfasted. From ten till twelve we were again at drill; had dinner at one, in the shape of potatoes and meat, both usually of the most wretched quality; and at two fell in for another drill, which terminated at four; after which hour my time was at my own disposal until tattoo, provided I was not ordered on piquet. During this period of leisure, I generally amused myself by strolling in the vicinity of the garrison (no soldier being permitted to go to a greater distance than one mile) or by reading; the owner of a circulating library in Rochester having consented to trust me with his volumes on my depositing a small sum in his hands. There was no garrison library then, which must be a matter of surprise to every one who knows of what benefit such institutions are to the soldier; who, having thus the means of amusement and instruction within his reach, is in many instances altogether prevented from going to the beer-shop to pass his leisure time.

"In this way, my first month at drill passed quickly by; its mono-

THE MARCH THROUGH THE TOWN.—THE MILTON ROAD.

AIR—"The British Grenadiers" ENGLISH.

With bay'nets bright and flags unfurled,
  The gallant troops appear;
Bound for Ceylon, now marches on
  The British Grenadier.
The parting regiment's glorious flag
  Well knew the Pyrenees
And, hurrah! hurrah! in triumph saw
  The vanquished Tuileries!

Still stainless be the banner bright,
  Which waves but to defend
Old England's honour, soil, and right—
  Old England—Freedom's friend.
The drums are rattling brisk and loud,
  The fifes are shrill and clear,
While joyfully hurrahs the crowd
  For the British Grenadier.

tony wholly unrelieved except by one disagreeable occurrence—a man flogged. The sensations of pain and disgust I then experienced will never be obliterated from my memory; nor was I singular in this respect, for many of the younger soldiers, and even some of the officers, fainted in the ranks, and had to be borne to the rear.

"It is, indeed, a curious circumstance, that, under the very eye of the home authorities, the young soldier is, perhaps, worse treated than in any other part of the British dominions, both as regards his clothing and his food: even his scanty surplus pay is frequently the object of the most scandalous peculation. He being altogether ignorant of what he is entitled to, and therefore obnoxious to every extortion, is plundered by those military blacklegs—those Majors Monsoon of the present period—with the greatest ease and the least possible compunction. Aware of what must be the answer, they listen with indifference to the commandant, as he asks the recruit, when about to embark for India, whether he has any complaints to make. The reply to this question has been almost invariably in the negative. Indeed, few recruits, were they even aware of their being cheated, possess the ability and information requisite to make a report of a superior with any prospect of success; and, otherwise, they become subject to trial by court-martial for making frivolous complaints.

"I was twice quartered in this garrison; the first time for six weeks, when the detachment with which I proceeded to India were charged tenpence per man; and the second time for four days, for which we were mulcted fourpence each. How injury to this amount could be done by us to our quarters, in so short a space, God and the quartermaster only know. There are usually about twenty depôts at Chatham, from each of which, at an average, one hundred men are annually sent to India; and estimating the barrack damages, charged to each man during the term of his stay, at one shilling and sixpence, which I am certain is under the mark, we have a sum of £300—a large sum, indeed, to be deducted yearly from the shilling, the hard-earned shilling of a few hundred soldiers.

"Although my stay at Chatham was even unusually short, I was heartily glad when I received permission to accompany a draft ordered to India; a favour accorded me only on a special application to the officer commanding the depôt. This gentleman was curiously desirous of knowing why I was so anxious to join my regiment; but as it would not have been quite prudent to make him au fait of my motives, I held my peace.

"JULY [illegible].—In the afternoon of this day, such of the depôt as had been selected to proceed out to their regiment, were inspected by the commandant; who told us, nothing could exceed our soldier-like appearance; a compliment which I was given to understand had been paid to nearly every draft of recruits which had left the garrison since the commencement of his command.

"The inspection over, we deposited our knapsacks in a store, in order that there should be no making away of necessaries, in the interim of our marching out.

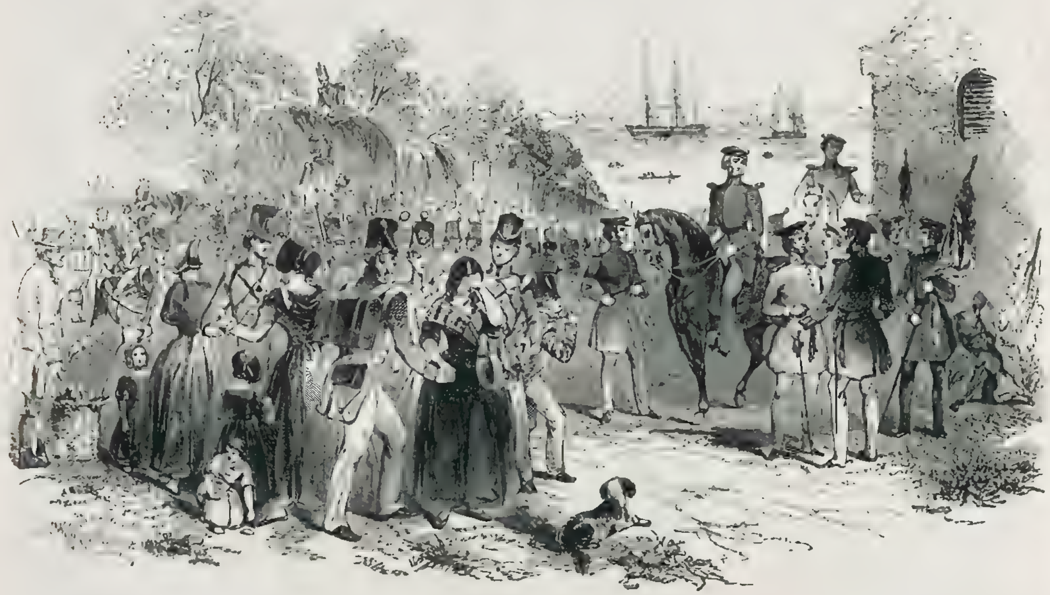
"Next morning, after a hurried breakfast at five o'clock, we fell in on the parade ground, and were marched off to the store to get our knapsacks.

"In another half-hour all were ready for starting; and the order, right form four deep, quick march, being given, our little column, as it defiled in front of the several squads now at drill, commenced cheering loudly. 'Ah!' remarked an old soldier, as we passed through the gate, 'you shouldn't cheer till ye were comin' back: there won't be so many of you then, I warrant, and they'll not be in a cheering humour.'

"After we had got beyond the works, the garrison, or, as it was termed by us, the pongo-band, struck up a lively march, and we proceeded quietly onwards at a smart pace, till beneath Fort Pitt, when 'Patrick's Day' was played, and a loud and prolonged cheer made the welkin ring again. This burst of national enthusiasm over (for the greater part of us were Irish), we marched along in silence. Arrived at Gravesend, we got into a lumber-boat, and were towed alongside of the Gloriana, a fine new vessel, of more than one thousand tons burden chartered for our conveyance to Calcutta. In a few minutes we had scrambled on board, and found our dinners already cooked; and, after discussing the beef and potatoes, which constituted the meal, both of the best quality, we went upon deck to receive our sea-kits, which were given to us in canvass bags, rendered waterproof, each secured with a leather strap and padlock. The latter, however, was of no use; for all being of the same size, a single key would unlock every one of them; a circumstance which led to a system of petty pilfering during the voyage, alike disgraceful and productive of disorder. A sea-kit consisted of two strong check shirts, two canvass frocks, a pair of blue cotton trousers, and several other smaller articles, such as clasp-knife, soap, polish, &c., &c., &c., all necessary to a soldier on board ship.

"Some two hours from our advent on board, the capstan was manned, and the anchor weighed, when all hands were directed by the first mate, who commanded the ship in the absence of the skipper, to get into the rigging and give three cheers, an order which was duly and promptly obeyed.

"This ceremony over, the paddles of the tug-steamer, which had already taken us in tow, were put in motion, and our long and dangerous voyage was commenced."



THE PARTING.

AIR—"The Girl I Left Behind Me."—IRISH.

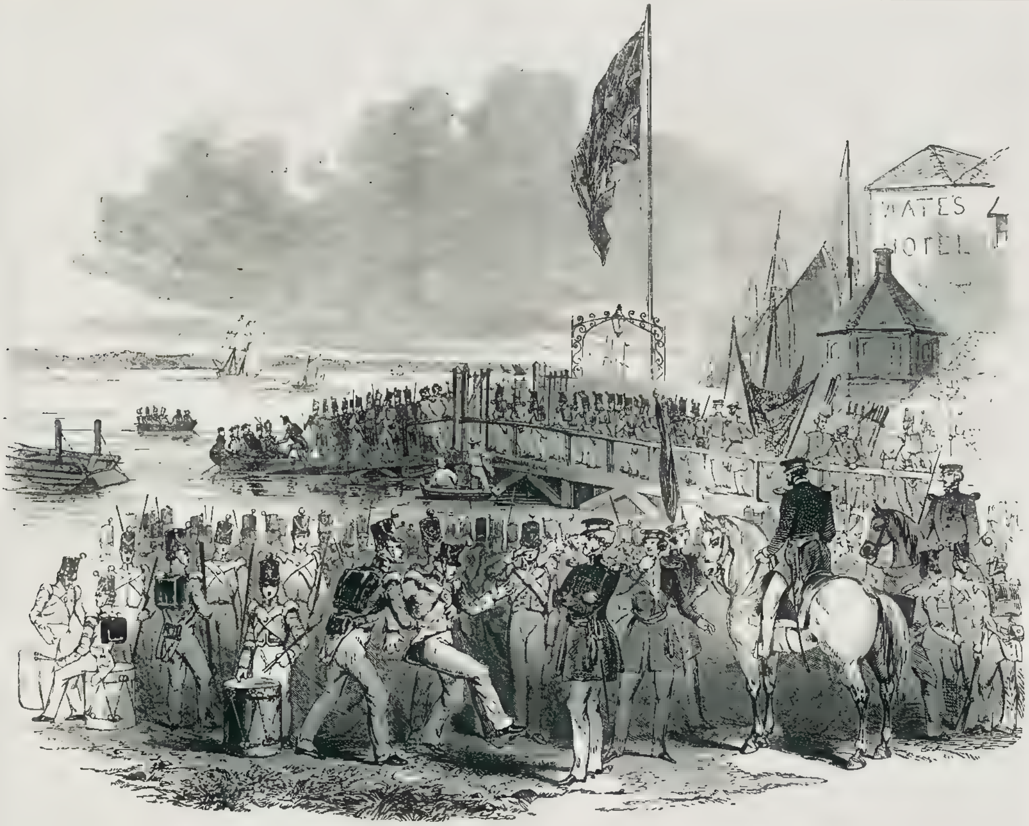
Dispel thy fears! oh, dry those tears,
  For faithful still thou'lt find me;
We part—and it may be for years—
  Alas! my own tears blind me.

But Duty's voice and Honour's call
  To our brave banner bind me;
Where'er I go, be sure the foe
  Will never be behind me.

One kiss; and now, dear love, farewell,
  The trumpet's voice is calling;
I'll think on thee, where billows swell
  And war is most appalling.

We yet shall meet. My constant heart
  For ever shall remind me
Of thee, from whom I now must part—
  Sweet girl, that I leave behind me.



PREPARING TO EMBARK.

Air.—"A man's a man for a' that."—Scottish.

Alas! for human nature wild!
Her frailties and a' that!
It is not vice which aye beguil'd
Her truant steps, for a' that.

The noblest heart, when 'bout to part
From Native Land and a' that,
Will deeply sup the stirrup cup,
To drown his grief and a' that.

And Mercy for the Soldier pleads—
We're Britons still, and a' that;
It is the soldier's breast that bleeds—
The back should not, for a' that.

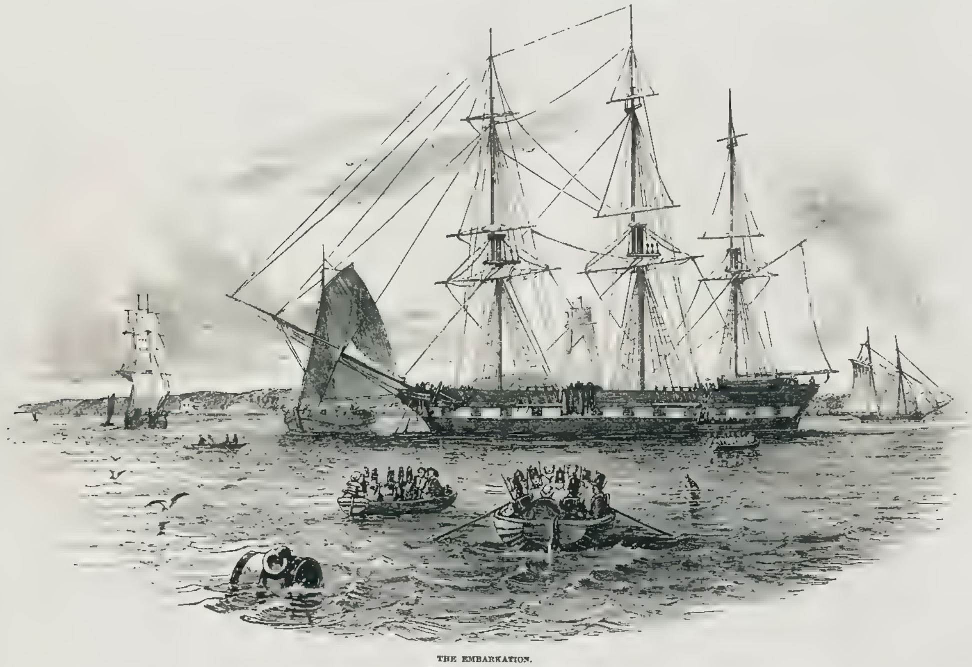
But the boats take out their valiant freight—
Hurrahs ring out, and a' that;
The ready sails before them wait,
With jackets blue, and a' that.



THE EMBARKATION.

Air.—"Of a Noble Race."—Welsh.

O'er the waves of the foaming ocean
The soldier of Britain goes;
He fears not the billows' commotion,
And far less his country's foes.

The sons of the Thames, Tweed, and Shannon,
And the Severn, whose high cradle's in Wales,
Are not the men to falter when
Their country calls them up again—
Honour to their camp and sails!

Farewell to the Victress' Islands!
The transport is getting under way;
To-morrow the land's chalky highlands
May fade through the dashing spray.

Yet fondly the soldiers will cherish
The memory of their own Father-land:
Where'er they roam o'er ocean's foam
Old England is still their hearts' home,
And they'll strike for her, heart and hand.

THE MARKETS.

Corn Exchange (Friday).—The present week's arrival of English wheat having been very small, the show of samples of that article to-day was limited. hence the demand for all descriptions was firm, at fully Monday's quotations. In free foreign wheat rather a large business was doing, but we can notice no improvement in value. Corn under lock was heavy, at late rates. Barley was in short supply. The best malting qualities were quite as dear, but all other kinds were much neglected. There was no alteration in the malt trade, which may be called steady at late rates. The demand for oats, beans, peas, and flour was very dull.

Arrivals.—English. Wheat, 2490; barley 2690, malt, 2750, oats, 1890. Irish. oats, 150. Foreign: Wheat, 5770, barley, 1550; oats 9340 quarters. Flour, 2150 sacks.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread in the metropolis are from 9d to 9½d; of household ditto, 7½d to 8½d per 4lb loaf.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 61s 5d; barley, 44s 6d; oats, 26s 9d; rye, 42s 4d; beans, 46s 10d, peas, 50s 10d.

The Six Weeks' Average—Wheat, 60s 6d; barley, 41s 1d; oats, 26s 3d; rye, 39s 8d; beans, 45s 8d; peas, 49s 2d.

Duties on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 4s 0d; barley, 2s 0d; oats, 1s 6d; rye, 2s 0d; beans, 2s 0d; peas, 2s 0d.

Provisions.—On the whole, there is rather more doing in Dutch butter, at extreme prices. The best Friesland is producing 98s to 100s, and inferior and middling, 74s to 94s per cwt. Irish butter moves off steadily, at late rates. Carlow, landed, 94s to 98s, Clonmel, 94s to 96s; Cork, 92s to 93s; Waterford, 90s to 92s; Belfast, 86s to 92s; and Sligo, 88s to 88s per cwt. English butter has fallen 1s to 2s per cwt. Best Dorset, 104s to 108s, inferior and middling, 98s to 102s Devon, 98s to 100s per cwt; and fresh, 12s to 14s per dozen lbs. Bacon is firm, at 52s to 55s Waterford sizeable, and 52s to 54s for heavy. Limerick sizeable is producing 50s to 54s, and heavy, 50s to 53s per cwt. On board, or for forward delivery, next to nothing is doing Prime hams are quite as dear; but all other kinds are much neglected. In all other kinds of provisions, very little is doing, with fair average supplies on offer.

Tallow.—A further slight decline has been submitted to by the holders of P.Y.C., which is quoted at from 48s to 48s 3d per cwt. Town tallow is scarce, at 49s 6d to 50s, net cash.

Hay and Straw.—Meadow hay, £2 8s to £4; clover ditto, £3 8s to £5; and straw, £1 12s to £1 16s per load.

Hops (Friday) —Although there is rather more business doing in the best colonry parcels of hops, we can notice no improvement in value In the middling qualities, next to nothing is passing. New Sussex pockets, 74s to 88s; Weald of Kent ditto, 80s to 90s; Mid and East Kent ditto, 88s to 126s.

Coals (Friday) —Tanfield Moor, 18s 3d; West Hartley, 17s; Wylam, 18s; Killingworth, 18s 9d Lambton, 20s 6d; Hasting's Hartley, 17s and Sidney's Hartley, 17s per ton

Smithfield (Friday.)—The number of beasts on sale here this morning was seasonably large, but of very middling quality. The few prime Scots on offer found buyers, at full prices Otherwise, the beef trade was in a very depressed state, on somewhat easier terms. From abroad, we received 430 beasts, 1140 sheep, and 22 calves. With sheep, we were fairly supplied, while the mutton trade was heavy, at barely Monday's currency. There was very little business doing in calves—the supply of which was small—at late rates. The pork trade was dull, yet previous figures were well supported. Milch cows were heavy, at from £16 to £18 each, including their small calf.

Per 8lb. to sink the offals:—Coarse and inferior beasts, 2s 6d to 2s 8d; second quality ditto, 2s 10d to 3s 2d, prime large oxen, 3s 4d to 3s 8d, prime Scots, &c., 3s 10d to 4s 2d; coarse and inferior sheep, 4s 2d to 4s 4d; second quality ditto, 4s 6d to 4s 8d, prime coarse-woolled ditto, 4s 10d to 5s 0d; prime South Down ditto 5s 2d to 5s 4d; large coarse calves, 3s 8d to 4s 2d; prime small ditto, 4s 4d to 4s 8d; large hogs, 3s 8d to 4s 4d; neat small porkers, 4s 6d to 4s 8d. Suckling calves, 18s to 30s; and quarter old store pigs, 16s to 19s each. Beasts, 946, cows, 120, sheep, 4010; calves 190; pigs, 310.

Newgate and Leadenhall (Friday.)—We had a very slow demand to-day on the following terms.

Per 8lb. by the carcase:—Inferior beef, 2s 4d to 2s 6d; middling ditto, 2s 8d to 2s 10d; prime large ditto. 3s 0d to 3s 2d; prime small ditto, 3s 2d to 3s 4d, large pork, 3s 4d to 4s 0d, inferior mutton, 3s 6d to 3s 10d; middling ditto, 4s 0d to 4s 4d; prime ditto, 4s 6d to 4s 8d; veal, 3s 6d to 4s 8d; small pork, 4s 2d to 4s 8d.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

Anxiety still prevails in the Money Market, with regard to the Foreign Exchanges. At present the balance is so nicely adjusted, that the least alteration of our present state must immediately affect them. Caution is, therefore, the prevailing characteristic of all transactions of any extent. Money is notwithstanding easy, at about the Bank of England rate for paper falling due in the present year. The tendency of the market is still towards a further rise in price, which would doubtless have occurred some time since, but for the careful manner in which commercial transactions have been conducted since the railway panic; and especially while the Corn Bill was passing the two Houses of Parliament. These circumstances will tend to greatly mitigate, if not entirely avert, the general alarm that has hitherto been felt when any unfavourable state of the exchanges occurred; and lead to the hope that although a further rise in the value of money may be reasonably anticipated, the effect will not be seriously felt either in our home or Foreign commerce.

The English Stock Market still continues buoyant, at an advance of about ⅛ per cent. upon the prices of the preceding week. This arises, however, entirely from a scarcity of money stock each day producing demands, on account of trusteeships, Chancery suits, &c. As a proof of this, in several instances, the money price has been a point dearer than the quotations for account. Business has, however, been confined to purchases on behalf of the public, no speculation worthy of remark existing. The closing price of Consols is 94 ⅝ ¾ for money and time. Exchequer Bills are lower than last week, closing at 8 to 12 pm. New Three-and-a-Quarter per Cents are 95¼; Long Annuities, 9 15-16ths; Reduced, 93⅞; India Stock, 257; Bank Stock, 205 to 206.

The business transacted in the Foreign House has been on the most limited scale. Spanish has been scarcely dealt in, notwithstanding that Mr. Henderson, as representative of the Bondholders, has departed for Madrid, with strong anticipations that he will be backed by the French Government (at the instance of the French Bondholders), which may be presumed to have at present some influence. The closing price of the Five per Cents is 25⅞; Passive, 5⅞; Three per Cents. for Account, 37. Mexican has receded. Affairs in connection with the Republic generally continue very unsatisfactory, and the difference between the agents, Messrs. Schneider and Co., and the financial agent accredited by the present Government, has now assumed the form of an open rupture. The last price quoted is 21¾ for Account. Portuguese is rather flat at 37⅛, it being still impossible to foresee which party will eventually triumph in that distracted country. Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cents. are 59; Four per Cent. Certificates, 81¾; Brazilian Bonds for Account, 85⅝.

There has been a good business doing in the Railway Market during the week, and some fluctuations have occurred in prices. Caledonian have been done at par, but are now a shade lower. An amalgamation with the North Western, is the current opinion, upon which the improvement is founded. Eastern Counties have advanced, and Great Westerns are in demand. Some of the lighter shares have also improved. The subjoined list will show the prices of the latest bargains made. Aberdeen, 19; Ambergate, Nottingham, Boston, and Eastern Junction, 2⅞; Birmingham and Dudley, 6¼ p; Birmingham and Oxford Junction, 9; Bristol and Exeter New, 8½; Caledonian, 24⅞; Ditto Half Shares, 2⅝; Direct Northern, 2; Eastern Counties, 23¼; Ditto New, 7⅞ p; Ditto Perpetual, 5 per Cent, No. 1, ⅝ p; Ditto ditto, No. 2, ½ p; Ditto, York Extension, 3⅝; East Lancashire, [illegible]; Ditto New, [illegible]; Edinburgh and Glasgow, [illegible]; Ditto Half Shares, 20⅞; Ditto Quarter Shares, 18½; Edinburgh and Northern, 15½; Great Southern and Western (Ireland), 29¼; Great North of England, 237½; Great Western, 133; Ditto, Half Shares, 78; Ditto, Quarter Shares, 18; Ditto, New, 7½; Huddersfield and Manchester Extension, 5; Lancaster and Carlisle, New, 11; Leeds and Bradford, 76; Leeds, Dewsbury, &c., 35½; Do., Branch (Blue), 10⅝; Do., Extension (Green), 3¼; Leeds and Thirsk, 16⅛; Do., New, 5¼; Liverpool, Manchester, and Newcastle Junction, 2½, London, Brighton, and South Coast, 59¼, Ditto, Fifths, 48; Do, Guaranteed Five per Cent., 10, London and North Western, 195½; Do., New Shares, 15¾; Do, Fifths, 19½; London and South Western, 65⅛; Do., New, 29⅜; London and York, 2¼; Do., Half Shares, 1⅞; London, Salisbury, and Yeovil, 1⅝; Lynn and Ely, 16⅜; Lynn and Dereham, 15½; Manchester and Birmingham, Quarters (A), 12½; Do., Quarters (B), 12½; Ditto, Quarters (C), 8⅛; Midland, 126 xd.; Ditto, New, 31⅝; Ditto, New, 6¾; Newcastle and Berwick, 33¾; Norfolk Extension, 6⅛; North British, 38½; Ditto Half Shares, 16⅞ xint; Ditto Fifths, 7; Ditto Quarters, 4⅛; Ditto Extension, 1⅞; Northern and Eastern, 75; Ditto Quarter Shares, 18½; Ditto New, 26; North Staffordshire, 3⅝ pm; North Wales, 1; Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton, 8⅞; Preston and Wyre, 34⅝; Scottish Midland, 13½; South Eastern and Dover, No. 2, 13⅝; Ditto, No. 3, 16⅛; Ditto, No. 4, 3⅛; West Riding Union, 2 premium; Wilts, Somerset, and Weymouth, 9½; York and Newcastle, 38¾ xn; Ditto New, 13¼ xn; Ditto Preference, 7⅛: York and North Midland, 93 xn; Ditto, Half Shares, 45⅛; Ditto, Preference, 12½; Ditto, East and West Riding Extension, 18½ xn: Boulogne and Amiens, 13⅞ xd; Demerara, 3⅛; Dutch Rhenish, 4½; East Indian, ¾; Italian and Austrian, 2⅝; Jamaica. South Midland Junction, 1⅞; Luxembourg, ⅝; Namur and Liege, 3¼; North of France Constituted, 9½; Orleans and Bordeaux, 7½; Paris and Lyons Constituted, 4¾, Sambre and Meuse, 4¾.

Saturday Morning.—Consols opened yesterday morning at the prices of the preceding day. The news from Portugal, however, produced an immediate reaction, and a fall of about ⅛ per cent. occurred. Towards the close of the Market, a slight improvement was visible, and the last quotation was 94½ to ⅝. Portuguese Stock has receded to 36. The Railway Market declined. Caledonians closed at 24. Shrewsbury and Birmingham were only ⅞ premium; North Staffordshire, 3 premium; and Foreign Shares were generally flat.

THE LONDON GAZETTE.

Tuesday, Nov. 17.

FOREIGN OFFICE, Nov. 16.

It is hereby notified that Viscount Palmerston, her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, has received from Mr Southern, her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at Lisbon, a dispatch enclosing a note addressed to him by Marshal Saldanha, Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs of her Most Faithful Majesty, announcing the establishment of an effective blockade of the river Douro, together with a copy of the decree declaring the said blockade. Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires also transmits a note from Marshal Saldanha, announcing that positive instructions had been given to the ships of war establishing the blockade to allow British ships of war to enter the port unmolested, and not to prevent the delivery, and reception [illegible], of the mails conveying the correspondence, or the landing of passengers, or even the departure of British subjects who may wish to embark in the packets.

CHARING-CROSS HOSPITAL, LONDON, West Strand, near Charing-cross. Patron, Her Majesty the QUEEN.

The Committee, in appealing to the benevolent for this Hospital, have the painful duty of stating that the losses which it has sustained by the death of many of its best supporters, have recently been very severe.

Since the first establishment of the Charity, nearly a generation of benefactors has passed away, but the claims of misery and destitution continue the same.

Suffering objects succeed to suffering objects in endless succession; and, unless new benefactors arise to supply the place of those who are departed, the resources of the Institution must fail, and its useful operations, from which such unexceptionable benefits and unmixed good have resulted to the sick poor, must be abridged, for want of adequate support.

Through the assistance hitherto afforded to their exertions, aided by great care in the expenditure, the Committee have been enabled to admit to relief between 9000 and 10,000 patients annually, constituting, in the aggregate, a total of 115,000 sufferers under severe sickness and accidents of all kinds, dangerous to life and limb, who have partaken of the benefits of the Charity since its foundation; and the Committee beg to state that subscriptions are most thankfully received by the Rev. G. H. Bowers, B.D. (the Treasurer); by the Committee, Director, Secretary, and Clerk, at the Hospital; by Messrs. Drummonds, Charing-cross, Messrs Coutts, Strand; Messrs. Hoare, Fleet-street, and by the neighbouring Bankers.

FEATHER BEDS PURIFIED by STEAM.—HEAL and SON have just completed the erection of machinery for the PURIFYING of FEATHERS on a new principle, by which the offensive properties of the quill are evaporated and carried off in steam, thereby not only are the impurities of the feather itself entirely removed, but they are rendered quite free from the unpleasant smell of the stove, which all new feathers are subject to that are dressed in the ordinary way.

OLD BEDS redressed by this process are perfectly freed from all impurities; and, by expanding the feathers, the bulk is greatly increased, and consequently the bed rendered much softer The following are the present prices of new feathers:—

BRITISH COLLEGE OF HEALTH, NEW ROAD, LON-DON.—People of England! Bear in mind that Chemistry has been the ruin of the Healing Art. Although a most useful science, when properly applied, it should have no connection whatever with True Medicine. It is by Chemistry that Morphine, Strychnine, and the other deadly poisons are produced!!! and against which all Hygeists so strongly protest. It is because Mr Morison's Medicines are entirely free from chemical agency that they are so far superior to the purgatives used by Doctors, which undergo chemical preparation. No wonder that Doctors, using such deadly chemical preparations, are obliged to prescribe them in grains and half grains with the greatest possible caution: such things can never be Medicines in reality, in the eyes of Hygeists.

THE DOUBLE-ACTION PRINTING MACHINE.

THIS Machine has been invented and just patented by Mr. William Little, of 198, Strand; and, its success is considered, by several eminent Engineers and Printers, to be established by the working of a beautifully-constructed model of three inches to a foot.

To explain the advantages of the new Machine, especially to the reader unacquainted with Printing Machinery, we should premise that, by "the Fast Machine," such as is used for printing the Daily Newspapers, the impression is obtained by Four Cylinders, two of which revolve constantly in one direction, and the remaining two constantly in an opposite direction: thus, only two sheets of paper can receive an impression from the "form" of type with each passage of the table, the cylinders, when giving the impression, necessarily travelling in the same direction as the table. hence, although the form passes under the four cylinders, two of these are alternately idle, and the Machine, consequently, produces only two printed sheets with every backward and forward motion of the type.

The Double-Action Machine works with Eight Cylinders, six of which have a reversing motion, and produces seven printed sheets with every transverse motion of the type: thus, in the "Fast Machine," only half the cylinders actually print alternately, whilst in the latter, seven out of eight of the cylinders are constantly at work; so that, supposing both Machines to have the same number of cylinders, the Double-Action Machine would, from this circumstance alone, produce nearly twice the quantity of printed sheets; but, on comparison, it will be seen that considerably more than twice the number can be produced.

The surface of type, it is known, rests on an horizontal table, which is moved backward and forward by a pinion working in a rack beneath the table; this rack, terminating at each end in a semi-circle of a certain diameter, has, consequently, besides its traversing motion, a lateral motion, at the time of which, the progress of the table may be considered as neutral, or, in other words, the operation of printing is at a "stand-still" until the pinion has passed round the end of the rack, causing a considerable loss of time, during several thousand revolutions; thus, to print twenty thousand sheets by the present "Fast Machine, the pinion must pass five thousand times round each end of the rack, which, with a rack of six inches diameter, is equal to a space of 15,000 feet.

To print twenty thousand sheets by the Double-Action Machine, it is evident, that, as SEVEN sheets are produced from each passage of the table, the pinion will have to pass round each end of the rack only fourteen hundred and twenty eight times, equal to a space of 4284 feet, or 10,716 feet less than in the former machine.

Another source of gain in the Double-Action Machine arises from the cylinders being diminished in size, and by working them as closely together as possible the present four-cylinder Machine requiring a rack of six feet, whilst the Double-Action Machine, with twice the number of cylinders, requires a rack of only eight feet*—which, multiplied into the number of revolutions required to work twenty thousand copies, is about equal to five thousand seven hundred and twelve feet. We have thus far, briefly, and we hope clearly, explained in what consists the difference between the Double-Action Machine and the present Machines.

When the present Fast Four-Cylinder Machine was introduced, it was thought a great achievement to have doubled the number of cylinders; and a further advantageous increase to their number was regarded as impossible; it was, therefore, necessary to adopt some entirely new arrangement, to admit of more cylinders being brought into operation, or to make it possible that half the number of cylinders employed should not remain idle alternately: or, in other words

1st. To increase the number of cylinders, and to make them work backward and forward, each in its turn producing a printed sheet, with every passage of the form of type

2nd. To present the paper to be printed at the exact instant required, and afterwards move it out of the way for the next coming sheet.

The most important and difficult part of the problem was the latter. We could imagine fifty or a hundred cylinders in full play, with the type passing under them at great speed, each cylinder being ready charged with its sheet of paper; but how these cylinders were to receive their next supply of paper, at the exact instant required, and how the printed sheet was to be cleared out of the way, was a difficulty immensely increased, when it was considered that each cylinder must receive a sheet on each side alternately, as will be understood by the annexed diagram.

It is evident that, as the cylinders of the Double-Action Machine work backward and forward, continuous tapes cannot be used, for connecting the printing cylinders with the feeding drums, and revolving with them constantly in one direction. In the diagram, the tapes passing round the drums, 1, 2, 3, 4, have no connection with the tapes passing round the printing cylinders, b, c, d, e; the purpose of the former being to conduct the sheet to the cylinder, and afterwards to receive and carry the printed sheet away. The diagram represents the internal arrangement of a six-cylinder Machine, producing five printed copies with each backward and forward motion of the table; the form of type being shown at one extremity, proceeding in the direction indicated by the arrows.

We will now trace the passage of the several sheets, commencing with that which passes direct to e, the first of the reversing cylinders. The sheet enters on the drum 1 at A, it is then conducted to the feeding rollers, 2, 3, and passes from them to the cylinder rollers, 1, 2, and next round the cylinder e, where it meets the form of type, and receives an impression; it is then conducted by the cylinder tapes through 2, 3, to the takers-away, 3, 4; thence it passes in the direction of the arrows to the point B 2, when it falls on a single continuous tape, and is carried to a receiving box; the next sheet enters on the drum 2, at A, passing as before in the direction indicated by the arrows to the printing cylinder d, and ultimately arriving at the point B 3, when it is again carried by single tapes to a receiving-box; the next sheet enters on the drum 3, and proceeds as before to the cylinder c, arriving at B 4; and the next sheet on the drum 4, to the cylinder b, coming out at B 5, &c. So soon as this last sheet has cleared the cylinder rollers 8, 9, the whole of the feeding and taking-away rollers are made to slide, bringing the same figures over each other, thus —1 over 1, 2 over 2, &c.; the printing cylinders being at the same time reversed, revolve in a contrary direction. It will be observed, the feeders are now in a position to deliver a sheet on the other side of the cylinders: indeed, the whole operation is so simple, that a careful study of the diagram is alone sufficient to explain the theory of the Double-Action Machine.

We have made no allusion to the working of each of the end cylinders, since they revolve only in one direction, and are lifted alternately, as in the old system. Our description, however, would not be complete, without explaining why we combine the old system with the new, since this combination is an important feature in the invention.

It has been stated that the Double-Action Machine has eight cylinders, and that seven printed sheets are produced from each passage of the types. Of these eight cylinders, six only have a reversing motion, or revolve backward and forward; each of the end cylinders lifts and revolves constantly in one direction, like the cylinders of the present "Fast Machine." The reason why the end cylinders differ from the other six is this: in consequence of the reversing motion of the six cylinders, it is necessary that a certain interval of time should elapse to allow the sheet in work to get clear off before the next sheet can be allowed to enter; to effect this, the table must traverse a certain distance beyond the extreme vibrating cylinder, and advantage is taken of this space, to place a lifting cylinder, which does not require the type to pass beyond its centre, thus giving one sheet more from each end of the Machine, amounting to 2,856 during the working of 20,000 sheets. This will explain how seven sheets only are produced from eight cylinders; each of the end cylinders producing only one sheet, whilst the remaining six produce two each, from one revolution of the rack or table.

We conclude with an abstract of the several powers of the Double-Action Machine, working as it may be, with one or more reversing cylinders.

We simply give the number of combined cylinders at work, the length of traverse, the speed per second, and the result from two rates of going, viz., four and five feet per second.

CYLINDERS.		LENGTH OF TRAVERSE.	SPEED PER SECOND.	NO. OF SHEETS PRINTED PER HOUR.
3	2 Constant 1 Reversing	5 Feet	4 Feet	5,760
			5 —	7,200
4	2 Constant 2 Reversing	6 —	4 —	8,000
			5 —	9,000
6	2 Constant 4 Reversing	7 —	4 —	10,000
			5 —	12,000
8	2 Constant 6 Reversing	8 —	4 —	12,600
			5 —	15,750

The average length of traverse of the present "Fast Machines" is six feet six inches, and the average speed four feet per second; the average number of copies printed, 4500 to 5000 per hour.

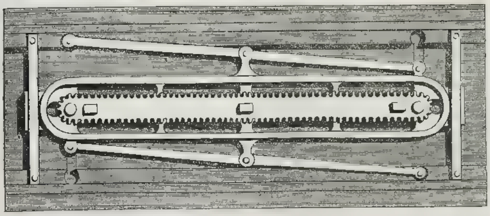
In the New Machine, the process of inking the form is effected in the usual manner, by composition rollers, placed between the cylinders.

The quality of printing will be improved by the New Machine, since the rate of going may be diminished to one half, and the amount of produce still exceed that of the present "Fast Machine."

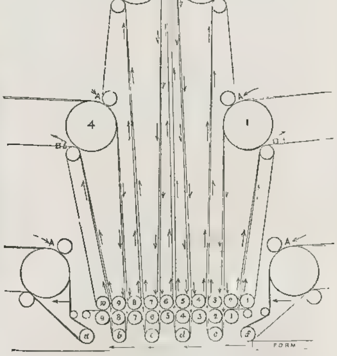
The "register" will be much more perfect, since six out of eight of the cylinders are not disturbed by lifting, from which the tapes are always running at the same tension, and never slackening.

The quality of the inking will be superior, the inking-rollers, from the increased length of the table, having more time for distribution.

The feeding, or laying-on, will be slower and more certain, since, at each drum, arrangement is made for a double laying-on. Thus, it will be seen, increased speed is not gained at the expense of quality in execution, but with its manifest improvement.



THE RACK.



The beautiful Working Model has been made by Mr. Lewis Foster, engineer; and, one thing worthy of remark, and we might say without parallel in the history of mechanics, is, that the principle of the inventor has not undergone the least alteration from the commencement; and that, in the construction of the Model, no experiment has been necessary, and not a single wheel or motion has been wasted: the very first trial was successful. Since then, many thousand sheets have passed through the Machine, as evidence of its perfection in principle and construction.

THE TREATY OF VIENNA.

REALLY short as human life is said to be, one man often outlives many "perpetuities," and survives to see things that were settled "for ever" pass away and perish, as if fate delighted in mocking the very intention of immutability. Among the most variable of earthly things are those that make the most flourishing pretences to eternity of existence and obligations—Treaties and Constitutions. Men of all ranks seem to conspire against them: Kings break Treaties, and people overturn Constitutions: of both kinds Europe, in the last twenty years, has "seen some strange mutations." The later instances are not the least remarkable. The latest of all is the flagrant violation of the Treaty of Vienna, by Austria, Russia, and Prussia, who, from the middle of the last century to the present time, have been three spoilers, acting in concert whenever Poland was to be divided, plundered, annexed, absorbed, and blessed, against its will, with rulers that will not allow it a Constitution, a language, or a religion, of its own. The famous "Partition" has just been completed; Poland, as a nation, has "ceased to exist;" as a people, the Poles may survive, but the last refuge of their independence is blotted from the map. The "free city" of Cracow is now an Austrian town, garrisoned by Austrian troops, watched by Austrian police, and enjoying all the advantages of an Austrian Government. Many, if not all these things it had before, by an invasion of its rights; it could never enforce an exemption from that fatal influence; now, it cannot even claim it; Austria will do as it likes with its own.

Thus, bit by bit, is the Treaty of Vienna becoming in theory what much of it has long been in fact—a dead letter; and is joined to that melancholy list of compacts and alliances which have given a place in history to sundry towns and cities, such as Utrecht and Ryswick, Amiens and Tilsit, have been solemnly sworn to by all parties—and broken on the first occasion when anything could be gained by doing so.

It has been the fashion in what is called the "historical school of writing," to talk in high sounding phrases of the honour of nations, the faith of treaties, the sanctity of engagements, the pledging of Royal words, and various other things of the same nature; but if we would use ourselves to substitute their real meanings for their assumed ones, we should have a much better clue through the labyrinth of human affairs than that commonly given us. Under the honour of nations will mostly be found their interest; the faith of treaties depends very much on whether it is convenient to observe it; the sanctity of an engagement has rarely stood in the way of ambition, when it was strong enough to break it with impunity. As for a Royal word, let one read the records of the Bourbons alone, and he will lose his belief even in the existence of such a thing. The cause of truth is not served by treating things as they ought to be, and as they pretend to be, rather than as they are. There is little of what may be called the morale of action between State and State; they are, in this respect, something like corporations, which are proverbially less scrupulous in their dealings than individuals, being less amenable to any tribunal of opinion or punishment. Schools and colleges give us too high and abstract a view of things, which experience afterwards has much difficulty in correcting. It has often struck us that many a chapter of the "Comic History of England" is probably as near the actual truth as the elaborate periods of very serious ones: we laugh at the whim of the satirist, but if we look a little deeper, we may find many a mournful verity.

Thus, solemn scenes often cover a vast amount of pretence and falsehood, which the actors in them know to be false and intended to delude. The grand Congress of Vienna, so often painted and described, the greatest assemblage of State wisdom that modern times have seen, if judged by its acts, was one of the greatest mockeries that ever figured as a reality on the stage of History. Disreali's phrase, "an organised hypocrisy," applies to the system it created; and, at its sitting, to use the words of the same authority, "the order of the day was read to take in all Europe." Perhaps the most absurd of the delusions it set up was the establishment of the "free Republic" of Cracow, as if such a thing could exist, surrounded by Austria, Prussia, and Russia, with a capital not equal in population to a small London parish, and a territory about half the size of an English county. It was a mockery of homage to the principle of Polish Nationality, which, in 1815, it was not quite safe to outrage totally; and every one of the "Powers" who "guaranteed" its "independence" and "inviolability" knew perfectly well that it was a piece of political humbug, and nothing more; and yet the solemn air with which the farce was played! Is it possible to fancy men so thoroughly versed in the affairs of the world as Metternich, Talleyrand, and Castlereagh, believing for a moment in what they were doing? From the hour it was created, the Republic was delivered over to Austria; England never attempted to give the pretence a reality; we never even had a resident Consul or agent in it; this is what we complain of in such treaties and compacts—that they create shams by common consent, making the world believe they are something else; the national honour and credit of England have been damaged by its connection with a compact we never enforced; but as truth and reality are better to deal with than pretence, for the sake of knowing the real state of European strength and weakness, it is well that Cracow has ceased to be; all that is real and vital in Polish nationality will not be affected by it, and those who prefer that things should be what they actually are, will not regret that a wretchedly-played farce has come to an end. Did it inflict a real injury on the cause of Poland, we should deplore it; but that is not weakened by it, for what was Cracow up to the present time?

Cracow had a Senate—of which every Member was dependent on one of the "Three Powers;" there was a President of this body—chosen by the "Powers;" there was a Municipality—but no citizen could sit in it, save by the approval and consent of all the "Three Powers." Cracow was free to produce and import—but the "Powers" surrounded it with three prohibitive Custom Houses, and by letting nothing but what they chose pass in or out, of course reduced its trade to what it is—nothing. Cracow had a University—but nobody born out of her territory could take degrees in it; and, beyond that territory, even those degrees were not recognised—they even disqualified men from pursuing their professions anywhere else: a man with a degree in medicine from Cracow could not practise anywhere but in Cracow. Such distinctions were, therefore, carefully avoided; and the authority from which we quote these details states that the faculty of medicine in Cracow was reduced to eight pupils! Cracow could coin money—but beyond its borders nobody would take it; the Austrian, Russian, and Prussian money it was compelled to receive. The Austrian Police was in full force in the "Free Republic"—suspicious, omnipresent, brutal, with ears for every word, even in the bosom of families, and a prison ready for every one who dared to utter an opinion. All letters were opened, as a matter of course; thought had not a single outlet, action not a single field. —it had not one element of a State but its name. Such was the "freedom" that the Treaty of Vienna established; and negotiators talked and looked gravely as they did it! The "powers of face" that Statesmen possess is something wonderful.

But, while the direct abolition of this miserable mockery will make but little actual difference in the state of the people of the absorbed Republic, the consequences of the act may not be so slight to the powers who commit it. The present political and territorial system of Europe rests very much on the same "Treaty of Vienna" as its basis; there is not a monarch in Europe who does not hold some state, province, or kingdom, by virtue of that piece of parchment: the will of the people was in no case consulted. Is it wise in the owners of property, of all men, to make light of title-deeds? If the conditions of compacts are not binding on the Monarchs who made them, they are certainly not on the people who had no voice in the matter. The Treaty of Vienna is the title-deed by which the Monarchs of Europe re-entered into possession of their estates, which had been confiscated and seized by Napoleon. It was a new map of the re-distribution of the empire of the modern Charlemagne. it was something more than a mere agreement between State and State; it was a replacing of bounds and landmarks after the subsidence of the waters of a mighty flood, that had for half an age effaced all the old ones. When Mr. Pitt heard the result of the battle of Austerlitz, he said, "We may close the map of Europe for the next half century." His faith, like that of Napoleon, was strong in armies, and the strength they give. But both overrated it: the Devastator and his hosts passed away, and the trembling Monarchs of Europe, who had all in turn licked the foot that trampled them down, crept together, knit their hands in a "Holy Alliance," and sent their heads, their Ministers, to a Congress, of which the Republic of Cracow was only one creation. The mapping out of Europe at that gathering of the "Powers" was a kind of scramble, in which some of the seizures proved singularly unfortunate. The Congress overlooked all natural affinities of race, language, and religion, and formed many ill-assorted unions; Kings were forced on nations that despised them, and people were linked together whose interests and feelings were widely different.

Thus the elder branch of the Bourbons, whose restoration was the chief work of the Holy Alliance, has ceased to reign in France; and Belgium has separated from Holland. Other changes are yet in store; the whole kingdom of Prussia is a creation of Diplomacy, without coherence or natural unity; it is a forced combination of ill-agreeing parts, held together only by the official framework of a Beaurocracy, which will be shattered in the first European convulsion. Austria holds her Italian states under this very Treaty of Vienna, which she is declaring by her own act to be waste paper; is their allegiance perfect and undoubted? and is it quite certain that the same contempt of a formal compact exhibited by three monarchs towards a people, may not be shown by any one of them against each other? To what power can they then appeal? The "faith of treaties?" Alas! they have themselves made it a mockery. In fact, where so much is so fragile, it is dangerous to touch one card of the structure; it may turn out that some such danger has been risked in the subversion of the Independence of Cracow.

THE NEWPORT PAGNEL STEEPLE CHASE.

THE scene from this very spirited race, (on the 20th,) which our Artist has illustrated, is the horses crossing the Turnpike-road the second time. There were two strong fences, the first out of the grass-field, down-hill, into the road; and the second out of the road (a rasper), into the ploughed land. Here the field had become select, and more than half the starters had lost all chance of even seeing the finish. The race now lay between Culverthorpe, Discount, Latitat, The Switcher, and Peter Simple; these being the only horses that seemed likely to reach the winning-field. It would have been well for poor Cigar had his rider thought so; for, although dead-beat, he put him to the first fence into the road, which he just managed; but fell, a burster, at the second fence into the ploughed field, which, indeed, tried the bottom of all, for 'twas very deep. There, it was evident, barring an accident, that The Switcher would win; his rider, the Earl of Strathmore, had him well in hand, ready to let him loose when wanted; and so the sequel proved, for he won easily. It may not be out of place to add that, considering the lateness of the season, most of the horses looked as blooming as if it had been May, instead of November, and did great credit to their respective trainers. It is worthy of remark, too, that four grey horses started and every one fell.

MURDER IN PARIS.—A dreadful murder was committed yesterday week, in the Rue Bertin Poiree, No. 9, Paris. A girl, aged twenty-eight, by name Alexandrine Boulanger, was lately dismissed from the service of M. R——, a cloth-merchant, who had just got married. She considered herself ill-treated, and complained loudly of what had been done, threatening vengeance on M. R—— and his young wife. On the day in question, understanding that M. R—— had gone to the country, she knocked at the door of his apartment, and seeing the door opened by a young woman, she took it for granted that this was Madame R——. She accordingly threw in her face the contents of a phial of vitriolic acid, and then, precipitating herself on her, stabbed her with a knife, in eight places, leaving the unfortunate victim of her passion a corpse. She then threw herself out of the window of the landing into a street, but a market-cart that happened to pass at the moment received her, and she escaped nearly unhurt. When taken out, she declared that she had killed Madame R——. On persons going up stairs to ascertain the truth, it was discovered that it was the servant-girl who had succeeded her that had thus suffered by mistake. Alexandrine Boulanger has been removed to the Prefecture of Police.

PARISIANA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, Wednesday.

Your romantic hero, Sir Walter Raleigh, was on the point of abandoning writing the "History of the World," from finding he could not discover, amidst conflicting accounts, the truth of an incident which had occurred under his very windows I experienced a discouragement of the kind when, after writing the last letter I addressed to you, I found in full circulation in Paris a complete contradiction of the fact I announced,—namely, the return of Count de St. Aulaire to London. Fortunately, what his Excellency said with his own mouth is confirmed; and in the present, as in many other far less foreseen circumstances, I have had the good fortune to be ultimately in the right. Whilst I beg to renounce all hopes of being infallible, the mistakes of the greatest judges, the sacrifice of the reputations and of the lives of hundreds, are on record to warn us against human testimony

But one subject now absorbs all Paris at this moment, whilst the fashionables who throng to the Bourse, run absolutely mad—it is the Cracow affair. With the purely political part of the affair, I have nothing to do, barring my conviction that, administered shamefully as it was, the defunct republic only served to excite hopes, and inveigle into danger those who were the last living ornaments of their country. But there are personal considerations attending it which are highly curious. It is generally known amongst the Diplomacy that, whilst at Vienna, Prince Metternich is, as much as ever, the more than Sovereign of that country, his decline of strength of mind and body, easily explicable by his great age, has been within these few months most painfully remarkable. In such a state of intellect, then, he has been made to do that which is in flagrant contradiction—not with his political principles, perhaps—but with the peace-loving habits and cautious statesmanship of his whole life. It is the more extraordinary, as the principal odium will fall on Austria, and on himself in particular. A statesman at present in Paris, when he heard this news, exclaimed, "Old Metternich is like a candle burning out, he throws out flashes of fire." "Your simile is a true one, indeed," rejoined that great diplomatist, C——, "the candle only makes the darkness visible, and will stink in the nostrils of all Europe." If, to this be added that the King of Prussia has now broken with those liberal opinions which he professed so long, and but so lately again, that he would sacrifice all ideas of absolute monarchy, the present news becomes a most curious manifestation, apart from all political considerations. Well may the Czar laugh in his sleeve at England and France at loggerheads, and at his two new antagonists of Prussia and Austria, who have not been able to keep their itching palms from the easy prey, and are now destined to form his vanguard in the war of opinion he is waging against liberal Europe.

Apart from the good feelings of my countrymen there is no subject of patriotism or of benevolence which is not turned to the profit of political sentiment. Unfortunately for Louis Philippe, whilst subscribing small sums, to extract from the surrounding ruins and the white-wash the chef d'œuvre of the great painter Mignard (now transferred to the Cathedral at Narbonne), and giving twenty pounds to raise a monument to William the Conqueror, at Bayeaux, his Majesty has neglected to a great extent the far more urgent distress of the Provinces, recently so desperately ravaged the whole subscription, including the Royal bounty, only amounting to £24,000. Now the old loyalist party rises like one man, but a giant in strength, to the rescue of their suffering countrymen: La Rochejaquelin proposes that ten millions of francs be raised, and daily fills the papers with his appeals to the nation and the Government; whilst the Carlist nobles are sending in their quotas fast and fiercely not excepting the beaux of the Jockey, such as that well-known enthusiast of Le Sport et le Turf, Count Guy de la Tour, Dupin, &c., each of whom has sent in his 1000 francs, and all professing, and announcing in the journals, that it is their intention to celebrate in this manner the marriage of the Duke de Bordeaux. Thus does the Carlist party find once more the opportunity of occupying public attention, whilst the Radicals, with one eye on Portuguese revolution, and another on Spain, and stimulated by the Cracow affair, are girding themselves for the fight. Verily the brows of men look angry, and the whole social atmosphere corresponds, and the want of a little of the savoir faire of our farceurs to make us laugh, of such as Charles Dickens, whom I met a day or two since, going up the Boulevard, probably to have a glance at Dumas's new Théâtre Montpensier, whose troupe is already assembled, and about to begin its campaign, whilst Adolphe Adam is singling out another spot to build the third lyrical theatre of Paris. Unfortunately, good plays, good operas, and good actors are as necessary as fine edifices; and ultimately the greatest geniuses see in a very different light what they considered once as a most glorious part of themselves.

We have lost the Marchioness of Normanby, one of Queen Victoria's great favourites. Although the official papers here deny it, it is the unpleasant state of feeling between English and French here which has induced her temporary return. She has chosen here for her Majesty an important functionary to every lady, namely, a hair-dresser. M. Serjent, the celebrated coiffeur of Paris, is the fortunate individual destined to become the inmate of Windsor Castle.

FRANCE.

Some of the Paris papers insist that a change of Ministry is inevitable, and speak of the present as a Ministerial crisis. The Courrier Français says:—"We learn that the pacific M. Guizot, in order to meet the accusations of Lord Palmerston, wished to commit follies—to take Landau, fortify Huningue, pass the bridge of Kehl, and so go on. Then it was that Count Molé was called in, as M. Guizot was no longer a possible Minister, either for the North or the West; and it was found most convenient, for maintaining the system, to change the Ministry. Will Count Molé go towards England or towards one of the northern Courts? It is said that the visit of Lord Normanby to Champlatreux may have changed the opinions of Count Molé with regard to England. But what will become of Poland between Lord Palmerston and Count Molé?"

In London there are reports that the Count St. Aulaire, the French Ambassador to this Court, would not return. In Paris, on the other hand, it is stated that Louis Philippe is pressing the departure of Count St. Aulaire for London, hoping that, through the instrumentality of a Minister so respectable, the British Government would be induced to accept an apology for the Montpensier marriage, and make common cause with France in an effort to rescue Poland—Cracow, at least—from its "protectors."

The Parisian journals almost unanimously condemn the violation of the independence of Cracow. Even the Ministerial Presse opposes this defiance of the stipulations of the Congress of Vienna. It has an article on this subject which concludes as follows:—"The King's Government, while it abstains from a common protest with England, as appears to be resolved, against the act notified by the Northern Courts, is far from feeling itself isolated, or above all, from being compelled to resume the passive policy of 1840. It is not the question of the East which is now to be resolved. It is an article of Congress which is assailed, and it is certain that on any new event menacing the peace of the world, Europe will place itself under the conditions of ancient treaties. France is too strong not to support the treaties of Vienna. They have deprived her of none of her influence. But whatever they may be for her, they are everything for the Continent and for England. As to the violation of these treaties which has just been committed at Cracow, we believe that there will be occasion now less for protests than for convening a new Congress."

The Paris papers announce the death of the celebrated historian, Michelet, whose late work called "Priests, Women, and Families," excited so much attention.

Don Henry, brother of the King of Spain, arrived on Thursday night (last week) in Paris from Brussels, on his way to Madrid, and alighted at the Elysée Bourbon.

Some curious corn riots have taken place in the department of the Indre-et-Loire. On the 17th, a miller of Mettray, on going to bring away a quantity of corn he had purchased of the Mayor of Cerelles, was assaulted by a body of 200 people from Semblancay, who insisted with threats that it should be given up to them at their own price; and although the miller complied, he was ill-treated, and obliged to fly for safety. On the 19th, similar disorders took place at Neuillé Pont Pierre. This assemblage amounted to 600 persons. Troops were sent to these scenes of outrage, and it is said that they are entirely suppressed.

RIOT AT BOULOGNE-SUR-MER.—On Wednesday last, about two o'clock in the afternoon, Boulogne-sur-Mer was a scene of complete commotion, occasioned by a shipment of oxen and potatoes for England. The mob would not allow them to be embarked, and a violent altercation took place between them and the police, during which time the sous-préfet, the mayor, and authorities arrived they were received with a volley of stones and potatoes. The sous-préfet had his order torn from his breast and was nearly killed. During the time the authorities were parleying and seeing the potatoes put on board the Britannia steamer, a ludicrous farce took place. Some boys and women cut the rope to which [illegible] cows were attached; and the beasts, being set at liberty, some were driven into the water, and others were hooted and pelted about the town, to the terror of the inhabitants. The mob, about seven o'clock in the evening, paraded the streets, singing the "Marseillaise," and when they arrived in the Rue de l'Ecu, opposite the mayor's house, they began breaking his windows, which alarmed his worship so much that he became emporte, and ran out of his house sword in hand, threatening destruction to every one. If the National Guard (Horse) had not suddenly come up, the worthy mayor would have probably received a severe chastisement from the infuriated mob. M. Adam, the mayor, has, for some time past, received anonymous letters, stating, that unless he prevents the exportation of potatoes, he must take the consequence, and about ten days ago an incendiary fire took place on one of his farms. On Thursday the town was quiet. On that morning several of the ringleaders were arrested.

SPAIN.

Letters from Madrid of the 18th inst. state that at 5 o'clock on that day 31 ladies of the highest nobility received from the Queen the sash of Maria Luisa on the occasion of the Royal marriages. Those ladies were to appear on the 19th at the Royal levee, bearing that decoration. Mr. Henderson, who represents the Spanish bondholders in England, was to have had an interview with the Minister of Finance on the 18th. The last dates from Lisbon were the 13th, when that capital was perfectly tranquil. Hopes were even entertained that Colonel Wylde would succeed in adjusting amicably the question at issue between the belligerents

On the 10th inst. a grand banquet was given to Mr. Cobden at Cadiz. Don Jorge Urtetegui presided, supported by Mr Cobden on his right, and Don Jose Maria Elizalde on his left. There were also present at different points of the table the following gentlemen:—Mr. J. Duncan Shaw, Mr. C. Hanrie, Mr. D Macpherson, Don Julian Lopez, Don Juan de Dios Lásaute, Don Juan Escribano, Don Manuel Ruiz Tagle, Don Jose Lopez Bonal, Don Manuel Docavo y Casal, Don Jose Nicolas de Oviedo, Don F. G. de Arboleya (the editor of the Comercio), the Marquess de Urena, the English Consul, Dr. Bodman, Don Manuel Quesada, Don Joaquim Urtetegui, Don Jose Maria Aguirrevengea, Don Manuel Marzan, Don F. Mendez, the Count de Casa Brunet, Mr. Daniel O'Ryan, Don J. P. Gomez &c. There were altogether 44 persons present, all gentlemen of high standing in society, and for the most part interested in commerce. In the course of the evening the President proposed "Mr. Richard Cobden,—may Heaven prolong his life, so as to enable him to behold the complete triumph of his sound doctrines throughout Europe as he has already done in England!" (Loud applause from all the guests, which lasted some minutes.) Mr. Cobden then rose, [illegible] the uproar immediately subsided into a solemn silence, testifying at once the curiosity and impatience of the audience. The honourable gentleman assured those present that the supporters of Free Trade in England had only had one object in view, which might be summed up in a single word—liberty! (Applause.) Mr Cobden proceeded to add "I deem it useless, gentlemen, to say a single word for the purpose of convincing you how favourable freedom is to commerce. All history proves it. Let the different nations of Europe compare notes, and we shall find that in all of them commerce flourishes or declines in proportion to the freedom or restriction it encounters Compare a seaport enjoying a freedom of trade with another which is deprived of that blessing, and the same difference will be manifested. All of you will remember, gentlemen, that during one year Cadiz enjoyed extraordinary prosperity; you will have present to your minds the great number of ships that adorned its ample bay—the vast traffic which animated its streets, and filled its magazines with the products of all climes. What was the cause of this magical change in Cadiz? Its climate—its port—its products, were the same as ever; but there had been one alteration which explained all this prosperity. For one year Cadiz was a free port!" (Immense applause.) A number of other speeches were afterwards made in favour of free trade by Mr. Schwabe and some of the Spanish gentlemen present. At length, Mr. Cobden rose and rendered his thanks, in a friendly and festive style, to the President, Senor Urtetegui, for the hospitable reception he had been favoured with.

THE BRAZILS

We have received the Gazeta Official of Rio de Janeiro up to the 1st of October. According to that journal, a proclamation of the Monte Videan authorities had declared the armistice at an end; and hostilities had in consequence recommenced in the River Plate on the 15th of September. General Riveira had left Monte Video, and was proceeding to Enton Rios.

It is certain that Madriaga had concluded a convention with Urgniza at Alcaraz about the 14th of August, but the conditions were not known at Corrientes on the 20th of that month, nor at Buenos Ayres on the 13th of September. It had not been sanctioned by the Government of Corrientes.

The Alecto steam-boat was in readiness to start at a moment's notice from Monte Video. It was said Baron Deffandis was to embark in her on his return to France.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

THE WAR WITH THE KAFFIRS.—Papers and letters from the Cape of Good Hope have reached us to the 7th of October inclusive, being 18 days later than the previous accounts. At the above date the war with the Kaffirs was still going on, but it was rumoured that the Governor shortly contemplated some decisive measures for putting a period to it. The Kaffirs had made several offers of capitulation, but the Governor wanted his own terms complied with, which were, that the insurgents should give up all their arms and restore the cattle they had stolen. The English boundaries were also to be extended

It appears that the frontiers of the Kaffir country are still held by our troops; that the bushy kloofs and woody ravines on the left banks of the Keiskanna and the Beka had been completely scoured by Colonel Somerset, with the capture of upwards of 3000 head of cattle; and that he was then on the track of one of the Kaffir chiefs who has recently made himself conspicuous, even among his countrymen, for his treachery and barbarity

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

THE LIABILITY OF PROVISIONAL COMMITTEEMEN.

The Court of EXCHEQUER has for several days been occupied with arguments on a motion for a new trial in the case of Reynell v. Lewis, and Wyld v. Hopkins, in which verdicts had passed for the plaintiffs, upon the ground that the defendants, as provisional committeemen, were liable for contracts made by the solicitors of the "Central Kent," and the "Peterborough and Nottingham Junction" Railways, although in either case the defendant had not expressly given any authority, but merely upon the implied authority alleged to have been given to the solicitors by having consented to become members of the provisional committee.

Mr Martin, who argued against the rule in the case of Wyld v. Hopkins, contended that, if a man became a provisional committeeman, he thereby gave authority to those joined with him in the undertaking to bind him in all matters necessary for carrying out the common object

Mr. Baron Rolfe did not know what a provisional committeeman was.

Mr. Martin said it was a word as well understood as any in the English language, both by counsel and jurors, and by everybody except the Bench at Westminster Hall

During the argument in the case of Reynell v. Lewis, Baron Parke said he thought the question in this case was simply whether the defendant, as a provisional committeeman, authorised the particular contract which the attorney made for him.

Mr. Cowling, on the same side, submitted that in any view of the case there must be a new trial. A provisional committeeman had no power to interfere in the management of a proposed company, and the question was, whether he could be made liable without acting, merely because he assumed the name of a provisional committeeman or a promoter

Baron Alderson doubted if the words "promoter," or "provisional committeeman," conveyed any definite ideas of liability. "Partner" was a relation held and understood as involving certain liabilities

The Lord Chief Baron, in delivering the judgment, said that one of the questions which had been raised was, whether the contract was made by the plaintiff or his agent with the defendant or his agent. In every case this was a question of fact for the Jury dependent on the evidence, the plaintiff being bound to prove that the defendant had expressly or impliedly, personally, or by his agent duly authorised in that behalf, pledged his credit for the performance of his portion of the contract. In most of the cases against committeemen, the contracts were made not by the defendants personally, but by third persons, on, as it was alleged, their behalf; and the question then was, whether those third persons were the agents of the defendants generally, or specially for these particular transactions. In the actions against provisional committeemen the relation of principal and agent was not in general established by evidence of acts on the part of the defendants directly constituting the agent, nor indeed by any act beyond that of allowing their names to be used as provisional committeemen. In "Reynell v. Lewis," the defendant had, in addition, expressed himself, in conversation, pleased with the moderate sum expended in preliminary expenses Such an observation might, with propriety, be submitted to a jury, and they might give it such weight as they might think it deserved. In the two cases now under consideration, it had been contended that when the relation of a provisional committeeman was established, it constituted a quasi partnership, so as to make one committeeman liable for the acts of his fellow-committeemen; and that the fact of a man being a "promoter" of a railway scheme, coupled with the fact that he knew the money had been subscribed for defraying preliminary expenses, raised an implied authority to his co-promoters to pledge his credit for those expenses; and that the mere fact of being a provisional committeeman established a sufficient case to go to a jury, and to justify them in finding a verdict against him for those preliminary expenses. The Court were unanimously of opinion that such a consequence did not follow, as a matter of law, from the mere fact of a man's assenting to become a provisional committeeman Such an assent was nothing more than a promise to perform the duties of a provisional committeeman in the particular company; and, as a provisional committee was to act only till a managing committee was appointed, their duties would be commensurate with the powers conferred on them by the body which they professed to represent. Therefore, a mere assent to become a provisional committeeman implied nothing more than an assent to become one of that body. Such a body might be constituted for various objects—as to building an hospital, or an assembly-room, or a school-house, or to obtain an Act of Parliament to make a bridge, canal, or railway. Whatever the object of the association was, whether charitable or commercial, the legal consequences of joining it as a provisional committeeman were the same. In all such associations there was wanting the first element of a partnership—a participation in profits and losses, and, therefore, there was no partnership. It was absurd to suppose, as had been contended at the bar, that it was the intention of parties, consenting to form such associations as provisional committeemen, to constitute all others concerned in the furtherance of the project their agents, so far as related to the promotion of the common object. In some of the cases brought before the Court the defendants had merely consented to become provisional committeemen—in others they had, in addition, authorised their names to be published in a prospectus—in some, the prospectuses set forth merely the objects of the associations, and the names of the provisional committeemen—in others, the names of the members of the provisional and of a managing committee, and of the surveyors, solicitors, counsel, secretary, and others, and the particular duties which the provisional committee undertook to discharge. They were all of opinion that when a prospectus was published with the defendant's name in it, and the defendant originally authorised his name to be inserted in it, or he knew of its publication and did not object to it, the question would be, what was the legal inference to be deduced from such a prospectus? and this must, of course, depend upon the contents of the prospectus. Should it contain merely the names of the provisional committeemen it would throw no light on the matter, and would not alter his liability, and would be no more than saying "I am a provisional committeeman;" and the publication would not affect the matter one way or the other. If the prospectus contained a list of a managing committee, this might suggest that that the latter committee were to act in exclusion of the provisional committee, or, perhaps, as their agents; and, in the latter case, the provisional committee would be bound by the acts of the managing committee. So, if it contained the names of the solicitors, the question might arise—were they the agents of the provisional committee, and to what extent, and what were the duties usually performed by solicitors to railway companies? It was obvious that, in all these cases, much would depend on the terms of the prospectus, and the inference reasonably to be deduced from them; and, if a defendant should know of the appearance of a prospectus with his name in it, it became his act as much as if he had bound himself expressly by writing the contents. With these views, they were of opinion that, in "Reynell v Lewis," there was some evidence to go to a Jury, and that the evidence had been properly left to the Jury; but there might be a new trial on payment of costs, in order that the evidence might be considered by the Jury, with reference to the principles which they had now laid down. In the second case, they were of opinion that there ought to be a new trial, but not on payment of costs, as they entertained doubts whether there had been sufficient, or any evidence to go to the Jury.

Rules for new trials made absolute.

THE CRIMINAL INFORMATION AGAINST MR FERRAND, M.P.

Our readers will remember that, on the first day of the present Term, a rule was obtained, in the Court of QUEEN'S BENCH, calling upon Mr. Ferrand to show cause why a criminal information should not be filed against him for the publication of two letters in the Times, on the 8th and 10th of August last, which charged Mr. Lewis with having conspired with Sir J[illegible]am in order to obtain from [illegible] Mott, an Assistant Poor-Law Commissioner, a false report with respect to the Keighley Union, for the purpose of injuring his character, and crushing him as a Member of the House of Commons, Mr. Ferrand being the Chairman of the Board of Guardians of the Union.

On Tuesday, Mr. Martin, Q.C., showed cause a[illegible] the rule. He said: In the summer of this year a Committee was appointed by the House of Commons to investigate certain charges which had been made with respect to the management of the Andover Union. It was during the sitting of this Committee, that the two letters complained of appeared in the Times. Reports of the evidence adduced before the Committee appeared from day to day in the newspapers, and thus came under the notice of Mr. Ferrand. A few days before the first letter was written, Mr. Parker, who had been Assistant Commissioner, and M[illegible], who held the office of Secretary to the Commissioners, were examined before this Committee. The first letter was written by Mr. Ferrand on reading a report of the evidence given by these gentlemen. [The learned Counsel then read the letter, which stated that he (Mr. Ferrand) had been unable to attend his Parliamentary duties on account of indisposition, but that he had watched the proceedings of the Andover Committee with the most intense interest, and that the feelings of every honourable member of the House of Commons must revolt at the evidence adduced before the Committee on the preceding Saturday, as it was distinctly proved that part of the statement made in the House of Commons by Sir James Graham, reflecting severely on his conduct, was false. Further disclosures were prevented by the Chairman requesting Mr Parker to confine his answers to the matter before the Committee; and, when further observations with respect to the Keighley Union were made, Mr. Manners Sutton ordered the room to be cleared. The letter went on to state that he should prove that Mr Mott was merely the tool of Mr. Lewis, that the whole business was nothing more than a conspiracy on the part of Sir James Graham and Mr. Lewis, in order to "crush him" (Mr. Ferrand.) The second letter stated that Mr. Lewis had been guilty of the most deliberate falsehood, in order to deceive the House of Commons, and in order to rescue his confidential friend, Sir James Graham, from the infamy that awaited him.]

From these letters, it appeared that Mr. Lewis was charged with having assisted in getting a report made by Mr Mott which contained false statements; and that, knowing them to be false, he delivered the report to Sir James Graham, to be used by him in his place in the House of Commons, and that the report was so used.

Sir Frederick Thesiger said that was not all. His learned friend should read the last passage.

Mr. Martin complied. The letter complained of then proceeded to state that t[illegible] proceeding was a foul and infamous conspiracy on the part of Sir James Graham and Mr. Lewis to crush Mr. Ferrand the writer, in the House of Commons. The second letter further stated that Mr. Lewis, when examined before the Andover Committee, made a false statement with [illegible]ect to the reports on the condition of the Keighley Union. Mr Lewis had stated that Mr. Mott was sent down to Keighley in consequence of a notice of motion entered by Mr Ferrand in the notice-book of the House of Commons, for an address to the Crown to rescind an order of the Poor-Law Commissioners with respect to the Union, which Mr. Ferrand denied, as his motion was not made until June, whereas Mr. Mott's report was dated the 23rd of April. Mr Lewis stated that he had no communication with Sir James Graham before desiring Mr Mott to visit the Union. Sir J. Walsham was sent down to make a similar investigation, in order to test the accuracy of Mr. Mott's report, and a committee was appointed on the 28th of June to investigate the subject, and made their report on the 15th of July. The affidavit of Mr. Lewis stated that he did not direct Mr. Mott to make a false report, and that he believed it to be strictly true; that he did not carry it to Sir James Graham, knowing it to be false; and that he had never conspired with Sir James Graham for the purpose of prejudicing Mr [illegible] other person; and Mr. Mott, in his affidavit, denied that he had received any instructions from Mr. Lewis, or any other person, to make a sp[illegible] colourable report. The learned counsel read an affidavit of Mr. Parker, which stated that he went in his gig with Mr. Mott from Halifax to the Keighley Union, when Mott told him that he received instructions from the Commissioner [illegible] further stated his belief that t[illegible] to enable Sir James Graham to make the well-known attac[illegible]and, and this affidavit was supported by Mr. Parker's state[illegible] of Commons that Mr. Lewis was guilty of duplicity in acq[illegible] James that no instructions had been sent to Mr. [illegible]t to go to [illegible]. Mr. Ferrand, in his affidavit, now stated, that when he saw Mr Lewis's name in connection with the inquiry on the [illegible] Committee, he even then knew not that he was the person who had furnished Mr Mott with the instruc[illegible] So much with respect to his letter of the 5th of last August to the editor of the Times. The second letter was attributable to an error into which Mr. Ferrand fell, and which it was M[illegible]'s fault had not been corrected. Mr Manners Sutton having asked a witness, Mr. [illegible], what explanation could be [illegible] what was said of Mr. Mott's visit to Keighley by Sir James Graham, Mr. [illegible] Sir James Graham had stated th[illegible] he [illegible] search to be made at the office in Somerset House, and that no minute of such instructions to Mr. Mott having been sent, and the cha[illegible] having been mad[illegible] James Graham, he (Sir J[illegible]) might have pa[illegible] that by [illegible] cognisant of any such instructions having been sent. [illegible] he stated most explicitly that Mr. Mott was sent down to get a report against the Keighley Union, in order to assist Sir James in making an inculpatory speech against Mr. Ferrand. Mr. Lewis's affidavit did not remove the ground of Mr Ferrand's complaint, that Mr. Mott's was not a fair account.

Mr. Bovill followed upon the same side.

Sir F. Thesiger appeared in support of the rule, and said that he had listened with the greatest disappointment to the addresses of his learned friends, because he had expected, either from the opportunity for reflection which had been afforded to Mr. Ferrand himself, or from the sober advice, that s[illegible] ment would have been made by them to Mr Le[illegible] had endeavoured to leave the sting in the wound, [illegible] minds of their Lordships, and of the public also, that there was some foundation for the calumnies which Mr. Ferrand had published. They had altogether mistaken the grounds of this application, which raised the question, not whether Mr. Mott had received instructions from Mr. Lewis or Sir James Graham to report on the state of the Keighley Union, but whether Mr. Lewis had been engaged with Sir James Graham in a foul and infamous conspiracy to crush Mr. Ferrand in the House of Commons, and for that purpose had employed Mr. Mott to draw up a false report to be thereafter presented to and used by Sir James Graham as a true one.

Lord Denman said that the Court was called on to allow a criminal information to be filed against a gentleman who had, in published letters, made the strongest charges, conveyed in the grossest la[illegible] against the applicant for this rule. In excuse, certain circums[illegible]n, the object of which was not to justify these letters, but to show that they had been published when the writer was in a state of mind that would induce the Court to extend reasonable indulgence to [illegible]. The complic[illegible] the Court had been desirous of hearing a statement of all the particulars of the case, and of looking into the affidavits befor[illegible]d at the conclusion that the defendant was not in some degree entitled to its indulgence. But after the fullest discussion of the matter the Court was convinced that not only was there not a foundation for the charge of conspiracy against Mr Lewis, but nothing in what had occurred since that offered [illegible] for supposing that the imputations complained of were justifiable. Notwithstanding some degree of neglect on the part of Mr. Lewis, and the misfortune that his letter to Mr Mott had not been properly recorded, Mr Ferrand stood without excuse for publishing such libels as those which were now brought to the notice of the Court. It was not necessary, then, to say more than that there was nothing to furnish a reason for supposing that Mr. Lewis employed Mr [illegible] in a[illegible] way for the purpose of injuring Mr Ferrand, or that Mr. Mott made any charge against Mr. Ferrand which would warrant the statements that had been made; or that Mr. Mott, Mr. Lewis, or Sir James Graham, or any of them, did take an improper proceedings against Mr Ferrand. Under th[illegible]stances, Mr. Ferrand stood completely without justification for what he had done, and the rule prayed for against him must be made absolute.—Rule absolute.

THE ELECTION OF ALDERMAN GIBBS AS CHURCHWARDEN OF ST. STEPHEN'S WALBROOK.—In the Court of COMMON PLEAS on Tuesday, Mr. Justice Coltman delivered the judgment of the Court in the case of Gibbs and another v. [illegible]ght and another. The learned Judge decided that the [illegible] election of the same person to the same office without any nece[illegible], and that, consequently, the election of Gibbs was not valid, and therefore a nonsuit must now be entered against the plaintiff.

COMPENSATION AGAINST THE EASTERN COUNTIES RAILWAY COMPANY.—In the QUEEN'S BENCH, on Thursday, Mr. G. Shillibeer, the inventor and proprietor of the patent funeral carriage, obtained £500 damages for certain serious injuries sustained by him on the 18th of October, last year, in a collision which took place at the Shoreditch Station of the Eastern Counties Railway.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

[illegible]ICKS OF MONEY LENDERS.

[illegible] Court, for the present Mayoralty, commenced on Mond[illegible]t at the opening of the session were, the Right [illegible] Lord Mayor, the Recorder, Alderman Wilson, and Sir C. Marshall, the Sheriffs, Deputy Sheriff[illegible].

William Wilmot Buron surrendered to take his trial upon an indictment charging him with obtaining £20 from Clementine Frances White, by means of false pretences.

Mr. Clarkson conducted the prosecution, and Mr. B[illegible] appeared for the defendant.

The prosecutrix, a maiden lady, residing at Connaught-terrace, Edgware-road, saw an advertisement in the Times, in which the advertiser [illegible]ented to be in want of £20 for fourteen days, and was willing to give a bonus of £5 for the accommodation, and to deposit security, which was described as "not bulky," to the amount of £90 for the repayment. The prosecutrix answered the advertisement, and the prisoner called upon her, and after some conversation he produced several warrants for tea, which he represented to be young hyson, and worth 6s. a pound; and upon his depositing these documents, and giving a promissory note for £25, payable in fourteen days, the prosecutrix advanced him £20. The bill was not paid when it arrived at maturity, and upon further inquiry being made, it turned out that the article to which the warrants referred was worthless rubbish, and instead of being green tea it was black, which had been coloured before its exportation from China, so as to resemble that description of article. In answer to questions put by Mr. Ballantine, it was admitted that the tea was in the same state in which it was sent from China, and that the warrants for tea were very commonly negotiable among brokers and other persons; and it also appeared that upon one occasion the tea in question had been put up to public sale, and had found a purchaser.

Mr. Ballantine, on behalf of the defendant, urged that there was no proof of fraudulent knowledge on his part with regard to the teas; and that, for all that appeared to the contrary, he might have privately received those warrants, and believed them to be of value; or that, at all events, they were ample security in a transaction where the party advancing the money had obtained his promissory note, and expected interest to the amount of 600 per cent.

The Recorder having summed up, the Jury almost immediately returned a verdict of "Guilty."

There was another indictment against the prisoner for a second offence of a similar character, but it was not gone into.

The officer who apprehended the defendant said he found in his possession several duffer's watches, and also a £20 note, which it appeared he had only [illegible] before obtained from another person by similar fraudulent means to those adopted in the case of Miss White. He wished to know what he was to do with the property, and whether he was to deliver up the note to the person who claimed it?

The Recorder said that all the property had better be placed for the present in the hands of the Sheriffs, who would no doubt do what was right in the matter.

FRAUD UPON THE BANK.

On Wednesday, Henry Hitchcock, alias Henry H[illegible], alias Henry Barrett, alias Henry Jones (27), described as a valet, was indicted for feloniously forging an order for the transfer of certain stock in the Long Annuities, standing in the names of George and Sarah Edwards, with intent to defraud the Governor and Company of the Bank of England.

The evidence went to show that on the 5th January, 1842, the prisoner presented himself at the office of Mr. Bayley, a stockbroker, in Lothbury, and expressed a desire to sell out the stock in question, and as Mr. Bayley was at the time out of town, he was referred to another stockbroker named Crompton, who was in the habit of transacting business for Mr. Bayley in his absence, and the prisoner produced to that gentleman a letter from Sarah Edwards, whom he stated was his wife, requesting that the stock in the Long Annuities, standing in the names of herself and husband, should be transferred and sold. Mr. Crompton said it was the usual course, under such circumstances, to have a power of attorney from the wife if she could not attend personally; and the prisoner said that his wife was ill and could not come to town, and he hoped the business could be completed without her, as he wanted to take the money back with him to the country. Mr. Crompton, upon this, agreed to go to Mr. Smee, the chief accountant of the Bank of England, and represent the circumstances: and as it appeared that the Bank authorities could not legally resist the demand of a husband to have stock standing in the names of himself and wife transferred upon his own application, it was suggested that the prisoner should make a written demand for the transfer of the stock, before it could be effected. The prisoner upon this wrote a demand for the transfer, which he signed "George Edwards," the husband of Sarah, the parties whose names appeared in the books of the Bank. The stock was then duly transferred, and the proceeds, amounting to £43 15s., were handed over to the prisoner. The fraud, it appeared, was not discovered until very recently.

The Jury found the prisoner "Guilty," and Mr. Justice Coltman sentenced him to be transported for life.

ALLEGED ROBBERY BY A TRADESMAN.—In our Police report, a short time ago, we stated that a charge had been preferred against James Galloway, a tradesman, of having stolen a quantity of gloves, value £7 10s., the property of Mr. T. Hambury, of the Bankruptcy Court. The prisoner was tried on Tuesday, at this Court; but the evidence did not at all sustain the indictment, and the Jury gave a verdict of "Acquittal."

POLICE.

PLUNDER OF A SIMPLE COUNTRYMAN.

At the MANSION-HOUSE, on Monday, Edward Billington, Thomas Thompson, and Robert Chulme, were charged with having robbed John Smith, a labourer, of Portobello, near Edinburgh, of £170 in bank-notes.

John Smith, who had been sent for to Scotland by the Lord Mayor to give evidence, made the following statement: About four months ago I arrived in London, from Melbourne, in Australia, and on the 13th of October I was robbed of all the money I had in the world in this manner. As I was going on that day up to Caroline-street, Bedford-square, from Mr. Hayes's, in the City, I was accosted by a person having the appearance of a gentleman. He asked me the name of some street, and I said, "I am sorry I cannot inform you, for I am a stranger here." He said he had just come up from the London Docks, and been two hours making his way up, and had not found the place. I said London was an awkward place for strangers to be in, but I had found out my destination. He then said he was very thirsty and wanted a drink of porter, and invited me to go with him. I hesitated very much, but at last consented, and we went into a public-house, at the corner of Caroline-street, where we had some porter. Before we had finished the porter, Billington, one of the prisoners at the bar, came in, and said he was newly come from America; and he asked about the Museum, and then entered into conversation with the person I first met, whose name, it appeared, was Capt. Harvey, about American money, and produced what appeared to be American money, and American drafts of money on London. Billington also said that he had an appointment with his lawyer at Gray's Inn, and he prevailed on me as a stranger to go with him and he would show me a part of the town, so we all three, Captain Harvey, Billington, and myself, went to Gray's Inn Coffee-house. [Here the prosecutor detailed the conversations which took place between them, from which it was palpable enough to all the bystanders in the justice-room that it was what is called a regular "plant" upon him.] He then proceeded thus: Captain Harvey having said he wanted to go to the Bank, and Mr. Billington having said he wanted to get a transfer made of some American funds, I said I wanted to go to the Bank also, so we all left the house and agreed to meet there at two o'clock. I had a bill to take to the bank of Australia, from whence I was sent to Smith, Payne, and Smith's banking house in Lombard-street; but before I got there I met Captain Harvey, who after asking me if I had got my business done, accompanied me to Smith, Payne, and Smith's, where he said he had just drawn his money, and where he saw me receive £170 in £10 notes. The unfortunate prosecutor then particularly stated all that had occurred between him and Captain Harvey and Billington after he received his money. They all went to a public-house within a few doors of the Lincolnshire beer-house in Holborn, to have a smoke, "and there," said the prosecutor "they had a glass of gin each, and I had a glass of brandy, and Billington said he would go over to Gray's-inn Coffee House and see if his lawyer was come; and he took his pocket-book out and laid it on the table, as Captain Harvey said something about his not stopping, and he said there were bank-notes in it to the amount of £500, and bills. He stopped away about ten minutes, and on his return he again said he had not seen his lawyer. Captain Harvey then said he would go and get a stamp for the £100 which Billington offered to lend him, and he placed his pocket-book, as a security for his return, upon the table. The captain then went out, but he came back instantly and beckoned to me; and as I was going to him Billington said to me, 'Why do you not do as Harvey has done, leave your pocket-book on the table as a security for your return;' and so I laid my pocket-book upon the table, and we left Billington alone in the room."

The Lord Mayor: And all your money was in your pocket-book?—The prosecutor: The whole of the seventeen £10 notes were in it. When Captain Harvey and I got about thirty or forty yards down the street, I declined going any further, but he wished me to go further for a stamped receipt. I returned, and there was no person in the room, and my pocket-book was gone. The people at the bar said the person I left in the room must have gone out at the back door, and I then gave information to the pol[illegible]

The prisoners were ultimately remanded.

THE CAT, THE MOUSE, AND THE RAILWAY TRAIN.—On Friday morning (last week), the early railway train between Kendal and Lancaster ran over and killed a [illegible] cat, which was crossing the line with a mouse, and was too intent upon her prey to notice the approach of the engine. The cat was afterwards found completely cut in two, with the mouse firmly fixed between her teeth.

EPITOME OF NEWS.—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

A letter from Vienna gives a[illegible] details of a catastrophe in the silver mine of Idria, near Laybach, on the 2nd. It appears that an explosion [illegible] whilst 16 men were at work in the mine, and that they were all killed. To prevent new accidents water was let into the mi[illegible]ed.

On the 6th inst. a most dreadful accident occurred at Constantinople. At the new government iron-works a large chimney was in course of construction, under the charge of Armenians, aided by English engineers, and had been carried to the enormous height of 250 feet. It slid, and its fall destroyed the lives of 50 workmen, and wounded 80 or 100 more. The cause of the accident is attributed to the wilful deviation of the Armenian director from the plans of the English engineer, Mr. Hague, even after the protests of the latter.

Divine service was performed at Weimar on the 9th instant, by John Ronge, to a congregation of more than 800 German Catholics. He alluded in his oration to the establishment of a universal German church, which the progress of the age called for.

A number of bad half-sovereigns, composed of a sort of metal resembling zinc and gilded by the electro-plating process, are now in circulation. They are not easily to be detected by the ring, and they are well executed. The deficiency of their weight, however, immediately shows they are counterfeits.

Constantinople accounts to the 7th inst. give a recital of the murder in cold blood of some two hundred Nestorian Christians by the Kurdes, and of the defeat of the Turkish army, under the command of Tayar Pacha. The bands of Bedr Khan fell upon the Nestorian villages in the districts of Tiary, Tchoma, Diss, and Albagh, and murdered men, women, children, and even infants at the breast; the Christians who offered the least resistance being put to the most cruel and refined modes of torture and death. None were suffered to escape, and even if they did, it was to be subsequently hunted down like wild beasts. It is calculated that several thousands have already perished. The districts of Tiary, [illegible], Diss, and Albagh have been completely laid waste, the passage of these plundering hordes being marked by the traces of bloodshed, rapine, and murder. Thirty-seven Christian villages have been pillaged and burnt.

The Poet Tegner, Bishop of Wexio, in Sweden, died at the Episcopal Palace, in that city, on the 2nd instant, aged 64. He was one of the greatest modern Swedish poets, and his works, "Frithiofs," "Saga," "Axel," &c., which are translated into the English and most of the European languages, have been read with admiration and delight.

At the last meeting of the Royal Geographical Society it was announced by Sir J. H. Pelly, that the Hudson's Bay Company had fitted out a well-equipped expedition, for the purpose of surveying the unexplored portion of the coast on the north-east angle of the American continent. The expedition, consisting of eleven persons and two Esquimaux guides, started in two boats, on 5th July, under favourable circumstances, the ice having cleared away from the shores of the bay at an earlier period of the season than usual.

Accounts from Constantinople furnish lamentable details of the ravages of the cholera in Asia Minor, where it was reported to have carried off some 40,000 persons. Letters from Bagdad, of 15th October, state that the malady had disappeared in that city. It first made itself manifest about the end of September [illegible] in less than a fortnight 4000 persons died, out of a population of 35,000. THE KAFFIR WOMEN ADVANCING AS A SCREEN TO THE MEN, AUGUST 16.

THE KAFFIR WAR.

In our Journal of last week, we gave the latest accounts received from the Cape of Good Hope, with a summary of the present position of the Kaffir War. We are now enabled by our Artist (several of whose sketches have already illustrated this event), to engrave a very interesting episode in the conflict, the best accompaniment to which will be found in the following, from Fort Cox:—

"Friday, the 14th Aug.—At two o'clock this morning, a party of Capt. Wilson's Corps, consisting of 200 men and five officers, under the command of Lieut. Stevenson, marched for the Amatola Heights, in search of Kaffirs. This party went a circuitous route, and ascended the mountain by the north side. At daybreak, they fell in with about 40 women and children, from whose husbands Captain Ross had previously captured two horses and a number of goats. After a search of six hours they next came across a small party of Kaffir men, and 85 women and children. The former, on perceiving our men approaching, made off with their cattle, sheep, and goats, into the bush, while the latter marched two deep from behind a bush, as it were to cover or conceal the retreat of their friends. Lieut. Stevenson, on arriving at the spot, ordered his men to fire, which it is believed had a good effect, another party to watch the movements of the women and protect his rear, and a third to burn and destroy the huts, about 100 in number. After the firing had ceased, he ordered the kraals to be dug up, in which were found large quantities of Kaffir and Indian corn, the whole of which was destroyed, except what the men could carry with them. The party returned to Fort Cox after twelve hours' arduous search and employment. They found one waggon, which belonged to the train captured from Major Gibson. One man on our side was killed."

NATAL.

A very satisfactory arrangement has just been entered into between the Lieut.-Governor of Natal, and the Zoolah Chief Pandah; and, the interview for this purpose has been sketched by our Cape Artist with his customary spirit and fidelity.

The transactions are comprised in a Message from Pandah to the Lieut.-Governor, opening thus:

"We are sent by Pandah to the Lieut.-Governor, in consequence of his (Pandah's) having assembled his people. Having heard of some dissensions in the adjoining nation (Sapousa's), he judged it prudent to be prepared for any emergency; and also because this nation, on a former occasion, took advantage of dissensions among the Zoolahs, and destroyed their King, capturing the children of the Royal family, and a great quantity of cattle.

"Pandah wishes to know if the Lieut.-Governor has repudiated his first wife, or whether he still loves her as when he first married her? Pandah says He was the first bride of the English Government—why is he repudiated? If he is regarded as he ought to be regarded, why is he not permitted to do as he has been done by? Let the Lieut.-Governor consider, and let Pandah learn, by the nature of his reply, that he is still considered in the same light as before.

"The first acquaintance of the Zoolahs with the English Government began by sending Sotobie by sea to Cape Town. Since then the Zoolahs have behaved well towards the English Government; and, although the Amaquabie Tribe destroyed some Englishmen, they were severely punished for it. Pandah still entertains the same feelings, and considers himself a member of the family of the house of the Great Government.

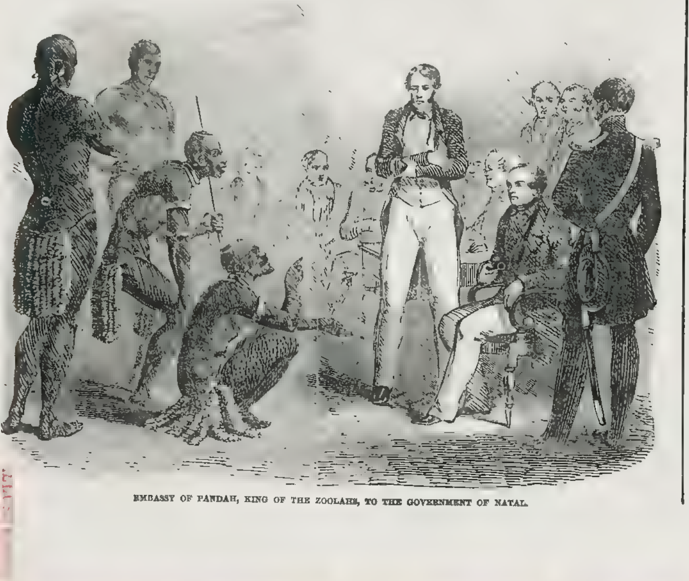
"Pandah, therefore, thinks himself entitled to ask restitution of everything that is his property. Of this, the first is, that in the possession of Sapousa's Nation; and then that in possession of Mawa and her followers, and of Kofyaan. A man's property is a man's property."

Pandah then says that he has an injury in his back, and swelled feet, or he would come himself; he presses for a personal interview, to explain away what the Chief states to be misrepresentations of the proceedings of the Zoolahs, their cattle, &c. In conclusion the poor Chief asks for some medicine to cure his feet, some blankets to keep the cold out, &c.

With this message a deputation proceeded to the Lieut.-Governor, and the Illustration shows the interview. It seems that Pandah had been arming, which caused the Lieut.-Governor not only to send to inquire the cause, but he ordered British subjects to watch the territory. He declines to make war on Sapousa's nation, and assures Pandah that should the peace of this portion of the British territories be, in any manner, disturbed, by his making war unnecessarily, and without the sanction he has requested, he will inevitably draw down upon himself and his people the resentment of the British Government.

The Lieut.-Governor then disposes of the other matters in Pandah's Message, and states that he cannot, at present, have his district, but that he will meet Pandah at the boundary. He sends blankets, but not medicine, as he does not know what would be beneficial to the Chief.

We find the result of the correspondence thus noticed in a Cape Town paper:—"Within the settlement, great satisfaction is expressed at the decision of her Majesty's Government, respecting the lands. The first sale of Government land was held on the 6th August. At the Umgeni, the prices were from 4s. to 6s. 6d. per acre; at the Congella, the prices were £2 per acre. At D'Urban, among other articles in the market, are mentioned two waggon loads of coals, brought from a distance of six days' journey by ox waggons. The depth of the pit from which they were taken is said to be from ten to twelve feet. The soil and climate of Natal are found to be very favourable to the cotton plant, and considerable quantities of cotton have been exported, of good quality."



EMBASSY OF PANDAH, KING OF THE ZOOLAHS, TO THE GOVERNMENT OF NATAL.

PORTUGAL.—THE PROGRESS OF THE INSURRECTION.

We have received letters from Lisbon by the Polyphemus to the 17th instant, being four days later than the accounts noticed in our late impression last week. Nothing of a decisive character had occurred up to that date between the armies of Saldanha and Das Antas. A Lisbon letter states that the advanced guard of Saldanha "had been completely beaten, with loss of ammunition, and the whole of the advanced force taken; and that Saldanha had retired on Carregardo (four leagues north-went of Cartaxo). It was known (adds the letter), that Das Antas would not attack Saldanha, until the arrival at Santarem of the Conde de Bomfin, with the 5th and 6th Caçadores and Cavalry, who were hourly expected, as well as General Ozorio, as the Count is resolved to have good general officers, to manœuvre and attack General Saldanha in that way that his force will be completely cut off from Lisbon." Great desertions, it was stated, were still taking place of the Queen's troods to the enemy. The forces of Schwalback had been routed by the Conde de Bomfin near Evora, and the former had fled to Elvas, and was thus completely cut off from all communication with Saldanha. All the Western Isles were said to have pronounced in favour of the popular movement.

The following analysis of events is abridged from private letters from Lisbon:—The insurgent force, under Brigadier Celestino, has rallied again after the check it suffered at Viana (in Alemtejo) on the 28th ult.; and, it is said, has crossed the Tagus, above Santarem, and effected a junction with the main body of the army. Old General Schwalbach, has, in consequence of this, been obliged to raise the siege of Evora, and to march upon Almeirim, for the purpose, as is supposed, of getting to the rear of Antas, and annoying him by cutting off his supplies. Schwalbach's attempt upon Evora was foiled by the steady resistance of its defenders. The popular insurrections on the south bank of the Tagus, as well as in the districts bordering upon the suburbs of the capital, have operated powerfully as a diversion in favour of Antas, by drawing away from Saldanha's army above 1000 men, who are divided into two columns, one on each side of the river, and kept perpetually moving about to scour the country.

A vessel has arrived at Lisbon, from St. Michael's (Azores), bringing news of a general insurrection of the people of that island against the Queen's Government. The troops there stationed, consisting of the 5th infantry (500 strong) and part of a battalion of Caçadores, have joined in the revolt

After visiting the Duke of Saldanha, by whom he was received in the most friendly manner, Colonel Wylde proceeded to Santarem, where he met with an equally flattering reception from Count das Antas, whose troops he states to be in as excellent order as the Queen's. Antas took him round to the quarters of the different regiments and volunteer battalions, and showed him the muster-roll of his forces, which the Colonel says are about 4000 regulars, and from 4000 to 5000 irregulars, all regimented and well armed. In cavalry, Antas is very weak, not having above 200 dragoons, but in artillery he is not much inferior to Saldanha, as he has nine field pieces. The insurgents seemed to be very confident of success, and to be well supplied with provisions from the country in the rear. Colonel Wylde dined with Antas, in company with Jose Estevao, Mousinho d'Albuquerque, and other chiefs of the party. Antas said that the Queen had not a more loyal subject than himself, and that he and his comrades were in arms not against her, but against the liberticide faction by whom she was kept in a state of coercion; that his object was merely to restore the status quo prior to the counter revolution of the 6th of October; and that he was determined to succeed or perish in the attempt. Alluding to the Queen's recent decree, ordering all civilians taken in arms to be shot, he said that if that measure should be carried into effect, he should be reluctantly, and much against his own feelings, obliged to retaliate.

The Diario do Governo contains a decree, which has thrown the whole commercial body, and especially the British merchants, into a state of the greatest consternation. We subjoin some of the articles of this decree

Art. 1 Every person who shall reject a Bank of Lisbon note, when tendered in payment, shall incur the punishment of transportation, besides a penalty of from 50 to 500 milreis, at the discretion of the Judge

Art 2. The same punishment and pecuniary penalty will be incurred by all who shall stipulate for payments in coin, or who shall establish one price for payments in notes and another for coin.

Art. 3. All clauses, conditions, and agreements already entered into, stipulating for payments in coin, are hereby declared null and void

Art. 4. Offenders against the provisions of this decree shall neither be allowed bail nor trial by jury.

Palace of Neceesidades, Nov. 14, 1846. (Signed) THE QUEEN
Countersigned by all the Ministers.

Subsequently to the above a letter arrived, dated from Lisbon, Nov. 19, six P.M. The intelligence it contains is not of a decisive nature, but is generally confirmatory of the news previously received. The writer, in a postscript, says:—"The Government have received an express that the Conde Das Antas had this day, in the morning, attacked the posts of Saldanha"—without, however, giving any result, which had doubtless not transpired. Saldanha had previously sent an urgent request to the Government to send him 2000 men, with horses and mules, of which he was much in want; the National Battalion, however, had refused to march. General Selestino and his forces entered Santarem on the 16th; and General Baron de Almargen, with his forces, from Oporto, had also arrived there, with a large sum of money The British merchants had sent a strong memorial to the Government at home against the Decree of the 14th of November. An influential deputation of Portuguese merchants had also waited upon the Minister, to induce him to modify the Decree, to prevent the evils it was likely to inflict upon trade and public credit; and ultimately the Government consented to revoke the decree—so far, at least, as it regards its retrospective operation, whereby the notes of the Bank of Lisbon were made a legal tender.

THE GIRAFFE CRICKET.—(SEE NEXT PAGE.)

The insurgents were still in arms. A battle had taken place at Chaves, in the north of Portugal, between a portion of the insurgent army under the command of Viconde de Sa da Bandeira, and the Queen's troops, headed by Baron Casal, and the result had been a loss of between one and two hundred killed or wounded, besides two regiments (the 13th and 15th), which had deserted to the Baron Casal.

DESTRUCTION OF THE INDEPENDENCE OF CRACOW.

The violation of the independence of Cracow is completed. An official manifesto of his Majesty the Emperor of Austria, placing henceforth that city and its territory under his Imperial sway, according to a convention entered into at Vienna on the 6th inst., between Prussia, Russia, and Austria, has been published.

The Augsburg Gazette contains the following:—"It is said that two powers of Germany only consented, with great reluctance, to the incorporation of Cracow. Russia insisted, and finished by declaring that one of the three Powers must take possession of that Republic. Russia said to the Austrian Cabinet, it must be either you or I; that after the treasonable conduct of the republic in the affair of Gallicia, she had lost all right to an independent existence, and that it would be ridiculous to speak of its neutrality, or of its preservation; that those who defended the Polish cause did not evidently understand its meaning; that it was the most determined enemy of the three Powers, and that they had the right, and were obliged to act in their own defence. With regard to the treaties concluded between the three Powers, as to eventual incorporation, it was to be regretted that it had not taken place sooner, as seas of blood might have been spared. As to the possession of Cracow, it was a matter of insignificance, except in a military point of view. In taking possession of it, it would be necessary to make great financial sacrifices, and as Cracow was poor, it could count but little on a compensation. The Austrian troops who are to form the garrison of Cracow are already on their march. It is rumoured that whatever commercial privileges belonged to Cracow as a free State, will not be interfered with—a sop, as it is asserted, thrown to England and France."

The Journal des Débats says:—" Four companies have received orders to march from the garrisons of Mulhouse and Belfort, and take up their quarters at Hunnique, it is believed, for the winter."

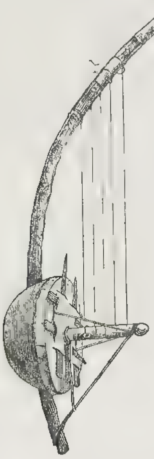
The fortress of Hunnique, according to the treaty of Vienna, ought to remain for ever dismantled.

The Universal Prussian Gazette, under head of Cracow, 17th, says:—" That the public taking possession of Cracow by the Austrian government, took place on that day with great solemnity. All the civil and military authorities assembled at an early hour in the morning, in the Hall of the Senate, when the decision of the Emperor was publicly and officially made known. A salute of 21 guns was then fired to announce to the inhabitants of Cracow the inauguration of the new system of government. A solemn service was performed in the churches, at the end of which the Austrian National Hymn was sung. All the garrison were under arms, and fired salutes in honour of the event."

The territory of Cracow extends 21 square miles. The population of the city is 43,000, of the territory 146,000. The revenue amounts to two-and-a-quarter millions of Polish florins.

AFRICAN CURIOSITIES.

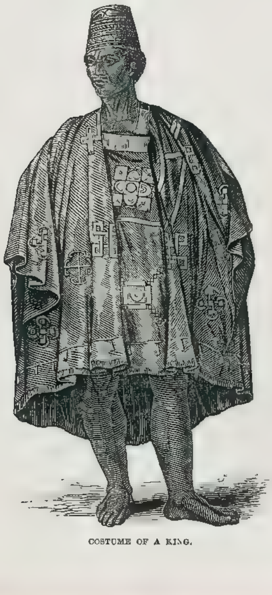
Captain Denham, who has just returned in the Avon steam-vessel, from the coast of Africa, has brought with him a number of curiosities, botanical, zoological, and ethnological, which would form a most valuable acquisition to our great national Museum. The report of them was so promising, that we dispatched one of our Artists to the steamer, lying at Woolwich, to sketch the most attractive of these novelties; and here are the graphic results.



AFRICAN GUITAR.

The most beautiful object is a fine Gazelle, one of the smallest species of the deer tribe, evidently in the enjoyment of the best health. It is full grown, and only between 12 and 13 inches high, although three years of age; it is of delicate symmetry, the thickness of its fore legs, below the knees, being under half an inch in diameter, with the hairs of its skin scarcely longer than the pile of velvet. Its head is proportionally small, and tapering almost as acutely as the bill of a bird. The beautiful little creature was in Captain Denham's cabin, where his lady fed it, while our Artist made the annexed Sketch.

Next is an entomological novelty—the Giraffe Cricket, caught two miles from Quitta, on May 29, of the present year: it has six wings, the outer ones something like the wings of a beetle; those beneath of a very delicate light green colour; and the undermost ones of fine network. The height of the Cricket is five inches; it has very long legs, the foremost of which it employs as a means of defence.



COSTUME OF A KING.

GAZELLE, BROUGHT BY CAPTAIN DENHAM, IN THE "AVON" STEAM-SHIP, FROM THE COAST OF AFRICA.

AFRICAN UMBRELLA HAT.

The next object is a Guitar of the singular construction shown in the adjoining column. The frame is of bamboo; the belly is a calabash, covered with hide; and from its middle rises an upright, to which are fixed five strings, of common hemp. The instrument is held in the left hand, against the hip; and beautiful and varied tones are produced by pressing on the bamboo, and thus varying the tension of the strings. It will thus be seen that the chief novelty is in the mode of playing the Guitar.

The Regal Costume, next figured, consists of a mantle of dark blue colour, which is worn in graceful folds over the shoulders: it is of a substance between silk and cotton, and it is richly dight with various ornaments. The cap is likewise of several hues.

The accompanying Costume is that of a Warrior: the cap is made of two monkey skins, sewn together; the apron is made of long grass, and on the left side is worn a leather pouch; the shield is of wicker-work; from the neck is suspended, by four strings, a knife or dagger, in a red leather case, mounted with skin rings; and a spear, with a leaf-shaped blade, completes the Chief's war appointments. Above the dagger is figured a calabash, or bottle, brought from the River Dodo.

In the centre column is figured one of the large Umbrella Hats, made of rushes, and commonly worn on the African coast.

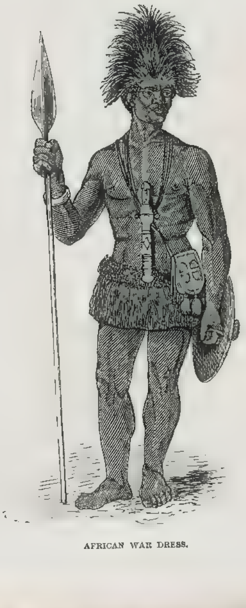
In the Collection, also, are a number of seeds, flourishing plants, &c.; some beautiful live love-birds, and preserved specimens of the quadruped and insect tribes.

Captain Denham is a distinguished Fellow of the Royal Society; and his father, Colonel Denham, who holds an office in the Tower of London, has one of the finest African collections in England.

Capt. Denham has been twelve months on the African coast; and had two of his officers killed by the natives.

On Friday, Rear-Admiral Sir Francis A. Collier, Knight, C.B. and K.C.H., accompanied by Commander Smith, of the William and Mary yacht, went on board the Avon steam-vessel, to inspect the crew and vessel. The captain, officers, and crew enjoy excellent health, and the captain has succeeded in accomplishing the object for which the vessel was fitted out—to survey a difficult part of the coast of Africa, and went over a greater extent of coast than was originally contemplated, with satisfactory results.

The Avon will be paid off to-day. It is as gratifying to announce that on the first board-day after she reached England, the 13th instant, her commander, Henry Mangles Denham, F.R.S., was promoted to the rank of post-captain.



AFRICAN WAR DRESS.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON ALMANACK.—SECOND EDITION OF 40,000.
This Day, price 1s., gilt edges,

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON ALMANACK, AND PICTURESQUE CALENDAR FOR 1847.

This ALMANACK is submitted to the Public by the Proprietors, with confidence of its superiority over its predecessors. The Work was commenced in 1845, with a view of furnishing a Repository of Useful Knowledge of permanent value, for constant reference, in Astronomy, Astronomical Occurrences, and the Natural History of the Year.

The ASTRONOMICAL DEPARTMENT has been placed entirely under the superintendence of JA[illegible].

On the third page of each month is a series of Tableaux of Memorable Events, carrying out in a true spirit what is usually and properly introduced into our Almanack; not for occasional reference only, but to cherish respect for these landmarks of British History.

The fourth page of each month is devoted to Natural History. The whole of this portion is from the very able pen of Mrs. LOUDON, and the interesting series of Illustrations to this department has been drawn and engraved by Miss LOUDON, under the immediate superintendence of Mrs. LOUDON.

The Calendar Illustrations are from the masterly pencil of WILLIAM HARVEY, and engraved in the first style of Art, by LINTON; illustrative of the National Sports.

Published at the Office of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, 198, Strand.

CALENDAR FOR THE WEEK.

SUNDAY, N[illegible] Advent Sunday—Mercury sets at 4h. 53m. p.m.
MONDAY, 30.—St. Andrew—Venus rises at 7h. 23m. a.m.
TUESDAY, Dec. 1.—Mars rises at 5h. 8m. a.m.
WEDNESDAY, 2.—Napoleon crowned, 1804—St. Paul's finished, 1710.
THURSDAY, 3.—Belzoni died, 1823.
FRIDAY, 4.—Saturn sets at 9h. 47m. near W.S.W.
SATURDAY, 5.—Mozart died, 1792—Battle of Austerlitz, 1805.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"R. G. L." has sent us three long astronomical queries, which we have not room to repeat but proceed to reply to: 1. The motion of the Satellites of Uranus is retrograde, or contrary to the order of movement of all other bodies yet noticed; a phenomenon, it is true, which prevents any satisfactory hypothesis relative to the primary cause of planetary motion, but not, therefore, contrary to all the known [illegible] nature. 2. The Sun constantly emits streams of light; but whether the shining matter of the Sun is or is not a fluid is mere speculation. Experiments prove that the edges of the Sun possess a light as intense as the centre; and, therefore, a portion of your theory is wrong, with respect to the Equatorial parts of the Sun becoming less through his rotation on his axis in 25 days and 10½ hours. 3. The remark, that "the different Planets are the Children of the Sun," must be [illegible] figuratively, and not in a literal sense.

"P. Q. R.," Cambridge. We are now aware that Professor Challis observed the New Planet on the 4th and 12th of August, but he did not know that these observations were of the Planet till after the discovery was announced by others. We are also aware that Mr. Adams did perform calculations similar to those of M. Le Verrier; but the former gentleman never published a word about them, whilst the latter had such confidence in them, that he published the results for the [illegible] of Astronomers; in consequence, it was found in the predicted place, and upon M. Le Verrier the honour of the discovery must be. We are gratified to find that English Astronomers were on its track; and we admit that it is a discovery of the age, and that it could not long have been undiscovered.

"Fanatica per la Musica." Mr Wade's book is excellent; and we recommend, in addition to that work, Hamilton's "Catechisms of the Rudiments of Harmony and Thorough Bass," published by Cocks and Co. At a more advanced stage, study Rinck, G. Weber, Albrechtsberger, Czerny, Reicha, &c.

"R. S."—Brewer's "Beauties of Ireland" has been completed.

"Annette" and "G. M." are thanked, though we cannot entertain their propositions.

"Consulo," Kempsey.—The age of the Author named is 30, and he is unmarried.

"A Three Years' Subscriber."—Ravizotti's "Italian Grammar;" or, try "Italian Without a Master."

"T. C. D.," Dublin.—Thanks for the Music, which shall appear.

"A Late Resident in Edinburgh." The Letter shall appear, with an Engraving, probably, next week.

"A. A[illegible]n," N. B., may obtain minute information of "Public Baths and Wash-houses" from the Reports of the Establishments already in operation. We cannot, however, direct our Correspondent to information of the same class respecting "Mutual Building Associations."

"N."—The Receipt in question will be sufficient evidence of payment.

"R. B." Phillips's Portrait of Lord Byron is reputed to be a good likeness. (See Mr. Murray's Editions of the Noble Poet's Works.)

"Benedict," Rye. Vegetable Ivory (the Tagua Nut) is the produce of a tree found on the banks of the River Magdalena, in Columbia. (See "Year-Book of Facts," 1845, p. 226.)

"A Competent Person" and "H. T. D." are mistaken: the Drawing of the Wellington Statue and Arch, in our last week's Journal, is correct in its proportions, insured by the Artist's extreme care.

"E. Y."—The Rev. Canon Bowles, the Poet, is still alive.

"R. D. X." If the arms in question did not interfere with the heraldic bearings of any other family, the College would have no objection, under the circumstances stated by our Correspondent, to confirm the shield to him. The expense of the confirmation would be about seventy-five guineas.

"An Old Subscriber." Mr Harford, of Blaize Castle, near Bristol, has, we believe, on his [illegible] referred to. A letter addressed to "Sir Charles [illegible]y, Heralds' College, Doctors Commons, London," would obtain the desired information.

"D. F."—The Statistics of Paris may give the number.

"A Regular Subscriber."—Carving Meat or Wood? We do not know Dr. Patrick Macdonell's age.

"J. S. C.," Great Yarmouth, recommends our Subscribers to pass over their copies of our Journal a box-iron and heater, moderately hot, which "will draw out the beauty of the fine Engravings."

"A Ten-Hour-Bill Advocate," Huddersfield.—Portrait of Mr. Fielden, M.P., has not appeared in our Journal; Mr. Oastler's Portrait is in No. 97.

"C. S.," Worcester, is thanked for the hint.

"R. H. S.," Paddington.—"Taylor's Short-hand, improved by Harding."

"A Subscriber Since 1844," Liverpool.—We believe Mr. Dickens has not written a line in the Periodical named.

"A Gentleman," Cheltenham.—A series of beautiful Illustrations of St. Giles's Church, Cheadle, will appear in our Journal next week, or the week after.

"A Highlander," Edinburgh.—The London Season begins with the Opening of Parliament.

"M. V." Robert and James Montgomery are only brothers in Song.

"Tyrannus," West Clandon. See the Report of the late Meeting of the British Association; or wait for the Society's published Report.

"E. D."—We cannot assist our Subscriber, in either case.

"A Constant Friend," Dublin.—See our Journal of last week.

"Oxoniensis" and "J. E." may be right in their conjectures as to the origin of "Infantry": we, last week, gave the etymology upon the authority of Mr. Booth, a very close investigator.

"E. L.," Chapel-street.—We do not take cognisance of Wagers.

"R. C.," Liverpool. "The Hand-book to Paris."

"A Subscriber," Bognor.—The Engraving in question has not appeared in our Journal.

"Fanny."—Capitals are indispensable in the first-named case; optional in the second.

"D. K."—The Lines will not suit.

"A Lady" will find "the Seven Wonders" in "Bailey's Dictionary": we cannot spare room to quote them.

"M. J."—The question of "Who is an Esquire?" has been discussed at considerable length in Mr. Burke's "Patrician." The subject would extend far beyond our limits.

"G. H."—The present Duchess of Marlborough is daughter of Lord Ashbrook. Her maiden names were Charlotte Augusta Flower.

"A. B. G. D." The promises of situations given by one Government are not expected to be carried out by their successors in office.

"F. D. S."—The Queen descends in direct line from the Guelphs.

"A Constant Reader."—Sir John Hunter Littler is son of the late Thomas Littler, Esq., by Diana, his wife, daughter of John Hunter, Esq., a Director of the East India Company; and grandson of Robert Littler, Esq., of Cheshire.

"F. R."—The pay of a Cornet of Dragoons is eight shillings a day. £1[illegible]0 additional income would enable the Officer to live respectably, and to keep his proper position in the Regiment.

"[illegible]" Our Correspondent's definition of the Brevet is correct.

"Perseverer," Yarmouth.—Address a letter to the "Rev. F. Hamilton, Royal Academy of Music, Hanover-square, London."

"Rumtitum." Carlotta Grisi is married to Perrot, but has been separated for some years.

"A. J. F.," Cheltenham.—We have many offers for the publication of Songs, but, [illegible], cannot make any pledge as to their publication.

"[illegible]'s" letter has been mislaid.

[illegible] for want of room.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 28, 1846.

THE life of a Chancellor of the Exchequer is a continual warfare, an unceasing struggle with Financial Reformers: no sooner is a deputation, demanding the abolition of the Malt Tax, bowed out, than another enters with a request of the same kind respecting To-[illegible] having been expended, that is dismissed; and a third appears, to insist on a reduction of the Tax on Tea: the Minister is as much embarrassed by his suitors as Portia by hers; "while we shut the gate upon one wooer, another knocks at the door." But, as far as we can gather, one formula does for every case; there is a general answer, which suffices for each—"we can't afford it." The reply is not unknown in the circle of much smaller Commonwealths; the controllers of private Exchequers have often to meet requests more difficult to deny than the pleadings of a deputation, in the same manner. [illegible] desirable [illegible] possible; and a universal abolition of taxes is among them. It is unfortunate that the agitation should have selected precisely the three articles that furnish the greatest amounts of revenue; hundreds and thousands can be dealt with, in a spirit of liberal audacity; a calculation may go wrong, without a State and a Ministry falling through a hole in a Budget, into an abyss of embarrassment and confusion. But, when it comes to counting by millions, the boldest Statesman is paralysed at the prospect of such immeasurable deficiency, and he defends his tax with a courage and determination borrowed from a sort of financial despair. He points to our liabilities, and asks, "How is it possible, with all these bills to be provided for, that I can be humane, or generous, or considerate—or, in fact, indulge in the luxury of any one of the virtues? On my honour, gentlemen, it is as much as I can do to be honest and punctual." A sum of fifty-four millions are for ever present to his mind's eye; and knowing that subtracting nine will leave it only forty-five, he points out that to the zealous men who invade Downing-street, and leaves the grim, unbending fact to speak for itself.

There is, at the present time, a movement being made against these three taxes on Tea, Malt, and Tobacco. The benefit the reduction would be none can doubt; and that increased consumption would make up for that reduction is all but certain; but the increase would be gradual, and extended over a series of years, while the demands on us are present and unceasing. The interval between the cutting down and the growing up would be the period of difficulty: we must tax ourselves in some other way to meet it; and a burden is a burden, however carried.

We doubt grievously the prudence of consenting to a temporary tax, in the hope, or under the assurance, that, at a certain time, we may be able to do without it. The time for the doing without it rarely comes. The three years of the Income Tax are lengthening out ominously, and we have as little hope of seeing the end of them as we have of reaching the age of Nestor. Let not this awful warning have been given in vain; if any such rashness is committed as trusting the Government with a new tax, or screwed-up per centage on an old, to last till a shilling a pound on tobacco and tea, with no Malt Tax at all, brings the revenue up to what it is at present, we shall probably gain a fresh impost, and defer indefinitely the swelling of the golden stream from the old ones. As to the three taxes themselves, the Malt Duty, being an Excise, is "a hateful tax," on orthodox authority; of the other two, being import duties, more may be said. The evil of the duty on tea is its unjust equality on all sorts alike, which might be remedied by adopting the ad valorem principle, never thoroughly tried, and too readily abandoned, on official complaints of its difficulty. We all know the enormous "difficulties" raised in a similar quarter against the Penny Postage—and how they were disposed of. Opinions differ as to whether tobacco is a necessary: a man must be the very slave of a habit before he can maintain he can't live without; and, with no antipathy to the "weed," we are inclined to class it as a "luxury," and a fair subject of taxation, since all may do without it if they like, which cannot be said of tea or beer. And if it came to a question between an increased Income Tax or cigars "at present rates," it would be preferable to know that of threepence expended in a genuine Havannah, two disappeared in smoke, that rises as incense on the altar of the State. There is, besides, a Window Tax not very productive, and which has spoiled every house built for the last forty years, as an impost that is very assailable; but at present financial reformers are attacking the very positions from which they can be the longest resisted.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

THE COURT AT OSBORNE HOUSE.—The Queen, Prince Albert, and the Royal Family, remain for the present at Osborne House, Isle of Wight, and we are happy to say are in the enjoyment of perfect health.

THE QUEEN'S VISIT TO ARUNDEL.—Edward Howard Gibbons, Esq., Mayor, called a meeting of the inhabitants a few days ago, to consider the means best adapted to welcome our most gracious Sovereign to this town, when it was decided to erect a triumphal arch at the western entrance, near the spot where anciently stood the water gate. The Mayor and Corporation will here receive her Majesty and present their address, with the insignia of office. It is likewise agreed that a subscription should be raised for a donation of meat and bread to the necessitous poor. It is arranged that her Majesty shall be received, on entering the county of Sussex, at Emsworth Bridge, by an escort of the Arundel and Bramber Yeomanry. Should the weather be propitious, a great influx of company is expected. The shops are to be all closed, and a general holiday will be the order of the day.

BIRTHDAY OF THE PRINCESS ROYAL.—Saturday was the sixth anniversary of the birth of her Royal Highness the Princess Royal, and the usual rejoicings took place.

PRINCE GEORGE OF CAMBRIDGE.—Prince George of Cambridge is gone on a visit to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland at Besborough. His Royal Highness last week shot a vast quantity of game in the preserves of Mountshannon, the Royalty of which has been given to the Prince, by the excellent proprietor, the Earl of Clare.

DEPARTURE OF THE PRINCESS OF HESSE.—Her Royal Highness Princess Caroline of Hesse left London on Monday for the Continent.

THE ROYAL FAMILY OF PORTUGAL.—It is stated that orders were given, before the departure of the Court for the Isle of Wight, for the immediate preparation of apartments in Windsor Castle, in case the Queen of Portugal and the King Consort—first cousin of his Royal Highness the Prince Field Marshal—should find it advisable to avail themselves of British hospitality. Arrangements are also made for the reception of their Majesties' four sons and two daughters, who may naturally be expected to accompany their Royal parents in this involuntary visit. It is added that the mysterious mission of Colonel Wylde had reference simply to the offer of this asylum to the Royal Family of Portugal.

DINNER PARTY AT LORD JOHN RUSSELL'S.—Lord and Lady John Russell entertained at dinner, on Monday evening, the Duchess of Inverness, the American Minister and Mrs. Bancroft, Lord and Lady Ashley, Sir Charles Adam, Mr. Fox Maule, the Hon. Harry Grey, Mr. Reeves, &c. Lady John Russell had a "reception" on Tuesday evening.

RETURN OF THE MARQUIS AND MARCHIONESS OF DOURO.—The Marquis and Marchioness of Douro landed at Dover on Tuesday, from Boulogne, and have since arrived in town.

FASHIONABLES AT MR. HUDSON'S.—The Lord Mayor of York, G. Hudson, Esq., M.P., is entertaining a distinguished party at Newby-park, including Lord George Bentinck, M.P., Major Beresford, M.P., Sir J. H. Lowther, M.P., Hon. Captain Duncombe, M.P., Andrew Lawson, Esq., M.P., Mrs. Lawson, Mr. A. Lawson, and Miss Lawson; R. C. Hildyard, Esq., Q.C., H. Broadwood, Esq., M.P., Mr. G. H. Bentinck, the Rev. Canon Sutton, &c. Mr Hudson and lady were on Wednesday (last week) among the visitors to the Duke of Cleveland, at Raby Castle.

PROPOSED ARISTOCRATIC MARRIAGE.—P. W. S. Miles, Esq., M.P. for Bristol, is about to lead to the hymeneal altar one of the daughters of Major General Sir W. F. B. Napier, Lieutenant Governor of Guernsey.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

OXFORD. Nov. 24.

The second meeting of the Ashmolean Society this term was held yesterday evening in the Museum, Professor Powell in the chair. The following candidates were balloted for and elected [illegible]:—

W. Spottiswoode, Esq., of Balliol College; R. A. Le Mesurier, Esq., Corpus College; W. J. Waters, Esq., Wadham College; A. Melville, M.D., Edinburgh.

THE NEW BISHOP OF SODOR AND MAN.—The appointment to this see having been declined by Dr. Graham, has been conferred on the Rev. Walter Augustus Shirley, Archdeacon of Derby.

THE WELSH BISHOPRICS.—The question of the Welsh Bishoprics, it is said, is satisfactorily arranged. The two Welsh sees are to be preserved, and the see of Manchester is, [illegible], to be erected immediately. It is in confirmation of this report that the see of St. Asaph has already been filled up by the translation of the late Bishop of Man, and that the see of Man is also just filled.

[illegible] follows: Commencing on Tuesday, December 8, on which day the Head Master's division will leave; on the 9th, the Fifth Form Oppidans, and, on the following day, the Lower Oppidans and the Collegers. The school will re-open on the 11th of January. The mathematical Examination will commence to-morrow, and terminate on Monday.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

When I said I would die a bachelor, I did not think I should have lived 'till I were married.
Much Ado about Nothing.

BENEDICT did not foresee the necessity by which [illegible], but, like a sensible man, when the occasion arrived, he was not to be frightened by any punctilio of mere observance. In like manner, when we said we had [illegible] of its coming events, in the form of our usual annual summary. We deal, [illegible], only with its materiel of prospective account: such is the two-year-old stock which it introduced to the racing world; a subject closely wedded to the interests of the coming season. During the past three-quarters of the year, no less than two hundred and fifty-five two-y[illegible]; of all sorts, good, bad, and indifferent [illegible]. Of these, nearly eighty are engaged in the [illegible] have been in the market, but the majority of them at such extreme prices as hardly to be regarded as negotiable securities. We don't mean to infer, by any means, that the state of the odds is a sound one, or that the animals backed are valued on their merits. But it would be little use just now to touch the characters of [illegible] support; and, therefore, for the nonce we confine our critical notes and comments to such as are actually in the possession of sanguine friends.

Foremost—almost the only chief of this forlorn hope, indeed—is VAN TROMP; a "great, fine horse," as the technicals call him. He is destined to lead, during the winter, the army of Derby betters—martyrs we had nearly written it. He has been out three times, and always as a winner: he has beaten the best of his year, and has done some undoubtedly good performances. So did Sting last year, and with far more promise of "training on" than this crack. We are prepared to see this winter "pot" boil over, like so many of its predecessors—under the management of "too many cooks." EPIROTE, the winner of the Ham Stakes at Goodwood (his only performance), is the second in estimation. They back him for the sake of his stable rather than himself. They are right upon principle; but only in reference to "round betting." Next we have GLENTILT, said to be an honest brute, but surely not a speedy; however, he is probably [illegible] at his present price: he ought, with good management, to see a better quotation. PLANET, at 20 to 1, is an animal that ought to be backed by any man "with cash and sense" and a taste for investment in the odds. His form has been very good, and the place he dates from is sure to give him prestige: never mind his situation in the Prendergast. The colt out of the Sister to Cobweb is, perhaps, a great unknown. BINGHAM was but a very moderate winner, whatever he may turn out......

The Turf propounds two pleasures for the choosing—the one is winning, and the other losing. THE LIBERATOR—Thus called in honour of Ould Ireland: a word to the wise. Colt out of Marpessa—not in any wise our fancy. LUNEDALE—ditto. PROJECTILE.—This colt was once brought out below his form; and then, having won, was rated above his worth. So we opine TANTIVY—a dark one, but with a high private character. Added to these, may be glanced at, the Miss Iris colt; King of Morven; Gabbler; the Cassandra colt; Crester, and a few others. It is a slender field; and, looking at the average of the two-year-old stock out, the bettors round are likely to find the Derby of 1847 a profitable venture.

TATTERSALL'S.

MONDAY.—Business still shows a good deal of animation, and, in this respect, differing essentially from the last three or four winters, promises to supply us with a regular Monday quotation throughout the recess. A great number of Derby nags were in favour this afternoon, and in the aggregate a large sum was invested, the sister to Cobweb colt, Lunedale, Glentilt, Old Port, Allertonian, and the Marpessa colt being most prominently fancied. We give the final averages:—

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

CABINET COUNCIL.—Last Saturday a Cabinet Council was held, at which all the Ministers in town attended. The Council sat three hours.

AGITATION FOR OPENING THE PORTS.—On Saturday afternoon Lord John Russell received, at his official residence in Downing-street, the members of four different deputations, appointed at recent metropolitan meetings, got up in favour of the opening of the ports for the free admission of foreign food, and at which memorials were agreed to be presented to his Lordship by the deputations in question. The meetings referred to were held in the Borough, at the London Tavern, the Crown and Anchor, the Riding School, and John-street Institution, in the parish of St. Pancras. Mr. Lee Stevens was entrusted with the Borough memorial; the Rev. Mr Stoddart with the one at the Crown and Anchor meeting; and Dr. Bird and Mr. Alexander Campbell were entrusted with the other three. In addition, there were present Mr Charles Cochrane, Mr Knighton, Mr. Ellis, and Mr. Savage. Mr. Cochrane having addressed his Lordship on the subject of an apprehended famine, Lord John Russell said that, should there be an emergency requiring extraordinary measures, he would be prepared to make suitable provisions to meet them; and when Parliament met he should be quite ready to justify the course he had taken.

STIPENDIARY MAGISTRATES OF THE METROPOLIS.—The magistrates of the thirteen police courts in the metropolis are paid £1000 a year each, and the chief magistrate £1,200. There are twenty-two at £1000 a year each, and [illegible] at £1,200, making £23,000 paid in salaries to magistrates.

PUBLIC BATHS AND WASH-HOUSES.—Three large establishments of public baths are about to be formed in St. Marylebone; one on a large scale at St. Mary's, Paddington. Ground has been already secured in Orange-street, Leicester-square, near the Artesian wells, for the baths in St. Martin's; while the works of [illegible] establishment in Goulstone-square, in the eastern metropolis, now completed, will shortly be thrown open.

PROPOSED DEMOLITION OF THE "MINT."—The parish authorities of St. George's, Southwark, have given notice of their intention to apply in the ensuing session of Parliament for an act to enable them to form a new street from Blackman-street, in the Borough, to the Southwark-bridge-road, passing from New Dover-street, on the south side of St. George's Church, through the heart of the Mint, and to enable the Commissioners to purchase the site and premises comprising the Mint, and to rebuild and improve the same.

INCREASE OF ATTORNEYS.—In addition to upwards of 150 persons, who gave notice of their intention to apply to be admitted to practise as attorneys during the present Term, it appears that no less than 157 persons have given the requisite notices of applying for admission in Hilary Term next, and 19 attorneys for re-admission. The general yearly average of the increase of attorneys for the last five years exceeds 600.

BEET ROOT BREAD.—A baker of Vienna has made a discovery, which, at the present moment, may prove of high importance—the use of beet-root in making bread. Two loaves, one consisting of one-half, the other of five-eighths beet-root, the remainder being of wheat flour, were sent for the inspection of the Minister of Agriculture [illegible]. The loaves were baked on the 30th October, and on the 20th November retained all the taste and appearance of good household bread. The bread is made in the usual manner, only with less water and a little more salt. The beet-root must be grated at the moment of making use of it.

WILL OF SIR BROOK TAYLOR, BART.—The Right Hon. Sir Brook Taylor, G.C.H., P.C., her Majesty's late Minister at Munich, formerly of Gloucester Lodge, Regent's Park, executed his will in February last, which has been proved in London by his nephews, William Deedes and William Brook Nothey, Esqrs. The personalty in this country was valued at £16,000. He has left pecuniary legacies to his nephews, nieces, and other of his relations, to the amount of nearly £10,000, as well as specific bequests to most of them, and to others of his friends and acquaintances, among whom is his brother-in-law, Lord Skelmersdale, and Sir Henry Watkins W. Wynn, to whom he has left one of his portfolios. To Sir George Hamilton Seymour, his star and collar of the Hanoverian Guelphic Order—the riband and badge to be returned to the King of Hanover, through the hands of his Minister in London. To his nephew, Herbert Taylor, all his family portraits and Henry the Eighth's chair. To the poor of the parishes of Patrixbourne and [illegible], £100. [illegible] to some old servants annuities. His books, pictures, plate, furniture, and other property, except his collection of drawings and engravings, are to be sold, and the proceeds equally to be divided amongst his nephews, Herbert, Brook, Bridges, and Wilbraham Taylor, beyond the other legacies they may have given to them in the will.

POSTSCRIPT.

THE INSOLVENCY OF LORD HUNTINGTOWER.

At the Court of Bankruptcy, on Thursday, Lord Huntingtower made his appearance in support of an application for a protecting order.

Mr. Lewis said he attended on behalf of the insolvent, to ask for the protecting order of the Court. His Honour would, perhaps, bear in mind that the petition was filed as long since as the month of May, 1844, and when the protection of the Court was asked it was said some considerable time must elapse before the order could be granted. Notice of the present application had been served upon the creditors, according to the provisions of the statute, and he (Mr. Lewis) did not know of any person being present to oppose the insolvent.

Mr. Commissioner Fonblanque: No creditors oppose

Mr. Lewis: None, your Honour. It is now two years and a half since the petition was first filed; and, when you last heard the case, you dismissed from your mind all opposition excepting that which proceeded from Mr. Cox. You at that time disposed of the other objections raised.

Mr. Commissioner Fonblanque: In a number of cases I know I thought the insolvent had as much reason to complain of his creditors as they had of him. [After a pause of a few minutes, during which time his Honour appeared to be running through the contents of the schedule, he said, in conclusion]—Take the [illegible]

Mr. Lewis thanked the Court, and Lord Huntingtower received the necessary protection.

Return of Lord Brougham. Lord Brougham has arrived in Grafton-street from Paris. Lady Brougham had previously reached town.

The Salt Monopoly in India.—A meeting of the merchants and manufacturers of Manchester was held on Thursday, in the Town-Hall, for the purpose of taking into consideration the oppressive tendency of the Salt Tax and monopoly in India. E. Armytage, Esq, the Mayor, presided; he having convened the meeting, on a requisition signed by upwards of one hundred firms and individuals. Resolutions condemning the present Salt Tax and monopoly in India were passed unanimously, and petitions to Parliament on the subject were agreed to.

The Fog.—The metropolis was yesterday morning visited in some parts with a dense fog. At the Blackfriars and London Bridge piers a notice was posted up in large letters, stating "that the steam vessels between London and Westminster Bridge would not run during the continuance of the fog."

Fire at Walworth.—Yesterday morning, between the hours of twelve and one, a fire, that did considerable damage, broke out in the premises belonging to Mr. G. Austin, tea-dealer and grocer, Black Prince-row, Walworth-road, near the Elephant and Castle. The cause of the fire could not be ascertained.

LATEST FOREIGN NEWS.

FRANCE.

The Journal des Débats of Wednesday positively contradicts the report that the Count de St. Aulaire would not return to London as Ambassador from the King of the French, and states that his Excellency will shortly resume his functions here as usual.

SPAIN.

Madrid papers of the 19th have been received. General Flores arrived at Santander on the 11th, and was to sail in the course of a few days with his expedition against the Ecuador Republic. The seizure of the Glenelg and the two other steamers in the Thames will probably, however, delay the departure of the expedition.

PORTUGAL.

Some additional letters have been delivered to-day, giving details connected with the defeat of the insurgent forces by Baron Casal, mentioned elsewhere. The engagement took place at Murca, near Chaves, a place surrounded for two leagues by an open country, and well suited for the movement of cavalry, an arm with which Casal was well supplied, while Bandeira, on the other hand, was utterly unprovided. Sa da Bandeira, who commanded the insurgent forces, appears to have been too precipitate in his advance, when the Royalist General retreated from Valongo, near Oporto. He probably outmarched his supplies; but, at all events, he found himself so situated that, on the 15th, he endeavoured to retire on Villareal. In this he failed, for his rear-guard being hard pressed by Casal, he was compelled to give battle, with the 15th Regiment on his right, the 3rd on his left, and the Municipal Guard and volunteers in the centre. In this order he waited the attack; and, had the regulars proved faithful, the issue might have been different. When the insurgent forces were ordered to fire, the 3rd and 15th [illegible] went over [illegible] joined in the pursuit. [illegible] directions; and one portion, on reach[illegible] defeated army. He, howev[illegible], which had not reached him when the encounter took place. [illegible] was said to be marching upon Oporto, and it was very doubtful whether the citizens would defend the town. There were no regular troops in garrison, and the Junta would find it difficult to maintain its authority.

RUSSIA.

The Imperial Family of Russia have just sustained another severe loss. This morning (Nov. 17), at two o'clock, the young Grand Duchess Mary, daughter of his Imperial Highness the Grand Duke Michael, expired, after suffering several months, from rapid decline. She was thirty-one years of age.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

DEATH FROM STARVATION.

On Wednesday afternoon Mr Mills resumed, at the Duke of Wellington, Crawford-street, Portman-square, an inquest, adjourned from the previous Friday, on the body of Louisa Mordaunt, aged thirty-five.

The Coroner prefaced the inquiry by stating that the deceased, her mother, and sister, who lived together, had been without food, without fire, without clothing. The inquest was adjourned to afford an opportunity to the parochial officers to explain how the family were left in that destitute condition, and in order that some little relief might be obtained for the survivors.

Mary Anne Mordaunt examined: Deceased was her sister, and expired suddenly during her absence on the 18th inst. Deceased, witness, and their mother, lived together at 93, Crawford-street. Witness went out to needlework on the morning of the 18th, leaving her sister in bed, and upon her return in the afternoon found her dead. They had neither a sufficiency of food, clothes, nor firing. Witness sometimes earned 3s.; at other times 2s. and 1s. a week. Her mother had 2s. 6d. a week from the parish; out of which they paid 2s. 3d. a week for rent.

By the Coroner: They were totally starved. Her sister, who had been for months unable to work, occasionally earned 6d. a week. They sometimes got a loaf of bread from the workhouse. On one occasion, Mr. Merson, the relieving officer, said to her, "Mind, I have done with you. No more relief will be granted you." That fretted her much. On another occasion, her deceased sister, after having been kept waiting at the workhouse from 9 A.M. to 5 P.M., was sent away unrelieved. She told the workhouse authorities that they were starving; but the authorities refused any further relief unless they went into the workhouse. Since Friday (last week) no one called upon them from the workhouse, nor did they re[illegible] from it.

Mrs. Emma Bryant confirmed the above evidence.

Mr. Robert Dawson Harding, surgeon, detailed the result of the post mortem examination, which proved that deceased died from starvation.

Mr Merson, who with several other parochial officers attended, explained his conduct towards the deceased and her family, by stating that he had acted in compliance with the regulations of the workhouse.

The Jury, who severely censured the conduct of the parochial authorities, retired to consider their verdict, and after half an hour's absence, returned and handed to the Coroner the following verdict

"That the death of deceased was caused by the want of the commonest neces[illegible] they regretted that the parochial authorities of the parish [illegible] not evinced sufficient diligence in scrutinising the wants of [illegible]"

The Foreman said that they equally regretted that the authorities had paid no attention to the wants of deceased's family since Friday (last week), although on that day their attention was particularly directed to their destitute condition by the Coroner and jury.

Alarming Accident on the East Lancashire Railway.—On Monday afternoon [illegible] accident occurred on this line of rail, to the train which left Rawtenstall at two o'clock P.M. It appears the train was coming at a rapid speed, on its way to Bury, and on reaching a bridge which crosses the Irwell, at Sp[illegible], Ramsbottom, the engine went off the rails. There were only five carriages attached to the engine, all of which were thrown off the line. Fortunately, however, the accident occurred in a deep cutting, or the result might have been disastrous in the extreme. Several of the passengers were severely injured. One man had one of his feet cut off near the arch of the foot, and the other dreadfully lacerated. He is, however, alive, but in a very weak state. A policeman, who was a passenger, was also seriously injured; one of his legs was taken off, and the other much bruised. A third passenger was also much bruised. Three of the carriages were broken to pieces, and the engine and tender much damaged. There happened at the time to be a pilot engine on the way to Bury, and the alarm was given in a very short time, when a special train was despatched to the scene of the accident, which took the whole of the passengers, and some of the wounded, to Bury.

[illegible] to Mr. Claude Lascelles.—A very serious accident occurred to Mr Claude Lascelles, eldest son of the Hon. W. S. and Lady Caroline Lascelles, on Monday last, while riding in the vicinity of Roehampton. Mr Lascelles, who is pursuing his studies at the Royal Military Academy at Woolwich, was on a visit to his aunt, Lady Dover, at her residence near Putney. About eleven o'clock in the morning he left Lady Dover's house on horseback, attended by a groom, with the intention of proceeding to his father's residence on Campden-hill, Kensington. The horse Mr. Lascelles rode was a very high spirited animal, and, before he had cleared Putney Park-lane, shied at a timber carriage. Mr. Lascelles, who is only fifteen years of age, was unable, it appears, to control him, and the animal dashed off at a frightful speed in the direction of the bridge crossing the Richmond Railway near this spot, on arriving near the centre of which he came in violent contact with the stone coping of one of the parapets. By the concussion Mr. Lascelles was thrown completely over the parapet of the bridge on to the line of railway. Besides several contused wounds, the left foot is very severely lacerated, the tendons and muscles of the instep being completely divided.

THE FATAL EXPLOSION AT OLDBURY.

An inquest on the bodies of two of the unfortunate sufferers by the late explosion in Mr Par[illegible]s pit, at Oldbury, was held on Monday last at Dud[illegible]. Several of the men who worked in the pit said they had compl[illegible] the imperfect ventilation, and of the collection of "sulphur," but that no no[illegible] had been taken of their complaints. One of these witnesses, named Edward [illegible] nineteen years of age, said he had been so frightened by the accumu[illegible] "sulphur," and by "comical dreams," that he did not return to the works, and so escaped. Mr. Etwell, a mine inspector, said the principal defect of the pit was, that the air heading was too narrow and had not been carried far enough, and he [illegible]nt might have been prevented had the air heading been cleaned [illegible]ently [illegible] air that these [illegible] complaints of a [illegible] then retired.

The Coroner shortly summed up, and the Jury consulted together for about a quarter of an hour, and then returned a verdict of "Manslaughter" against Mr. Haines, the ground bailiff

On Tuesday morning the adjourned inquest at Oldbury, upon the bodies of the four men—Windmile, the two Bodens, and Troth was resumed at the Talbot Inn, before Mr. Hinchliffe, Coroner of West Bromwich. The evidence varied little from that taken at Dudley.

The Coroner, in summing up the case, expressed a strong opinion that a charge of manslaughter could not be supported against the ground bailiff. The Jury returned a verdict of "Accidental death," but at the same time censured Mr. Haines, the ground bailiff, on account of the imperfect ventilation of the pit.

EXPLOSION NEAR PRESTON, AND LOSS OF SEVEN LIVES.

A dreadful explosion of fire-damp, accompanied with a very serious loss of life, happened at the coal mine of Mr. John Hargreaves, jun., at Easton Burgh, between Preston and Wigan, Lancashire, on Tuesday morning last. It appears that, about five o'clock on the above morning, about the time the miners were going to the mines, they, in the usual course, required from the fireman an assurance that the mine was in a fit state for the miners to enter—the "fireman" having first gone down into the pit. In a few minutes after the workmen entered the mine, an explosion took place, when eight of the workpeople lost their lives. Some people attach blame to the fireman, who, it is stated, has not a proper knowledge of the nature of the works; whilst he, on his part, states that the men entered the works before he certified that the pit was safe for the workmen to enter. No sooner, however, had the workmen entered the pit, than a fearful explosion took place, and, we regret to say, was accompanied by the following fatal results:—

There were from thirty to forty other miners in the pit at the time, in other directions, who were considerably alarmed by the shock of the explosion, and who were prevented for some time from coming into the neighbourhood of the mine where the sufferers were lying.

Deaths of Three Brothers by Drowning. On Monday evening, an inquest was held at Barnes, on the body of Mr. George Roxburgh Sharp, aged nineteen, who was drowned on Friday afternoon by the upsetting of a boat in that part of the river Thames called the Chiswick Cut. The deceased was a student at the College for Civil Engineers at Putney, and a very promising young man. He and a party of fellow-students had gone up the river for recreation, and in crossing the stream from the Surrey to the Middlesex side, the swell struck the bow and the boat was swamped; the deceased (who was steering) having sunk, it is believed, in consequence of having had on a heavy pea-jacket. Verdict, Accidental death. The accident excited a deep feeling in the neighbourhood. About two years ago, his brother, also a student in the same college, was similarly drowned near the same spot; and about five years ago, a third brother was drowned in the East Indies. A sister alone remains of a family of four. The deceased was just about to leave the college for Cambridge University.

Messrs. Palmer's Candle Manufactory Destroyed by Fire.—A fire broke out on Tuesday morning shortly before two o'clock, on the extensive premises occupied by Messrs. Palmer, the patent candle manufacturers, in Great Compton-street, Clerkenwell; where, it will be remembered, a fire occurred of great extent about three years ago. The premises, which were considerably enlarged after the former destruction, occupied the entire space of ground from St. John-street to Compton-court, and from Compton-street to Sutton-street. Upon an alarm being given, several parochial engines were quickly in attendance; but, from the inflammable nature of the contents of the building, the fire in a few moments burst through the roof, and the exertions of those persons who had hastened to the spot appeared to be completely in vain. The engines from the fire brigade stations at last arrived, and Mr. Inspector Penny, with a strong body of the G division of police, also promptly attended. An excellent supply of water was soon obtained, and the whole of the engines were set in operation, but, instead of damping the flames, the water, as it fell upon the burning tallow and composition, appeared to increase their fury. It appearing evident that no means could save the premises, the attention of the firemen was then directed to the preservation of the adjoining buildings, which they succeeded in saving, although some of them were partially damaged. An exaggerated account was given by some of the daily papers, of the amount of the loss, but, on the authority of Messrs. Palmer, we can state that it does not exceed £2000, which is principally insured, and no suspension of business has taken place

The Swindling at Andover by a Young Frenchwoman.—It will be recollected that the young female committed for trial on a charge of swindling, at Andover, a few days since, described herself as Mademoiselle Malvina Florentine de Saumarez, adding that she was a member of the noble family of that name. We are authorised to state that the person alluded to is in no way whatever connected with Lord de Saumarez's family.

Another Colliery Explosion.—On Monday morning, a dreadful explosion of fire-damp took place at Harvey's Coppell Colliery, near Standish, Lancashire, by which several lives have been lost. It seems that the man whose business it was to renew the fires below omitted to do so at three o'clock in the morning, and, in consequence of their going out, fire-damp accumulated. When he went down at six o'clock, for the purpose of relighting them, an explosion took place. Three men were killed, several were seriously hurt, and it is apprehended that six others in a different part of the mine have also been killed.

Strange Accident at the South Eastern Railway.—On Wednesday night, about ten o'clock, an accident of a remarkable character, but which was fortunately unattended with loss of life, took place upon the South-Eastern Railway. It appears that at the time before stated, the servants of the company were suddenly alarmed at seeing an engine and tender proceeding up the line at a most furious speed; there being no whistle sounded, as is invariably the case upon a train approaching, the parties at the terminus became apprehensive that something had happened to the driver or stoker of what they believed to be the train from Brighton or Dover. The officers at London-bridge immediately showed the signal of danger, but there being no one on the engine to shut off the steam, the engine continued to dash along the line at a most furious rate until it arrived at the end of the metal tramway, when it struck the breaks at the station with the most fearful violence, which completely smashed the springs, the engine, and tender, causing a noise like the explosion of a piece of ordnance. The several persons who stood on the platform had a narrow escape of losing their lives, for the burning coke and hot water were scattered on either side of the line. As soon as the dust and smoke had in some measure cleared away, the engine and tender were to be seen doubled up and reduced to a misshapen mass, the head of the tender being lifted up, and forced into the stone work or windows of the station. Several persons were instantly employed to remove the mass from the line. The engine and tender, it appears, started from New-cross; but whether any one out of mischief turned the steam on could not be ascertained. [On Thursday, at the Greenwich Police-office William Dart, a fireman in the service of the London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Company, was charged with neglecting his duty, and thereby endangering the lives of the public, and causing great injury to the property of his employers. It having been fully proved that the above accident arose from the negligence of the prisoner in being absent from the engine, Mr. Traill said that, in consequence of the previous good character which he had heard given of him, he should only commit him for one month to the House of Correction.—The damage is estimated at £300.]

[The following appeared only in our Late Edition of last week]:—

ARRIVAL OF THE OVERLAND MAIL.—RE-COMMENCEMENT OF HOSTILITIES IN INDIA.

In the course of this afternoon an express arrived with the Overland Mail from Bombay, of the 15th October. It brings intelligence which cannot but be regarded as important. Hostilities have re-commenced in the north of India. A formidable rebellion in Cashmeer, headed by the late Governor, who refuses to resign his authority into the hands of the new Sovereign, has compelled Gholab Singh to go out with all his troops to endeavour to subdue them; while a contingent of 10,000 men has been furnished by the Lahore Durbar, for the purpose of co-operation. Such, however, is the plight of the domestic affairs of our allies, that before the army of the mountain Maharajah could march, 6000 British soldiers were requested to garrison his capital—before the Sikh soldiers could quit Lahore, the force of Sir John Littler must be detained. Brigadier Wheeler accordingly marches into the Jumboo territory, with a strong force of about 6000 men; and there remains till matters are quiet, or aid as circumstances may require. A considerable detachment, chiefly of artillery, is held in hand to leave Lahore at a moment's notice for the Beas; while fresh troops move from Ferozepore across the Sutlej, others moving up from the southward into the Jullundur Doosb. Mooltan matters look less satisfactory than could be wished; and, altogether, the aspect of the political atmosphere throughout the Sikh dominions is unpleasing. One of those wild and murderous outbursts, for which these regions seem remarkable, has occurred at Katmandoo. A favourite of the Queen, a man of high rank, but low extraction, had been murdered. In revenge, the Queen seems to have created an uproar among the people, during which above 100 of the chiefs, consisting of most of the great Officers of State, were cut off. By latest accounts, which reached to the 22nd September, matters were becoming more tranquil again.

IRELAND.

Mr. Morgan O'Connell. The report that Mr. Morgan O'Connell had been [illegible] a Poor-Law Commissioner has been contradicted. There is no vacancy [illegible] thinly attended [illegible] of the disunions and dissensions that existed in the Association. He said th[illegible] one could be more sincerely anxious to preserve unanimity in that body th[illegible] was, and nothing but principle and legal difficulties could make him hesitat[illegible] moment in sacrificing his own opinions to those of others. But he could not do so, and they would perceive from the report how impossible it was to allow any man to associate with them who did not disavow the principle of physical force. The question was, whether moral force or physical force should be in the ascendant. By moral force they had already succeeded, and great success had been [illegible]d by it in various struggles for the advancement of human liberty. (Hear, hear.) Though physical force had sometimes succeeded, its results had been invariably followed by the most ruinous and disastrous consequences. No man could look at the countries where it had been triumphant without seeing the fatal results it had occasioned. It had succeeded in France, and was followed by a military despotism; it had been successful in Portugal, and the destruction of the civil institutions of that country, and of the peace and happiness of private families, ensued. (Hear.) Physical force, therefore, in his opinion, never succeeded well; but what moral force attained, it invariably kept; and if it did not progress it certainly remained stationary. Moral force never injured; it was like incoming tides—it deepened the channels of commerce and increased the means of prosperity. Physical force was like the volcano; it was successful by reason of its destructiveness. Moral force was full of blessings; it had the approbation of good men and the benediction of the living God. He (Mr. O'Connell) was therefore in favour of moral force; and, even if he were in favour of the principle of physical force, he should still be of opinion that they could not permit its introduction into that Hall, for it would place the Association at the mercy of any Attorney-General who might wish to prosecute them, and it would necessarily involve them in the guilt of high treason. They should therefore make the distinction clear and marked between the moral force and physical force doctrine. They were all aware that the report he was about to submit to the meeting was occasioned by certain resolutions published in Cork, which called on the Association to change the terms and expressions of the resolutions of the 13th of July last, but not pointing out anything that required change or alteration. After a few further observations, the honourable gentleman proceeded to read the report, which set forth the various points at issue between the Old and Young Ireland parties. The report was unanimously adopted. The amount of the rent was announced to be £54 18s 9d.

More Outrages.—Letters from Galway give very bad accounts of the state of that county. Agrarian outrage is frightfully on the increase, and the wholesale robberies and slaughter of sheep and cattle are carried on with a vigour which bids fair to rival the lawless misdeeds of the peasantry at the opposite side of the Shannon. The following is a sample of the more serious class of crime:—"On Saturday evening last, the 21st instant, at the hour of seven o'clock, a party of men, about fourteen in number, some of whom were armed, attacked the house of Mr. William Hacket, at Lisbeg, near Clonfert, on the road from Banagher to Laurencetown. They demanded admission, and called on Mr. Hacket to give up his fire-arms, both of which were refused. A shot was then fired in through the door: the bullet hit the servant-man, fractured his skull, and his life is now despaired of. They then smashed all the windows, and effected an entrance. Mr. Hacket got up by a ladder into a loft, and, it is said, fired at the party. They then took up the wounded servant; and lifting him up before them on the ladder, so as to keep him between them and Mr. Hacket, they succeeded in seizing Mr. Hacket, beat him unmercifully, wounded him in several parts with a sword, and cut off a part of his nose with one of the blows from the sword: he lies in a dangerous state. They carried off all the fire-arms."

Attack upon the Great Southern and Western Railway.—The Cork Examiner contains an account of an attack made on Monday morning on the works of this line in progress at Rathpeacon, about a mile and a half beyond Blackpool. A number of labourers, in all amounting to nearly 1,000, assembled on that morning, and immediately proceeded to Rathpeacon, where the works of this line commence. They attacked the men employed there to the number of 60 or 70, and compelled them to desist from work; they then destroyed the wheelbarrows, pickaxes, and other implements required in this description of work. It is said that the overseers were also maltreated. A military force was about to be dispatched to the scene of outrage, in order to prevent further aggression.

Violent Storm.—On Friday (last week) Dublin was visited with a very violent thunder storm. The effect was, as usual, to impound a quantity of water in Dublin Bay, and this occurring on the top of the spring tides, had a fearful effect upon the stability of the Dublin and Kingstown Railway. The sea which rolled in was in the morning terrific—waves breasting the wall, and the wind sending the surf some forty or fifty feet high, shutting out all view of the opposite coast. At Merrion the water rushed in unbroken across the road, and on that part of the railway between Merrion and Williamstown there were at least from two to three feet of water on the line. The Drogheda and Howth Railways have sustained damage, but not of a very serious amount. The low grounds about Sandymount were all flooded, and the inhabitants were greatly alarmed. There are, however, no authentic accounts of any loss of life. At Newry, the low ground was inundated with a flood tide higher than any experienced for at least nine years. The storm was very severely felt in the south and west, and the Irish provincial papers are filled with tales of disaster arising from the event. The Kerry Examiner states, that the wrecks of upwards of one hundred vessels are floating about the western coast of Ireland.

Deaths from Starvation.—(From the Cork Examiner, Nov. 20.) We are again—and it is a revolting duty—compelled in justice to charge the Board of Works with the deaths of two more victims; and we do so on the unquestionable authority of the Rev Mr. Mulcahy, parish priest of Castlehaven, Myross. These men died of starvation, although at work under the Board, and on the public road. Their pay was kept from them for a fortnight and three weeks; and, although these wretched victims were partly relieved by the charity of wretches as poor and forlorn as themselves, they could not hold out against the destroyer, and fell victims to hunger and the Board of Works.

Death of Rear Admiral Thomas White.—This gallant naval officer died at the age of 77 years, on Wednesday, (last week), at Buckfast Abbey, near Ashburton, after an illness of some months. The deceased had only recently attained the rank of Rear Admiral, by the acceptance of the retirement in the navy, which took place a few weeks back.

Sudden Death.—Mr. Alderman Banister, Purveyor to her Majesty at Windsor, an old and highly respected inhabitant of that town, who had served the office of Mayor three times, was found, on Thursday morning, dead in his bed, upon one of his daughters entering his room, between seven and eight o'clock. The deceased, who had been ill for some time previously, appeared in better health than he had been for some days, and in excellent spirits, on his retiring to rest the evening before. He was in his 68th year

The New Official Assignee.—It is generally understood in commercial circles that Mr. Harris Cannan is to be appointed to the office of official assignee, vacant by the lamented death of Mr. Alsager.

The Post Office.—It is reported that Colonel Maberley is about to retire, on his full salary, from the office of Secretary to the Postmaster-General; and that he will be succeeded by Mr. Rowland Hill.

The "Great Britain" Steamer.—The following extract of a letter from Mr. Gabriel, R.N., dated "Dundrum, Sunday," appears in the Newry Telegraph:

"According to promise, I let you know how things are progressing with the Great Britain. Thursday's work has finished her. Mr. Bremner has failed in his breakwater, which was entirely washed away; the sea made a clean breach over her, swept away several skylights on deck; the ship filled with water to such an extent that the cabin doors and bulkheads are nearly all washed into the holds and about the decks; the promenade deck was covered with water; in fact, you might almost say she filled, for every one on board had to fly to the upper deck, and there wait till the water ran out of her, she was afloat, and thumping both forward and aft, and her head is shifted more towards Tyrella watch-house again. Mr. Bremner has given her up, and they at length are going to take the masts out of her, together with her engine. If all I hear is correct, I'm afraid she is gone. She was pitching at times as much as three feet."

Collision on the Manchester and Birmingham Railway.—On Tuesday morning, the train which leaves Manchester for Birmingham at twenty minutes before ten o'clock, was detained upwards of three hours, in consequence of coming in collision with a train of coal waggons, which was proceeding on the same line of rails in the direction of Manchester. While the coal waggon train w[illegible] to another line of rails it was encountered by the Manchester train, and [illegible] collision the engines of both trains were completely shattered. The stoker[illegible] enginemen leaped off the engines, and escaped uninjured, with the exception of the engineman of the Manchester train, who in falling fractured his leg at the ancle. A second class carriage was crushed to pieces. One of the passengers had three or four of his front teeth knocked out, with a splinter of the jawbone adhering; another received a cut across the forehead. The rest escaped with slight injuries

[illegible]s in 1847.—In the year 1847 there will happen four eclipses of the two [illegible] two of the sun and two of the moon; one only of each will be visible in these parts. They will occur in the following order, viz.: 1. A partial eclipse of the moon, March 31st, beginning 8h. 3m., and ending 10h. 9m. night 2. A total eclipse of the sun, April 15th, invisible at Greenwich. 3. A partial eclipse of the moon, Sept. 24th, invisible at Greenwich. 4. An annular eclipse of the sun, Oct. 9th, which will be visible, beginning at 6h. 6m. and ending 11h. 53m. morning

SKETCHES ON A MARCH IN NORTH-WESTERN INDIA.

By the last Overland Mail, we learn that the British troops in the north-western provinces of India are in movement, in consequence of the difficulties in which the new Maharajah, Gholab Singh, is placed. Our Illustrations show some of the leading characteristics of such a movement; from the spirited sketches of Lieut. G. F. Atkinson, of the Bengal Engineers.

The first represents the Mail Carts in the North-west; or the Post-Office arrangements for the rapid transit of the Honourable Company's mails, along the grand trunk road, as far as Meerut. Each horse performs a six-mile stage; and, what with the generous application of the chabook, (whip,) and the continued blasts of the horn, the animals get over the ground at ten miles an hour, including change

The second Engraving shows the move to a new encamping ground, or "Changing Ground," as it is called. On the elephant are placed the heaviest portion of the baggage; a camel usually carries a pair of large trunks, one containing the canteen and provisions, and the other clothes. Above is placed the charpoy, or bed, on which are stowed the smaller articles.

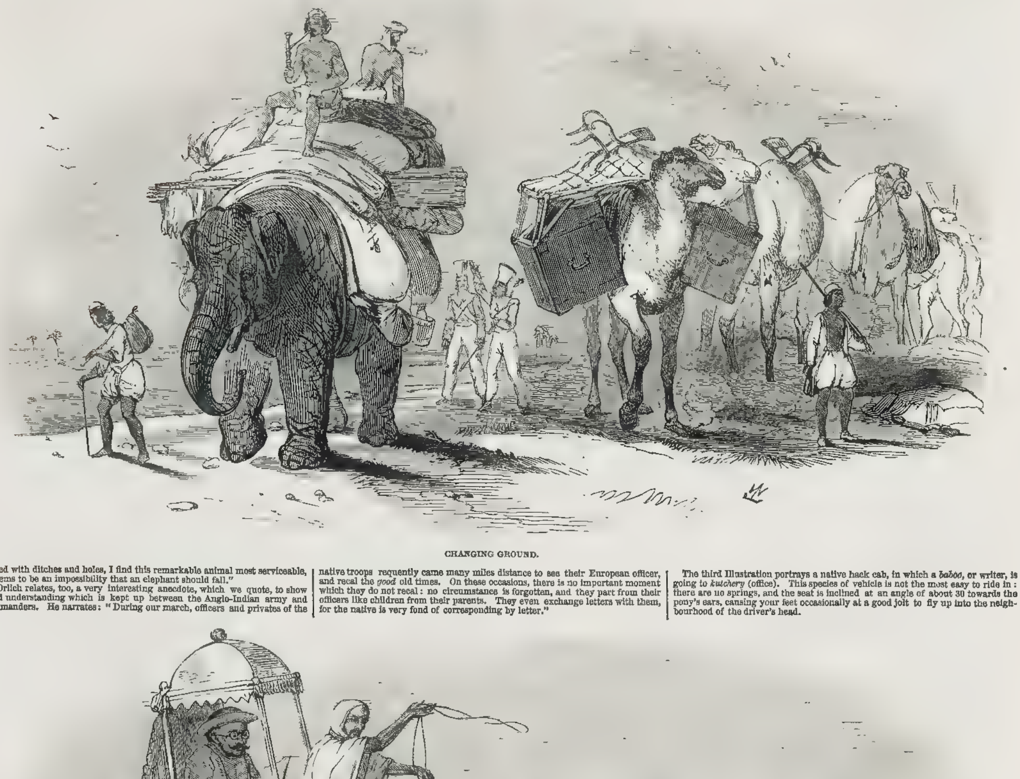
The Elephant generally supplies the place of carriages in India. The Mahont, who guides the animal with an iron prong, is seated as shown in the illustration; while the driver, with a club in his hand, runs by his side, inciting the elephant by words and blows. Von Orlich tells us, in his entertaining travels, that "the motion of some elephants is most agreeable, and that of others very fatiguing, for it depends entirely upon his gait. When he is driven, his step is so long and quick, that a horseman must trot to keep pace with him; but he soon relaxes in his exertion, and I should think could, probably, not travel more than twenty-four miles in the course of a day. When much heated and covered with dust, he sprinkles himself from time with water, which he seemingly carries in his trunk for this purpose.

"An ordinary elephant costs one thousand rupees, and his keep is about forty rupees a month; however, the quantity of food which he consumes depends upon his size; he receives twice as many seers of flour (a seer is two pounds) as he measures feet in height besides leaves, corn, and hay. Here, where the ground is covered with ditches and holes, I find this remarkable animal most serviceable, for it seems to be an impossibility that an elephant should fall."



CHANGING GROUND.

Von Orlich relates, too, a very interesting anecdote, which we quote, to show the good understanding which is kept up between the Anglo-Indian army and the commanders. He narrates: "During our march, officers and privates of the native troops requently came many miles distance to see their European officer, and recal the good old times. On these occasions, there is no important moment which they do not recal: no circumstance is forgotten, and they part from their officers like children from their parents. They even exchange letters with them, for the native is very fond of corresponding by letter."

The third Illustration portrays a native hack cab, in which a baboo, or writer, is going to kutchery (office). This species of vehicle is not the most easy to ride in: there are no springs, and the seat is inclined at an angle of about 30 towards the pony's ears, causing your feet occasionally at a good jolt to fly up into the neighbourhood of the driver's head.

AGRICULTURAL PICTURES.—THRASHING.—DRAWN BY DUNCAN.

THRASHING.

With this scene we close the year's Illustrations of the Farmer's Life; and append to it the following neat account of the labour from the Rev. Mr. Rham's valuable "Dictionary of the Farm .

"The separation of the grain from the ear in corn has always been one of the most laborious operations on a farm. Where the quantity grown is merely sufficient to supply food for the cultivators of the soil, the simplest methods answer the purpose sufficiently. The corn taken by handfuls may be beaten on a piece of wood or a table, and by repeatedly turning the straw the whole of the grain may be readily beaten out. This mode of thrashing is still adopted in order to obtain the finest and ripest grains for seed; but then the straw is afterwards thrashed over again with the flail, which is the instrument most generally adopted for thrashing corn. It is needless to describe this instrument, which is so generally known. It requires some practice to use it effectually and to avoid accidents to the thrasher himself or the bystanders. The flail being swung round the head, the beating part of it is made to fall horizontally on the straw which is spread on the thrashing-floor; and, by inserting this part occasionally under the straw, it is turned over and a fresh portion is brought up to be beaten. This is done without losing the stroke or time when several men are thrashing together. If it were not that thrashing is mostly done in winter, when no out-door work could well be done, few labourers would submit to its toil; and it is very difficult to ensure the entire separation of the grain without great vigilance and attention on the part of the master or overseer. If the labour is paid by the day, much time is usually lost; and if it be by the quantity of grain thrashed or by the number of sheaves, there is a great temptation for the men to hurry over the work, as more grain is thrashed out at first when the ears are full than afterwards.

"Where the corn is thrashed out immediately after harvest, to be put into a granary, as is the case in those countries where extensive tracts of rich land are sown with corn two or three times without much tillage or manuring, and then left to be recruited by several years' rest and pasture, the most common practice is to level a portion of a field, and laying the corn in the straw in a large circle, to drive oxen and horses over it till it is all trodden out. This is the method alluded to in Scripture, and can only take place where the climate is serene and dry. Till ingenuity had produced machines to supersede the flail, this was the only instrument in use. The first idea of a machine for thrashing was that of imitating the motion of the flail, but so much depends on the eye of the thrasher, that no mechanism could well imitate the motion of his arms. This was consequently given up, and an imitation of the rubbing of the grains from the ears between the hands, combined with the beaters of a flax-dressing machine, gradually produced the present improved thrashing-machine."

The picture is at once a highly artistic and truthful scene drawn from life. The peep at the farm buildings, and the cattle, pigs, and poultry in the yard, and the denuded trees,

> Bare ruined choirs, where late the sweet birds sang, as seen through the open doorway of the barn, is highly picturesque. The various accessories in the barn, not forgetting the terrier and his rat, and the group of children on the left, are excellent. Altogether, this is one of the most pleasing pictures in Mr. Duncan's Agricultural Gallery.

THE RECENT GALE.

During the tremendous gale which prevailed on the Western Coast last week, and more especially on Thursday and Friday, considerable damage was done to the shipping both in and out of Plymouth harbour. Among numerous other casualties, were the following:—

On Tuesday night, the Providence, of Falmouth, Allen master, lying at the mouth of Catwater with one anchor and a kedge dragged her moorings, and not having any of her crew on board, fell across the bow of the brig Heros, 200 tons burthen, Boussin master, belonging to Port-au-Prince, in ballast, from London, bound to St. Domingo. The brig had two bowers and a kedge, and no doubt would have rode out the storm in safety, had not the schooner got afoul of her; but with the additional weight of the schooner they both drove ashore under Queen Anne's Battery. We also learn that they were obliged to have quarry men to blast the rocks under the stern of the Heros, to allow her to set more level.

Mr. Condy, of Plymouth, has made a spirited Sketch of the above encounter of which we have annexed an Engraving.

Among other disasters, the ship Emma, of Plymouth, had five men washed overboard and drowned: she came into port on the 24th inst

On Friday morning, the sloop Ellen, Captain Beach, bound from Perras, coast of France, went ashore in Digbury Bay, a little to the west of Mothecombe. The ill-fated vessel was quickly dashed to pieces, and all her crew perished.

At Teignmouth, the gale blew with terrific violence, and the sea on the bar was tremendous. A fishing boat, supposed to be from Topsham, was swamped in attempting to cross the bar, and the two men in her were drowned.

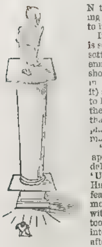
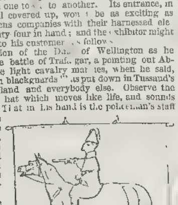
THE GREAT TOPIC.



IN the present uncertain state of the public mind respecting the final destination of the Statue, any suggestions as to its future position become more or less valuable.

It is quite true that it [illegible] down, and 'tis pity it is so; but if its coming down is to cost as much as its setting up, it behoves us to find some means of lessening the expense. Our first plan is to turn it into a show (and people would pay eagerly to see it, especially in the country where they have heard so much about it); and there could always be found benevolent brewers to horse it from one town to another. Its entrance, in the day-time, all covered up, would be as exciting as that of the circus companies with their harnessed elephants and twenty-four in hand; and the exhibitor might make a speech to his customers as follows:—

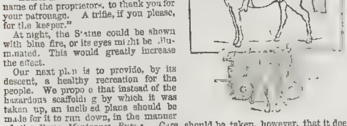


"Representation of the Duke of Wellington as he appeared at the battle of Trafalgar, a pointing out Abdel Kader to the light cavalry marines, when he said, 'Up and at them blackguards'" as put down in Tussaud's History of England and everybody else. Observe the feathers on his hat which moves like life, and sounds more natural. That in his hand is the policeman's staff with which he took Boneyparte into custody, after he'd run away from his bail, and took to bad companions; you are at liberty to touch the statue; there is no deception; it is of solid gold, and cost upwards of a hundred pounds.

"Ladies and Gents.—Allow me, in the name of the proprietors, to thank you for your patronage. A trifle, if you please, for the keeper."

At night, the Statue could be shown with blue fire, or its eyes might be illuminated. This would greatly increase the effect.

Our next plan is to provide, by its descent, a healthy recreation for the people. We propose that instead of the hazardous scaffolding by which it was taken up, an inclined plane should be made for it to run down, in the manner of the Paris Montagnes Russes. Care should be taken, however, that it does not come down upon soft ground, or it will inevitably be wrecked ashore, as immovably as the Great Britain. After it is down, the plane can be fitted up with cars, and a handsome revenue be derived from the pastime of sliding down, which might be continued for any time, as the removal of the scaffolding does not seem to be a point of the slightest consequence.



For other plans we add:

It might be engaged at Astley's, for a new version of the "Demon Horse."

It might be carried over, by huge balloons, to Belgium, for the Waterloo mound—the Belgian lion coming over here to take the place of the British one, now very infirm.

It might be fitted up as a model military asylum, with sentry-boxes in the cars.

It might be set up on Folkestone heights, to checkmate the Boulogne Column.

All we hope is that it will have some place found for it, and not go ingloriously back to where it came from, with its tail between its legs, amidst the jeers of the boys and the chorus from the old nursery game of "Here comes the Duke a-riding."

THE CHEAP FARE MANIA.

The opposition is now so great amongst the steamers and omnibuses, that there is no telling where it will end. A reduction of from fourpence to a penny in the former, and from sixpence to twopence in the latter conveyances, is already achieved. The next placards we see will be as follows:—

"Halloo! Here we are! A splendid ride and a sandwich for a penny!"

"Down again! A handsome portrait presented to every gratuitous passenger going above two miles!"

"No charge for admission to the Aldermen Steam-boats. Every passenger entitled to a refreshment ticket and a comic song book."

"Gentlemen taken from Vauxhall to Tunnel Pier, and their hair cut and curled in the first style, for twopence, on the journey. Be in time!"

THE ROMANCE OF THE POST-OFFICE DIRECTORY FOR 1846.

AIR—"The Old English Gentleman."

We hear of days long passed away, and glorious times of old,
And how Young England's sons affirm we're getting dull and cold;
But yet romance is not quite dead [illegible] common daily life
She still exists; of which great fact you'll find examples rife
In the Post-Office Directory all of the present year.

(Chorus dependent upon the convivial or musical propensities of the listeners.)

Of Knights, [illegible] pass'd, we note a goodly band,
From selling Penny Magazines, to oysters in the Strand;
And 'Squires, [illegible], a stalwart crew, in every trade are seen,
From fishmongers in [illegible]-street to Chemists to the Queen,
In the Post-Office Directory, &c.

And P[illegible] print and lithograph; and [illegible] deeming it no sin,
[illegible] trade in cheese, and keep a Cross Keys Inn;
Nuns, too, in New Kent-road, import tobacco [illegible],
And there are cells of Abbots in the New Inn, Wych-street, Strand.
And in the Post Office Directory, &c.

The mighty minds of every age you'll meet therein combined,
John Milton, as a tea-dealer, in Mary'bone you'll find;
And Isaac Newton, in the east, has stores of pens and quills;
And Hogarth trades in ham and beef, and Butler deals in pills,
In the Post-Office Directory, &c.

And Samuel Johnson makes brass rules, and Fielding vends the [illegible];
And Pope sells coals; and Dryden, law; and Spenser, boots and shoes;
And Beaumont's a solicitor; and Fletcher pulls out teeth;
And Godwin will supply you with an artificial wreath,
From the Post-Office Directory, &c.

Of those who flourish'd long ago the course is not yet run.
M[illegible] is and dresses leather; Bacchus keeps the Rising Sun;
Mark Anthony's a silk-weaver, and lives in Spitalfields,
And Tully's skill to Drury Lane a well-trained chorus yields,
Though not in the Directory, &c.

The virtues altogether form a tolerable train;
[illegible]'s Prudence has a loan [illegible] and we hope she may re[illegible];
There's Faith at Lloyd's [illegible] the Temple; but it ill may sound
That Charity just now is not in London to be found,
Nor in the last Directory, &c.

But noted thieves of olden times are here the same as then,
[illegible], that they are "all honourable men;"
Dick Turpin dressing cases makes; Jack Sheppard sells wax candles,
And Duval trades in gold; but always 'tis his own he handles,
In the Post-Office Directory, &c.

In fact, there's naught or nobody the keen compilers spare,
And all who have immortalised are, bona fide, there
[illegible] last copy, and you'll find them all forthwith,
Unl[illegible] to [illegible] tribes of Smith,
In the Post-Office Directory, all of the present year.

MUSIC.

"Loretta," at Drury Lane Theatre, Loder's "Night Dancers," at the Princess's, and the Promenade Concerts at Covent Garden Theatre, the Lyceum, and Laurent's Casino, have been the musical attractions of the week. On Tuesday, the Turner Family had a concert at Sussex Hall, in the City; and on Wednesday, Mr. H. Russell gave a vocal entertainment at the Marylebone Institution. Jullien closes his campaign to-night (Saturday); and his Ball on Monday evening will terminate his occupation of Covent Garden Theatre, which is now in the hands of the capitalists who have undertaken to mount an Italian Opera on the grandest scale, for three years certain. Next week we shall supply ample details of this vast undertaking. Mr. Allcroft has had no reason to complain of a want of patronage at the Lyceum; and as he will have a fortnight clear of the Jullien opposition, there is every reason to suppose that he will be remunerated for his spirited undertaking. On Monday next the Third Concert of the Society of British Musicians will take place. On Wednesday, the Sacred Harmonic Society at Exeter Hall will perform Handel's oratorio of "Solomon," Miss Birch, the Misses Williams, Mr. Lockey, and Mr. H. Phillips being the principal singers. On Thursday, Mr. and Mrs. Severn will give a Concert, for the purpose of having the Serenata, "The Spirit of the Shell," composed by him, adequately executed. We may notice amongst the musical events of the day, the renewal of the Greenwich [illegible] Subscription Concerts for the season, the first of which took place on Thursday, conducted by Sterndale Bennett, with Mr. Willy as leader, and Mr. H. Smart as pianoforte accompanyist. Handel's "Acis and Galatea," with an effective chorus, selected by Mr. Green, was performed, with Miss Rainforth, Miss Turner, Messrs. Allen, Phillips, and Master Banister as vocalists.

Madame Anna Bishop's engagement at Drury Lane Theatre terminates on the 23rd of December, when she will make a tour in the provinces. Balfe's opera is in active rehearsal, and will be produced on the 7th of December, if possible.

There has been a report that Miss Hawes, the celebrated contralto, had retired from the profession, being about to be married to a gentleman of fortune. The intended marriage is true; but Miss Hawes will not retire for some time to come, and, we hope, will gave a Farewell Concert in London, before one of the greatest singers in the sacred school withdraws from public life. She sang at Mr. Marshall's Concert, at Oxford, on Thursday week; at which, a clever MS. overture by Mr. Reinagle, who has lately married Miss Orger, the pianiste, was played. Miss Dolby and Mr. John Parry gave their Annual Concert, at Croydon, with great success, aided by Miss Rainforth (who was encored in Tully's charming "Song of the Seasons"), Mr. Lockey, and Mr. Kench. Mr. Richardson played a flute solo, and Mr. C. Severn presided at the pianoforte.

We learn from Dublin that the Ethiopian Serenaders have given their entertainment with immense success. Mr. Mitchell has re-engaged them for the St. James's Theatre, for the Season 1847.

We perceive by the American papers that Henri Herz, the pianist, has been favourably received at his first Concert in New York, and that Sivori is popular at Boston. Mr. Lover, whose wife expired in London last week, leaving two daughters, is carrying everything before him in the United States. He is fêted everywhere. Leopold de Meyer, the pianist, preserved his notoriety; and Edward Seguin, the basso; Mrs. E. Seguin, the prima donna; and Fraser, the tenor, were starring in operas.

Our correspondence from Paris records the triumphs of Madame Persiani, Mario, and Coletti, in Pacini's opera of "La Fidanzata Corsa" (the Corsican Betrothed): the acting and singing of Madame Persiani created a great sensation. On the 23rd, Grisi sung in "Norma" before the Royal Family at St. Cloud. Verdi's "Due Foscari" is in rehearsal for her, Mario, and Coletti. Lablache was expected to return to Paris from his villa near Naples in December, but some doubts have been expressed whether he will sing again at the Théâtre Italien. M. Clapisson's new opera of "Gibby le Cornemuse" (the Bagpiper) has been quite successful at the Salle Favart: Roger, in the [illegible] shepherd, greatly distinguishing himself; Bussine, a new basso, appeared as James the First of England, and made a favourable impression; Mdlle. Delille was the prima donna; and Henri and Grignon had good parts: the music is clever, but not remarkably original, and is noisily instrumented. At the Académie Royale, Rossini's pasticcio, "Robert Bruce," was anxiously looked for, but it was not expected to be ready before the middle of December: the new ballet of "La Taitienne" was in rehearsal. Mr. Lumley had arrived in Paris from Italy. Flaming accounts of Madame Eugenia Garcia's success at Rovigo, where, it is alleged, she was called for fifty-eight times at her benefit; but the statements of the French and Italian papers, on matters relating to art and artists, cannot be too suspiciously regarded. We have accounts from Vienna describing the grand execution of Mendelssohn's "Paul" by upwards of 1000 executants, artists as well as amateurs. Meyerbeer's "Camp of Silesia" will be performed in Vienna and Berlin at the same time; Jenny Lind being the prima donna at the former, and Pauline Garcia Viardot (sister of Malibran) at the latter: Viardot, by her genius, has made a complete furore in Berlin in all Jenny Lind's best parts: Viardot can sing in Italian, German, English, French, and Spanish, with equal facility: Jenny Lind, as yet, has only sung in Swedish (her own language) and in German. The erratic genius, Liszt, has gone to Constantinople. The amiable and gifted Ernst is now in Russia. At Leipsic, on the 11th inst., there was a musical festival in honour of Schiller's birthday.

At the half-yearly general meeting of the Society of British Musicians, Messrs. Wallace, W. C. Macfarren, Rea, and Mitchell were elected members; and Edward Loder, Dr. Elvey, G. Cooper, Hatton, Lindsay Sloper, the Misses Williams, &c., associates. The present Committee consists of Messrs. Macfarren, C. Horsley, Clinton, Davison, Gattie, Stephens, C. Severn, Lockey, and Thirlwall.

MUSICAL REVIEW.

THE MUSICAL BIJOU FOR 1847. D'Almaine and Co.

This beautiful Album of Music and Poetry, edited by F. H. Burney, is remarkable, not only for its attractive embellishments, but also for the variety and excellence of the musical contributions. There are fifty Songs, and seventeen Instrumental Pieces, the latter consisting of [illegible], valses, quadrilles, galops, &c., by Linter, C. W. Glover, Ling, K[illegible], Esain, Prinz, W. H. Holmes, H. Herz, Boalman, Rosellen, J. P. Barratt, Thalberg, and E. Flood. The music of the Songs include the names of Sir H. R. Bishop, John Barnett, Edward Loder, Charles Horn, A. Lee, G. Linley, J. Parry, Macfarren, Lindpaintner, R. Linter, F. N. Crouch, Blockley, G. F. Taylor, J. R. Ling, Millar, J. Winterbottom, Manning, Marsden, Morrell, E. F. Fitzwilliam, Stewart, &c.; and the Poetry is by Lord Byron, T. H. Bayley, J. E. Carpenter, Mrs. Crawford, E. Fitzball, H. Howard, Mark Lemon, G. E. Inman, Mrs. Alexander, Mr. C. B. Wilson, Percy Douglas, D. Ryan, [illegible], &c. We cannot attempt to analyse the different qualities of the compositions: there is, of course, some mediocrity mixed up with the good things; and it by no means follows that the assertion of "composed" is a certain evidence of paternity. In future Numbers, we would recommend the Editor to insert, in the table of contents, the names of the composers as well as the titles of the pieces, to which might be added a frank avowal as to the adaptations and arrangements.

The decorative portion of this elegant album is unexceptionable. The Harleian Collection in the British Museum, the Clovio Manuscript in the Soanean Collection, and the Bibliotheca Egertoniana, are the sources from which Mr. Brandard has selected his subjects for the ornamental and illuminated covers, contents, inscription, title, and frontispiece. There are also some graceful subjects supplied by the pencil of the artist, such as the three figures of Poetry, Painting, and Music, on the covers; and a charming composition, encircled by the borders of arabesques and medallions, in the frontispiece. The inscription page is remarkably elegant—it is almost a pity that any profane scrawl should be inscribed on such a scroll. The exquisite vignette, with the bright golden capitals of the index page, cannot escape notice. Altogether, this volume is a gorgeous specimen of [illegible] could not be presented to the fairer portion of the creation.

THE BOOK OF BEAUTY. Charles Jefferys.

This is a superb volume of poetry, illustration, and music. Mr. John Brandard has designed and lithographed the illustrations, which are printed in gold and colours, by M. and N. Hanhart. There are 120 pages of music and poetry by the most popular composers, including Bellini, S. Glover, C. W. Glover, Macfarren, Weippert, Eliza Cook, S. Nelson, J. Hine, Spencer, Weigl, &c. There is an excellent portrait of Beethoven from the German print, an engraving of which appeared in our columns at the time of the Bonn Monument Festival, in August, 1845. The emblazoned presentation plate, title-page, and frontispiece, are very elegant.

THE ACCORDION PRECEPTOR.—THE CORNOPEAN AND SAX-HORN PRECEPTOR. G. & H. Dav[illegible].

We have been frequently asked by Correspondents for the best instruction book for the accordion—an instrument so much in vogue in these days, and particularly well adapted for the performance of sacred chamber music. Mr. Henry West, of the Royal Academy of Music, has prepared with care and intelligence [illegible] to the public. To all amateurs [illegible] we can strongly recommend this work, as, with ordinary diligence, by [illegible], they may acquire a mastery over the instrument without the aid of a master. With the music of about 150 [illegible] the figuring is marked, preceded by a [illegible] grammar. The distinctions between the [illegible] accordions are [illegible] cated, and the scales are given [illegible], ten, and twelve keys.

When we state that the Preceptor for the Cornet-à-Piston or Cornopean and Sax-Horn has been compiled and arranged under the supervision of those accomplished artists, the Distin Family, it is quite unnecessary to dwell on the value of such a work, based as it is upon the celebrated book of M. Forrestier. Too much praise cannot be bestowed on the publisher, Mr. Davidson, for providing such cheap and excellent Class-Books for every instrument, thus affording to the Million, not only a knowledge of the general principles of music, [illegible] enabling the veriest tyro to comprehend the various qualities of instruments.

ANTHEMS AND SERVICES FOR CHURCH CHOIRS. J. Burns.

The December Number (No. 8) of this valuable collection of ecclesiastical music contains works by Vittoria, Di Lasso, Morales, [illegible], and Mozart. Of the vast utility of this publication for church choirs, families, choral societies, &c., we have before recorded our opinion, and we are glad to learn that the [illegible] appreciating the exertions of the editors and [illegible].

THE PARISH CHOIR, OR CHURCH MUSIC BOOK. John Ollivier.

This monthly publication has reached its tenth number. Its intent is to supply every information as to chorus chanting, &c., in order to effect a complete reformation of church music. There is evidence of zeal and ability in the "Parish Choir," but there is room for great improvement in the present mode of conducting the periodical, if its sphere of utility is to be extended. The object to be attained is praiseworthy, but the articles are too trivial and frivolous for such grave matters.

ON, ON, MY DEAR BRETHREN. By G. CROUCH. Spencer.

This is a Deputy Grand Master's song, composed in honour of the craft, which will be popular in the Lodges as an occasional effusion. It is dedicated to Lord Worsley, the Deputy Grand Master of [illegible] the Humber [illegible].

LONG LIVE THE QUEEN. National Anthem. By ALFRED AUGUSTUS DE REGINALD HELY.

This is a loyal effusion addressed to our most gracious Queen, which is beautifully printed, emblazoned and illuminated in gold and colours, from the specimen [illegible] her Majesty. As a work of typographical art, nothing can be more exquisite.

THE THEATRES.

OLYMPIC.

We think that "Jack Cade" met with somewhat harsher treatment than, with all its faults, it was entitled to, at this theatre, on Monday evening, when this admirable episode (comprising the second, third, sixth, seventh, eighth, and tenth scenes of the fourth act, and a slight alteration of some others, of the second part of Shakspeare's "King Henry the Sixth,") was produced for the first time. Sufficient pains had not been taken to insure its proper representation. The actors were imperfect; the melees and groupings were confused and uncertain; and small speeches and messages were given to such very inferior performers, that they provoked the loud ridicule of the audience; and when the curtain fell, a steady uncontradicted hissing greeted its descent.

Yet one or two of the actors were worthy of commendation. Mr H. Lee's Lord Say was excellently played, and his delivery of the principal speeches was very correct and impressive. Mr. Maynard's Jack Cade, too, had a good deal of rough dramatic force in it, that went far towards a proper delineation of the brutal rioter's character; and the same remarks will apply to Mr. Cowell's Dick the Butcher. But the stage business was so loose and rambling, and the minor parts so ineffectively sustained, that a very fair chance of producing a spectacle, which might have proved attractive, was entirely thrown away. The prices of admission had been reduced—the boxes to half-a-crown, and the pit to a shilling; but the alteration did not appear to have affected the numbers of the audience, either one way or the other.

FRENCH PLAYS.

M. Perlet, who was to have appeared on Monday evening, was again prevented by indisposition. The "Rivaux d'eux mêmes" and "Le Bonhomme Richard" were therefore performed; and the agreeable talents of Mademoiselle Brohan made up for the disappointment. "Le Bonhomme Richard" is an excellent piece; the plot turning upon the adventures of an honest old country propriétaire, who, hearing that a young man, in whom he feels the greatest interest, is going on somewhat wildly in Paris—in fact getting "upon town"—goes up to the city to see and save him, and is himself caught by the Anacreontic pleasures of the capital. The "Goodman" is admirably played by Cartigny.

THE SURREY.

At the latter end of last week, a gentleman, named Bayntun Rolt, made his appearance at this theatre as Macbeth. His performance was, even for an amateur, very much below mediocrity; and although he was sturdily applauded by certain zealous friends, both throughout the tragedy and at its conclusion, yet there were those unpleasant sounds very plainly audible during the progress of the piece, and what is far more fatal, that jocose disposition amongst the disinterested—or rather uninterested—portion of the audience, which together appear to have limited Mr. Rolt's appearances to a very few nights, albeit the advertisements in the Sunday papers spoke of his triumphant success. It was said, in the theatre, that the new actor was an amateur desirous of acquiring histrionic fame, even by paying pretty handsomely for the chance. If this be true, and we believe it to have been the case, then is the management of the Surrey most culpable. As regards this theatre it has been our pleasure to speak of late in the highest terms of the manner in which it has been conducted. The prolonged engagement of Mr. Macready turned out a most advantageous one to both actor and lessee; and this was very properly followed up by that of the sisters Cushman. The reputation of the theatre rose to a higher standard than it had ever before enjoyed, and it was practically [illegible] in the arguments of the dramatic philanthropist, that the Surrey audiences would always support excellence in any shape. The engagements of these excellent artistes having come to a conclusion, nothing could be in worse taste than the allowing the theatre to become a place of exhibition for any of those stage-struck persons, who will parade their utter inefficiency before the public, at [illegible]. A general loss is the result of such ill-advised proceedings. The actor loses his money and the respect of his private judicious friends; the management loses its credit for keeping good faith with the patrons of the establishment, and providing them with a proper entertainment; and the audiences lose their confidence in the theatre. They find they have been taken in, and they are careful not to be again drawn into the snare.

Beaumont and Fletcher's "Wild Goose Chase" is to be the next revival at the OLYMPIC. This comedy is more familiar to modern play-goers as "The Inconstant," by Farquhar, who took nearly the whole of the first four acts, with a great portion of the dialogue, from the former piece; and then merely observed in the preface that the "Wild Goose Chase" had afforded him the hint of his own play.

A new piece, called "The Young Pretender," to be performed at the HAYMARKET, on Saturday, is from the pen of Mr. Lemon.

Mr. Buckstone is at present engaged on a new drama for the ADELPHI, of the "Wreck Ashore" and "Green Bushes" school. The Christmas entertainment at this house will be a pantomime on a somewhat novel plan. All the characters will speak, as in the old Italian pieces of the kind. Mr. Selby, we believe, is the constructor.

We suppose we shall not now betray any secrets in mentioning the name of the LYCEUM drama, from Mr. Dickens's Christmas story. It is to be called "The Battle of Life," which is, of course, the name of the book. The pantomime, by Mr. Stoquelar, is the favourite old tale of "The Butterfly's Ball and the Grasshopper's Feast."

The different theatres which are now open with threepenny galleries—and other prices in proportion—mention the competition on all sides, in the singing taverns, &c., as their motive for reducing the admission money. We cannot conceive that this plan will benefit them. Few, however poor, who turn out to make a holiday night of it, care whether they give sixpence or threepence, and look chiefly to the entertainment offered, which cannot possibly be a good one at this miserable price, if even the barest expenses of the different stock departments of the humblest establishment are taken into consideration.

COUNTRY NEWS.

REPRESENTATION OF BATH. A Bath paper announces that Lord Ashley will be put in nomination as a candidate for the representation of that city, at the next election, on the Conservative interest.

MEETING OF LIVERPOOL MERCHANTS IN FAVOUR OF THE REDUCTION OF THE TEA DUTIES.—On Wednesday afternoon a very numerous meeting of the leading Liverpool merchants took place, at which resolutions were agreed to, urging a reduction of the duty on tea. The leading merchants of all parties took part in the proceedings. The chief speakers were Bramley Moore, Esq., the talented chairman of the Dock Committee; Thomas Berry Horsfall, Esq.; Samuel Holme, Esq.; and Edward Brodribb, Esq. A deputation was named to proceed to London, for the purpose of having an interview with the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

THE COBDEN NATIONAL TRIBUTE FUND.—The usual weekly meeting of the [illegible] Manchester Committee for the promotion of this undertaking was held at Manchester, on Monday evening, Mr. [illegible] Southworth in the chair. Mr. Pattisson, the secretary, reported that the fund had this week been increased by the amount of £327 7s. 10d., making a total, up to the present date, of £[illegible] 8d.

OPENING OF THE TUNBRIDGE WELLS EXTENSION RAILWAY.—The extension branch line of the Tunbridge Wells Railway was publicly opened on Wednesday for passenger and other traffic. From the former station, outside the town, the way branches about 250 yards through a deep cutting, where it enters a tunnel 800 yards in length, which, within 70 or 80 yards, brings the visitor to the station, which is close to the church, and nearly as possible in the centre of the old and new towns. No public ceremony was observed in its opening, Mr. Peter W. Barlow, the company's engineer, being the only official present. The Board of Trade certified its security some time since.

CURIOUS CEREMONY AT NEWCASTLE (STAFFORDSHIRE).—A few days ago the [illegible] of electing a "Mock Mayor" peculiar, we believe, to the borough of Newcastle (Staffordshire)—was celebrated with more than usual formality. In by-gone days, before the Municipal Bill was passed or dreamt of, this annual show was got up in burlesque of the election of chief magistrate, and was always held on the same day. For the last few years the custom has fallen into abeyance; and, determined that this year should compensate for the shortcomings of its predecessors, much time and pains were spent in making the necessary preparations, and the election was consequently postponed until a week after the day fixed by law for the election of the lawful head of the corporation. The display bore a very formidable appearance. In the procession rode the Lady Mayoress on horseback. Her ladyship was attired in spotless white, with hat, veil, and waving plume. She was attended by a black servant, also on horseback. There were the sergeants-at-mace, with their emblems of office, and wearing sheep-skin wigs, on foot. Then, pompously and right worshipfully, strode the Mock Mayor of Newcastle. He was enveloped in the black hide of a Staffordshire bull, with an immense pair of horns branching from his head. A long train of councillors followed, each arrayed in a cow-hide tunic, and bearing implements used in the useful and profitable art of tanning. The mock town-crier, on horseback, brought up the rear of the procession, while hundreds of boys and girls—and children of a larger growth—followed in the train. The Mayor and Council, by judicious haltings, secured a copious supply of stimulants—the Lady Mayoress condescendingly pledging in the "loving cup," just by the way of keeping out the cold. [illegible] Mayor was proclaimed at the Market-cross, according to custom, [illegible] the procession paraded through the principal streets of the town. The display of [illegible] implements, and the superabundance of leather in [illegible] state, [illegible] in compliment to the respected chief magistrate, who [illegible] engaged in the tanning business.

FIRE AT PLYMOUTH.—A fire occurred at Plymouth on Monday, by which it is estimated that damage has been done to the amount of £3000. It broke out on the premises of Messrs. [illegible], ironmongers, at the corner of Bilbury and Buckwell-streets, and afterwards partially extended to the houses of Mr. Watts, tailor; Mr. Woolf, pawnbroker; Mrs. Weeks, milliner; and Mr. Trickett, dyer.

LITERATURE

Stray Leaves from a Freemason's Note-Book. By A Suffolk Rector. [illegible]

This is a very agreeable fireside volume of Sketches, which are likely to interest a considerable class of readers; in addition to the claim they have upon another section, from their advocacy of the principles and practice of Freemasonry, and narr[illegible]on of remarkable characteristics of celebrated Masons. The charm of the book lies in its individuality—or gossip of contemporaries who have "moved the world," and which, in a s[illegible]ightly anecdote, gives us a [illegible] of a [illegible] nature than in a lumbe[illegible]g volume on his "life and times." Nor are touches of pathos and bril[illegible] wanting to gild the worthy Rector's "Stray Leaves;" he often wr[illegible]ng and vigour, if not always with the nicest discrimination. Amon[illegible]rs who are slid into the narratives are Scott, Canning, Gif[illegible], Liston, the Marquis of Hastings, Col. Wildman, the late Rev. R. L[illegible], &c. From the sketch entitled "Sir William Webb Follett, in Early Life," we select a specimen [illegible]

"[illegible]nversation," says the Rector, who was a school-fellow of Sir W. Follett, "I inferred, from a passing remark, that he had become a Mason. I asked if my conclusion was correct. 'It is,' was his reply: 'I was initiated at Cambridge.' Light had not then beamed upon myself; and I expressed in scoffing terms my astonishment. 'In your early struggles at the bar,' remarked he, with quiet earnestness, 'you require something to reconcile you to your kind. You see so much of bitterness, and rivalry, and jealousy, and hatred, that you are thankful to call into active agency a system which creates, in all its varieties, kindly sympathy, cordial and wide-spread benevolence, and brotherly love.' 'But, surely,' said I, 'you don't go the length of asserting that Masonry does all this?' 'And more! The true Mason thinks no evil of his brother, and cherishes no designs against him. The system itself annihilates parties. And as to censoriousness and calumny, most salutary and stringent is the curb which Masonic principle, duly carried out, applies to an unbridled tongue.' 'Well! well! you cannot connect it with religion: you cannot, say or do as you will, affirm of it that Masonry is a religious system.' 'By-and-by, you will know better,' was his repl[illegible] lodge; that Masons habitually use prayer in their lodges; and, in point of fact, never assemble for any purpose without performing acts of religion:—I gave you credit,' continued he, with a smile, 'for being more thoroughly emancipated from nursery trammels and slavish prejudice.' 'You claim too much for your system,' was my rejoinder. 'Not at all! But hear me. Many clergymen were and are Masons. The well-known Dr. Dodd belonged to us.' 'I presume,' said I, jestingly, 'you attach but slight weight to his name? The selection is unfortunate.' 'It occurred to me,' said he, 'from my having recently read some very curious letters connected with his case. The Masons, both individually and as a body, made the most extraordinary efforts to save him. They were unwearied: but—I must break off; when I can call you brother, you shall see these letters. Meanwhile, is it not worth while to belong to a fraternity whose principles, if universal, would put down at once and for ever the selfish and rancorous feelings which now divide and distract society?'"

The following, from a conversation with Dr. Lant Carpenter, "On the Sorrows of the Lost," is singular:

"He maintained, in eloquent terms, his opinions as to the individuality of the soul. He avowed his fixed persuasion that all the myriads of human beings who ever lived and moved upon this earth still lived, and were at that very moment in existence, all together. The whole world, he maintained, still lived. 'All of whom we read in the Old Testament as having perished by famine, by pestilence, by the sword, still live. No soul can be swept away. It is still existent.' 'In a distinct and separate place?' 'Unquestionably! Each soul is reserved by its Mighty Guardian for a separate and distinct award.' 'Where?' was the inquiry uttered by more than one of his auditory. 'That we are not permitted to know.'"

Tales of Female Heroism. Burns.——Stories of the Crusades. Burns.

These two volumes are elegant contributions to a library for the young; or, in other words, they are "juvenile books" of the better class; not written down to the capacity of the reader, but with such attractiveness as to lead him or her up to the intellectual amusement of historical lore. The episodal character of the two works must contribute greatly to their popularity. The first brings together several traits of female heroism, to show the fortitude and devotion of which women are capable, rather in a feminine and domestic aspect than a brilliant one, and to exhibit acts of courage and presence of mind in characters distinguished by their conscientious fulfilment of the quiet, unobtrusive duties of every-day life. The mere enumeration of a few of the historiettes will give our readers an idea of the varied interest of this well-filled volume. First, we have a narrative of the devotional services of Mrs. Jane Lane in aiding the escape of Charles II. after the battle of Worcester; rewarded, after the Restoration, by a pension, and the gift, by Charles, of a gold watch, which relic, in 1830, was in the possession of the Dowager Mrs. Lucy, of Charlecot Park. This is followed by the eventful life of Lady Fanshawe, written by herself, and presenting animated pictures of the courts of Charles I. [illegible]d II., as well as of the conjugal happiness of the writer, and of her great prudence, courage, and presence of mind. Lady Morton, "one of the beautiful race of Villiers," and her devotional attachment to the ill-fated Queen Henrietta-Maria, are commemorated in a brief sketch. Several glances at Scottish history follow, as "The Heart of Montrose," "Lady Grisell Baillie" (a delightful picture of the domestic graces and affections, as well as of tru[illegible] [illegible]ora Macdonald" (escape of the unfortunate Prince Ch[illegible] [illegible]" (the original of Scott's "Jeanie Deans"), from a narrative by Miss Porter; the naively written history of Madame La Rochejaquelein's trials and sufferings in the wars of La Vendée; the memorable escape of Mrs. Spencer Smith, sister-in-law of Sir Sidney Smith, &c. &c. These, with two or three records of German character, form the staple of the work, which, as the reader will perceive, is judiciously various in its contents. To conclude, personal history, at all times interesting, is peculiarly so, in these narratives, from their recording some of the sweetest attributes of female virtue.

The second volume, "Stories of the Crusaders," contains two brilliant narratives of the Chivalry of the West, "De Hellingley," and "The Crusade of S. Louis," the latter from Joinville's delightful Memoir.

Both works exhibit careful editorial annotation, with a due regard to popular style. The first has a spirited illustration of Lady Bankes's courageous defence of Corfe Castle, and the latter an episode from the Battle of Tiberias.

The French Prompter. By M. Le Page. Wilson.

Petit Musée de Litterature Francaise. By M. Le Page. Wilson.

The author or editor of these very useful manuals is well-known by his extensively successful tuition of the French language in the metropolis; he is one of the best idiomatic instructors of the day, and his works are invariably characterised by lucid system, a very desirable excellence in all educational works.

One of the volumes before us is well described by its title "The French Prompter;" it being a sort of royal road to conversation, more especially such as travellers on the Continent are likely to stand in need of; indeed, it is a little dictionary of words, to each of which are appended phrases in which they are most commonly employed: for example—"Abbey. Have you seen Westminster Abbey? Avez-vous vu l'Abbaye de Westminster?"

The "Petit Musée" is a well-arranged selection, prose and verse, from the most eminent writers of France, with chronological and critical notices of French literature, from the fourteenth to the nineteenth centuries. The collection comprises almost every variety of composition, and must be considered as an elegant contribution to our class-books.

Christmas in the Olden Time; or, the Wassail Bowl. By John Mills. Hurst.

Alack! for the gay and glittering Annuals! their chance must be poor, indeed; now that the success of Mr. Dickens's Christmas volumes has produced a plentiful crop of imitators, who, probably, act upon the grateful principle that "one good turn deserves another." It is, however, no fault of rare and first-rate genius that it calls a host of mediocrity into existence: this is rather honour than reproach; the latter belongs to the imitators of the Bozzian school, who, almost without exception, aim at the manner of their great progenitor, but altogether miss his noble purpose, without which Mr. Dickens has not written a single chapter.

The volume before us is the first book of the season which it aims at commemorating—"the festival period of the year," as the author somewhat uncouthly phrases it. He is, however, quite at home in the conventionalities of Christmas lore; as in the "ivy, holly, and rosemary twined in the crown of Christmas, hoary-locked and bleached with age;" and, "the wassail bowl, deep and full;" and "quaint ballads, carols, and ditties;" "the yule log;" "the time-worn roof of the Baronial Hall;" "'tis Christmas, right merry Christmas;" and all that sort of thing. However, this is but the framework of Mr. Mills's Christmas Story, which is modestly introduced to the reader: the incidents are ingenious, and the tale is interesting; and the Yule Games and other Christmas [illegible]cessories are neatly slid in. The work is very prettily illustrated, and is altogether [illegible]duced in such style as must attract patrons at the approaching present-making [illegible].

The Post-Office London Directory, 1847. Kelly and Co.

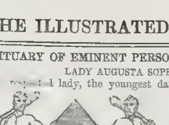
This huge volume, the forty-eighth edition of the w[illegible], well sustains the reput[illegible]tion enjoyed by the "Directory" of late ye[illegible]. In the Preface, the prop[illegible]r maintains that the high character of the work is not referable to its mere connexion with the Post-Office; for an important change has been gradually introduced into the manner of collecting the information; and a larger portion of the work than heretofore has been confided to selected agents entirely unconnected with the Post-Office, this being, in great pa[illegible], the plan of compiling the editions for 1845 and 1846. Nor has the proprietor rested content with his past success, but has introduced many important alterations in this volume for 1847, and added to its bulk without any increase of price. The "Postal Directory" is especially improved; and there are numerous changes throughout the volume, to insure its completeness. The compilation must be a vast labour, to be accomplished only by systematic subdivision, and the most painstaking minuteness. The appearance of the volume has suggested a very lively effusion, to be seen in another column; and we trust [illegible] appreciated and remunerated. To a great commercial country this is an indispensable volume.

A Blue Hare.—A few day[illegible]go, a hare of a singular c[illegible]r, which had been seen in Mr. Woodbridge's coverts, at Bigods, Essex, for a year or two, [illegible] called the "blue hare," was killed by Dr. Barnes. Its fur resembled that of the grey squirrel, and had a very singular appearance.

Supposed Poisoning in Suffolk.—An inquest has been held near Sudbury, upon the body of a labourer, named Foster, who is supposed t[illegible] have been poisoned three weeks after his marriage. It is said that some suspected part[illegible] are in custody. The subject is under investigation by the authorities of the county.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

LADY AUGUSTA SOPHIA CATHCART.



T[illegible] lady, the youngest daughter of the late gallant Earl Cathcart, by Elizabeth, his wife, daughter of Andrew Elliot, Esq., Governor of New York, died at Cathcart House, near Glasgow, on the 18th, having nearly completed her forty-[illegible] year. The antiquity of the [illegible] which her Ladyship derived is attested by the fact that Reinaldus de Kethcart appears as a subscribing witness to a grant by Alan the son of Walter, Dapifer Regis, of the patronage of the Church of Kethcart to the Monastery of Paisley, in the year 1178. From this Reinaldus lineally descended Sir Alan Cathcart, Knt., whose valour at the Battle of Loudoun Hill, 1307, is thus recorded:—

A Knight that then was in his rout,
Worthy and witht, stalwart and stout,
Courteous and fair, and of good fame,
Sir Alan Cathcart was his name.

In reference to these lines, and to the gallant character of Sir Alan's descendants, Lord Hailes observes that it is pleasant to trace a family likeness in an ancient picture.

THOMAS PENRICE, ESQ., OF KILVROUGH.

This gentleman, wh[illegible] at Little P[illegible] R[illegible]tory on the 12th inst., aged fifty-seven, was second son of the late Thomas Penrice, Esq., of Yarmouth, the residuary legatee of John Howe, Lord Chedworth, and the successor to his Lordship's estates in the counties of Gloucester and Wilts. Inheriting from his father a considerable property, Mr. Thomas Penrice purchased, in 1820, the manor of Kilvrough, near Swansea, and other lands in Glamorganshire. Early in life he entered the military service, and was in all the Peninsular campaigns of the Duke of Wellington. Captain Penrice has died unmarried, leaving two brothers, John, of Yarmouth, and Charles, of Plumstead, a clergyman, besides two sisters, Hannah Green, widow of Andrew Fountaine, Esq., of Narford, and Mary, married to Thomas Trench Berney, Esq., of Morton Hall.

GEORGE NIGEL EDWARDS, ESQ., OF HENLOW GRANGE, BEDFORDSHIRE.

Mr. Edwards was son of the late Richard Raynsford, Esq., and inherited the Henlow Grange property at the decease of his maternal uncle, George Edwards, Esq., upon which occasion he assumed the surname and arms of Edwards. Subsequently, he was appointed a Deputy-Lieutenant for Bedfordshire, and served as High Sheriff of that county in 1827. His death occurred on the 21st inst., at the age of seventy-eight. He married, in 1803, Katherine, second daughter of Robert Peers, Esq., of Chislehampton Lodge, county Oxford; but became a widower, without issue, in 1840.

THE MARKETS.

Corn Exchange (Friday).—The supply of English wheat on sale to-day was on the increase—the arrivals this week having exceeded 5000 quarters; owing to which the trade was h[illegible]t barely but at nothing quotable beneath M[illegible]day's prices. Free foreign wheat was [illegible] previous rates, but the transactions in it were very trifling. In corn under lock, not[illegible] doing. The supply of barley was not large, yet it was quite sufficient for the demand, which ruled heavy, at barely late rates. The demand for malt was very slow, and some difficulty was experienced in effecting sales at late rates. Oats, beans, peas, and flour commanded very little attention.

Arrivals.—English: Wheat, 5030, barley, 1960; malt, 610; oats, 1680. Flour, 1860 sacks. Irish: barley 700, oats, 9550. Foreign: Wheat, 2420, barley, 960; oats, 1040 quarters. Flour, 10,200 barrels.

English. Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 53s to 64s; ditto white, 62s to 69s; Norfolk and Suffolk, red 53s to 58s; ditto white, 58s to 65; rye, 40s to 42s, grinding barley, 34s to 36s; distilling, 38s to 40s, malting ditto, 42s to 65s Lincoln and Norfolk malt, 70s to 74s; brown ditto, [illegible] Kingston a[illegible]d [illegible]7s to 72s Chevalier, 72s to 74s. Yorkshire and Lincolnshire [illegible] 25s to 30s, potato ditto, 30s to 32s; Y[illegible] Cork, black, 25s to 26s ditto white, 26s to 30s. tick beans, new, 40s to 44s; ditto old, 48s to 51s, grey peas, 44s to 46s; maple, 44s to 46s; white, 46s to 48s; boilers, 49s to 52s, per quarter. Town-made flour, 51s to 56s; Suffolk, 46s to 48s; Stockton and Yorkshire 46s to 48s, per 280 lbs. Foreign.—Free wheat, —s to —s; Dantzig, red, 58s to 64s, ditto white, 64s to 68s per quarter. In Bond.—Barley, —s to —s; oats, new, —s to —s, ditto, feed, —s to —s, and peas, —s to —s per quarter. Flour, American, 34s to 36s; Baltic, —s to —s per barrel.

The Seed Market.—[illegible] limited business has been transacted in [illegible] market, at previous quotations.

[illegible], Baltic, crushing, 41s 0d to 48s; Mediterranean and Odessa, 45s to 48s. Hempseed, 35s to 38s per quarter. Coriander, 10s to 13s per cwt. Brown Mustard-seed, 9s to 10s; white ditto, 8s to 10s. Tares, 5s 6d to 6s per bushel. English Rapeseed, new, £23 to £25 per last of ten quarters. Linseed cakes, English, £13 to £13 10s; ditto, foreign, £10 0s to £11 0s per 1000; Rapeseed cakes, £5 0s to £6 0s per ton. Canary, 55s to 62s per quarter. English Clover-seed, red, —s to —s, extra, —s to —s, white, —s to —s; extra, up to —s. Foreign, red, —s to —s; extra, —s; white, —s to —s, extra, —s per cwt.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread in the metropolis are from 9d to 9½d; of household ditto, 8d to 8½d per 4lb loaf.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 59s 8d; barley, 42s 11d; oats, 25s 10d; rye, 42s 7d; beans, 46s 4d; peas, 49s 0d.

The Six Weeks' Average.—Wheat, 60s 11d; barley, 42s 0d; oats, 26s 5d; rye, 40s 9d; beans, 46s 2d; peas, 49s 7d.

Duties on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 4s 0d; barley, 2s 0d; oats, 1s 6d; rye, 2s 0d; beans, 2s 0d; peas, 2s 0d.

Tea.—This article is still inactive, yet prices rule about stationary. Common Congou, 10½d to 11d per lb.

Sugar.—Fine parcels of West India are quite as dear; but all other kinds of raw sugar have a downward tendency. Refined goods without alteration.

Coffee.—There is only a moderate business doing, at about last week's prices.

Rice.—This article is heavy, and prices are not supported. Most of the parcels offered at auction have been taken in.

Provisions.—We have to report a heavy demand for Irish butter, at a further decline in value of from 1s to 2s per cwt. Carlows, landed, 94s to 98s, Clonmel, 94s to 96s; Cork, 92s to 93s; Limerick and Belfast, 86s to 90s; Waterford, 88s to 90s; and Sligo, 84s to 88s per cwt. English butter has fallen 1s to 2s per cwt. Fine Dorset, [illegible] middling, 94s to 98s, and Devon, 95s to 96s, per cwt.; fresh, 11s to 13s per dozen. Fine Dutch butter is quite as dear, but all other qualities are neglected. Best marks, 98s to 102s; and low and middling, 72s to 94s per cwt. Bacon is in fair request, at previous currencies. In all other kinds of provisions, exceedingly little is doing.

Hops (Friday).—In the finest parcels of hops—the show of which is not to say large—a fair amount of business is doing, at full prices. In other kinds, very few sales have taken place this week at barely previous quotations. New Sussex pockets, 72s to 90s; Weald of Kent ditto, 78s to 90s; Mid and East Kent ditto. 88s to 126s per cwt.

Wool.—The public sales are progressing slowly. Privately, exceedingly little is doing.

Potatoes.—The supplies being on the increase, the demand is heavy, at barely stationary prices.

Hay and Straw.—Meadow hay, £2 5s to £4; clover ditto, £3 5s to £5; and straw, £1 10s to £1 14s per load.

Tallow.—The market for Russian has a quiet appearance. P.Y.C., on the spot, 48s to 48s 3d; and for delivery, 48s per cwt. Town tallow, 50s, net cash.

Oils.—All kinds of fish and seed oils have met a dull sale, and, for linseed, not more than 25s 3d to 25s 6d can be obtained.

Coals (Friday).—Adair's, 19s; Lambton, 20s 6d; Stewarts, 20s 9d; Adelaide, 19s 6d; and Hetton, 19s 6d per ton.

Smithfield (Friday).—The supply of beasts on offer to-day being extensive, and the attendance of buyers small, the beef trade was exceedingly dull. The few prime Scots, &c., on show produced full prices; but all other qualities were again somewhat lower. From Holland, we received 370 beasts, 1460 sheep, and 14 calves; from Spain, 30 oxen. The numbers of home-fed sheep were small; yet the inquiry for them was in a very depressed state, at barely Monday's quotations. Calves—the supply of which was limited—moved off slowly, at barely stationary prices. In pigs, comparatively little business was transacted, at late rates. Milch cows were very dull, at from £16 to £18 5s each.

Per 8lb. to sink the offals.—Coarse and inferior beasts, 2s 4d to 2s 6d; second quality ditto, 2s 8d to 3s 0d; prime large oxen, 3s 2d to 3s 8d; prime Scots, &c., 3s 10d to 4s 2d; coarse and inferior sheep, 3s 8d to 3s 10d; second quality ditto, 4s 0d to 4s 4d; prime coarse-woolled ditto, 4s 6d to 4s 10d; prime South Down ditto, 5s 0d to 5s 4d; large coarse calves, 3s 8d to 4s 2d, prime small ditto, 4s 4d to 4s 8d; large hogs, 3s 8d to 4s 4d; neat small porkers, 4s 6d to 4s 8d. Suckling calves, 18s to 29s; and quarter old store pigs, 16s to 18s each. Beasts, 994; cows, 118; sheep, 3180; calves, 186; pigs, 380.

Newgate and Leadenhall (Friday).—We had a very dull trade to-day at barely stationary prices.

Per 8lb. by the carcase:—Inferior beef, 2s 4d to 2s 6d; middling ditto, 2s 8d to 2s 10d; prime large ditto, 3s 0d to 3s 2d; prime small ditto, 3s 4d to 3s 6d; large pork, 3s 4d to 4s 0d; inferior mutton, 3s 4d to 3s 8d, middling ditto, 3s 10d to 4s 2d; prime ditto, 4s 4d to 4s 6d; veal, 3s 6d to 4s 8d, small pork, 4s 2d to 4s 8d.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

C[illegible]sols have been firm during the week, with a gradual advance, from 94½ to ⅝ [illegible]. This has mainly arisen from the purchases made by the public, assisted [illegible] the operations of the brokers acting on behalf of the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt. Money Stock has been scarce, from the speculators being generally sellers; prices, consequently, advanced. The settling on C[illegible] T[illegible]day, passed off without the slightest difficulty, accommodation [illegible]sy rates. Consols close at 94⅝ to ⅞ for money, and 94⅞ for the January account. Exchequer Bills have scarcely varied, remaining at 9s to 12s premium; Bank Stock is 205; Three per Cent. Reduced, 93⅝; New Three-and-a Quarter per Cents, 95⅝; India Bonds, 22s. pm.

Business in the Foreign Market continues extremely limited, and the fluctuations are hardly worthy recording. Spanish Five per Cents quoted on Monday 25¾ to ⅞, but receded on Wednesday to 25½ to ⅝, and close nominally at that price. The Three per Cents. have been, and remain at 37 to 37⅛. Passives, 5½ to ¾. Mexican Stock has fluctuated between 21⅝ to 22, to 21⅝, closing at the former price. At a meeting of the Committee of South American Bondholders, held on Monday, the conduct of Messrs. Schneider and Co., in refusing to surrender the Bonds, &c., into the hands of the new Mexican Minister, was highly approved of, and a letter to that effect has been since transmitted to that firm. Portuguese Stock has been scarcely dealt in, and remains at the wide quotation of 36 to 38. Brazilian [illegible] per C[illegible]s., 59½; Four per C[illegible] Russian, 111.

The Share Market has been dull, and many of the heavy shares have receded in value. London and North Western have declined to 190 to 192. Brightons, Dovers, and Caledonians are also worse. North Staffordshire shares have fluctuated considerably; and South Westerns are also heav[illegible] shareholders of the latter company w[illegible] unanimously in favour of carrying out the extensive projects of th[illegible] directors, with the exception of making a loan of £50,000 to the Packet Company. This is universally considered an injudicious act, the money being secured only on the vessels, which every year become less valuable, both from service, as well as the hourly improvements made in steam navigation. At the close of the week, the market continued heavy[illegible]ng the prices of the shares last dealt in, will evidence:—Ambergate, Nottingham, Boston, and East[illegible], Birmingham and Dudley, ⅝ pm; Birmingham and Gloucester [illegible]nam and Oxford Junction, 8⅝; Bristol and Exeter, 81½; Caledonian, 23½; Ditto, Half Shares, 2¼; Eastern Counties, 22¾; Ditto, New, 7⅜ pm.; Ditto, York Extension, 3⅛; Eastern Union, 51½; Ditto, Quarter Shares, 12⅝; Ditto, C[illegible] Ely, 2½; Ditto New, 9½; Edinburgh and Glasgow, 75; [illegible] Quarter Shares, 18; Ely and Huntingdon, [illegible] Great Western, Half Shares, 75½; Ditto, Quart[illegible]; Ipswich and Bury St. Edmunds, [illegible]y, &c., 35½; Ditto, Br[illegible] 4⅝; Liverpool, Manchester, and Newcastle Junction, 2⅝; London, Brighton, and South Coast, 58½; Ditto, Fifths, 47½; London and Greenwich, 9⅜; London and North Western, 192; Ditto, Ditto, New Shares, 14⅝; Ditto, Fifths, 18¾; London and South Western, 64; Ditto, New, 27; London and York Extension, 1¾; Lynn and Dereham, 15⅞; Manchester and Leeds, Half Shares, 47; Do., Qrs., 5½; Do., Fifths, 10; Midland, 121; Do, New, 30⅝; Do. New, 6; Newc and Berwick, 33¼. Norfolk, 130; North British, 37½; Ditto Quarters, 3⅝; Ditto Extension, [illegible]; Northern and Eastern, 75⅝; Ditto Quarter Shares, 18½; Ditto New, 20; North Staffordshire, 3⅝ pm.; Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton, 12⅞; Preston and Wyre, 32½; Ditto Half Shares, 7½; Scottish Central, 19½; Scottish Midland, 12¾; Shrewsbury and Birmingham, 4½; South Eastern and Dover, 37; Ditto No. 4, 3; South Wales, 3⅝; West Riding Union, 1⅝ pm.; York and Newcastle, 37½; Ditto Preference, 7; York and North Midland Extension, 37½; Ditto East and West Riding Extension, 16½; Boulogne and Amiens, 13½; Bordeaux, Toulouse, and Cette (Mackenzie's), 1¼; Demerara, 4½; Jamaica S. Mid. Junction, 1⅝, Namur and Liege, 3⅝; Northern of France Constituted, 10; Paris and Lyons Constituted, 4⅞; Rouen and Havre, 25⅝; Tours and Nantes Constituted, 4.

Saturday Morning.—The Consol Market was firm yesterday, and the pay[illegible]; 94 ¾ ⅞, for Money, and 95 to ⅛ for the next Account, were the closing quotations. In the Foreign House, Portuguese improved to 37½. Spanish Three per Cents also quoted a point higher. The Share Market was better, the old lines improving in price, with more firmness.

Suicide of Lieutenant Douglas.—On Wednesday night Mr. Payne held an inque[illegible], at the Horslydown Tavern, Tan-street, Horslydown, on the body of Lieutenant William Douglas, aged 37, late of her Majesty's 12th Foot, and son o[illegible] General Douglas, who committed suicide under the following melancholy circumstances. Mr. Henry Gwillen, of 16 Strand, said he had known the deceased from boyhood. For four years he had been an inmate of three different lunatic asylums in Florence. On being brought to England he became an inmate of the lunatic asylum belonging to Mr. Birket, at Stoke Newington, and from there was taken to Dr. Coghlan's, at Cheltenham. The last time witness saw him alive was on Saturday morning last, when he appeared more composed than he had seen him for many months. In 1816 he had joined the 12th Foot, and went with his regiment to Gibraltar, but was allowed to resign. He was the son of a General officer, and his family were at the present in Ireland. He had made tw[illegible] or three attempts previously at self-destruction. Caroline Dally, of No. 4, Church-row, Horslydown, said the deceased had lodged in her mother's house about six weeks. On Tuesday morning, whilst passing through the passage, she saw him in the parlour, standing before the glass, cutting his th[illegible]oat with a razor. An alarm was given, and although assistance was promptly obtained, he shortly ceased to exist. The jury returned a verdict of Temporary Insanity.

ENTERTAINMENT TO GENERAL KALERGI.

Last Saturday, the Greek community resident in London gave an elegant entertainment to Gen. Kalergi, at the London Tavern, in honour of his exertions in the cause of the Greek Constitution. The event, interesting in itself, was rendered still more so by the announcement that the General was to be presented upon this occasion with a magnificent sword. From some delay, however, on the part of the artificers, this latter part of their design could not be accomplished; but to make some amends for this disappointment, a drawing of the sword was exhibited, and this excited considerable interest. The scabbard appears to be of exquisite workmanship, richly studded with gems. On one side are inscribed the words "Religion, Country, Constitution," and on the other, "To the General Kalergi, from the Greek Community of London, 21st Nov. 1846." On the handle is the cross of Greece, with the words "[illegible]ber, 1843." (These, of course, all in Greek.)

The room in which the e[illegible]t was given was decorated with banners, pictures, and Greek [illegible]iately over the chairman was a portrait of King Otho, surmounted by the in[illegible] of the Constitution, and flanked on either side by the national standard of Greece and the Union-jack of England. At the bottom was a splendid banner, with the inscription, "25th March, 1821." On the right was a chaste design in black marble, for a funereal arch, which it is proposed to erect to th[illegible] memory of the Hellenes and Philhellenes who fe[illegible] in the [illegible] on the left was a painting representing [illegible] Kalergi, at the head of the troops, demanding from the King the Constitution. There were also numerous portraits of King Otho and Queen Amalia scattered about the room.

The chair was occupied by Mr. Ionides, and there were about fifty gentlemen present, all members of the great commercial Greek houses in the metropolis. The proceedings were, as might be expected, carried on in their native tongue.

Dinner over, and the cloth removed, the Chairman proposed the health of King Otho, which was given with all the honours.

The Chairman next gave the health of Queen Victoria, which was responded to with great enthusiasm.

Mr. Franghiadi, the vice-president, proposed the health of Queen Amalia, which was also received with great applause.

"Prince Albert and the Royal Family" [illegible]

[illegible] Chairman then rose to propose the toast [illegible], "The H[illegible]th of General Kalergi." He was sure the toast which h[illegible] honour to propose required no rhetorical flourish to make it acc[illegible] unnecessary that he should detail to them the history of Kale[illegible] was it not written in, was it not coincident with, the history [illegible] independence? (Loud cheers.) At the age of sixteen Kale[illegible] leave Russia, where his relations had resided, in affluent [illegible], preferring rather to fight for liberty t[illegible] to live at home [illegible] inglorious ease. At the age of eighteen he stormed and took the fort of Gravousa, in his native island of Crete. Subsequently, in every important movement connected with Grecian independence he took a leading and active part; and as he was persuaded that the revolution of the 25th March, 1821, had not accomplished its final purpose, he, in conjunction with others, brought about that of the 3rd of September, and secured to Greece a Constitution. (Loud cheers.) Ever since the 3rd of September, 1843, the Greeks in London had intended to have presented him with a sword, as a token of their gratitude and esteem for the manner in which he brought about that bloodless revolution. Circumstances, however, had prevented the execution of their wish until the present moment, and now his presence amongst them rendered the time more appropriate. (Cheers.) It was useless for him further to enforce the toast. He would merely add, that so long as the sun shone on the Acropolis of Athens, and whilst the stars of the Grecian sky glistened on the plains of the 3rd September, so long would the name of Kalergi be dear to every true Greek. (Loud and continued cheering.)

Greek song by Mr. Cartwright.

General Kalergi said he could not adequately express to them his thanks for the kind way in which his health had been received. He delighted to find himself in the company of Greek merchants. He had himself been brought up in a merchant's office, and his father and uncle both were merchants. He could not wish them anything better than that their children should enjoy the same exalted notion of Greece, and the same love of liberty which characterised their fathers; and again thanking them most sincerely for the honour conferred upon him, he begged to drink to the health of the Greek community in London. (Loud cheers.)

The Chairman next gave "The three Allied Powers—England, France, and Russia." (Cheers.)

Mr. C. T. Ralli gave the next toast, "The final and irrevocable establishment of the Constitution of Greece glory and honour to those who were instrumental in its accomplishment." It was not to be expected that the Grecian Constitution should yet be a perfect institution. If they looked around they would see many nations much older not so far advanced as themselves. They must not, therefore, be disappointed that Greece had not brought to greater perfection a Constitution which she had only enjoyed three years; but they should rejoice that she had so far advanced as she had in the right direction. (Cheers.)

Mr. Geralopalo proposed "The Clergy." (Cheers.)

The Rev. Mr. Xenakis, minister of the Greek Chapel in Finsbury-circus, briefly responded to the toast, remarking upon the advantages of unanimity and concord, to which they were indebted for the glorious results of the 3rd of September.

Mr. Cassavetti gave "The Greek army and navy."

General Kalergi returned thanks. Though the army was small, it was very brave, and so long as that army existed there was no fear that the Grecian Constitution would ever be destroyed. (Cheers.) He then gave "The health of the Chairman," might he live to be as old as Mount Olympus, and to preside on many occasions like the present. (Cheers.)

The Chairman briefly acknowledged the honour.

Mr. Lascarides gave "The diffusion of knowledge and education in Greece."

Mr. P.T. Ralli gave "The independence of the courts of justice, and the liberty of the press." The speaker eloquently enlarged upon the subject entrusted to him, and maintained that the freedom of a country was never safe until the independence of its courts of justice and the liberty of its press were irrevocably secured. (Cheers.)

Mr. Mavrojani proposed the next toast—"To the memory of the Hellenes and Philhellenes who fell in the struggle for Grecian independence."

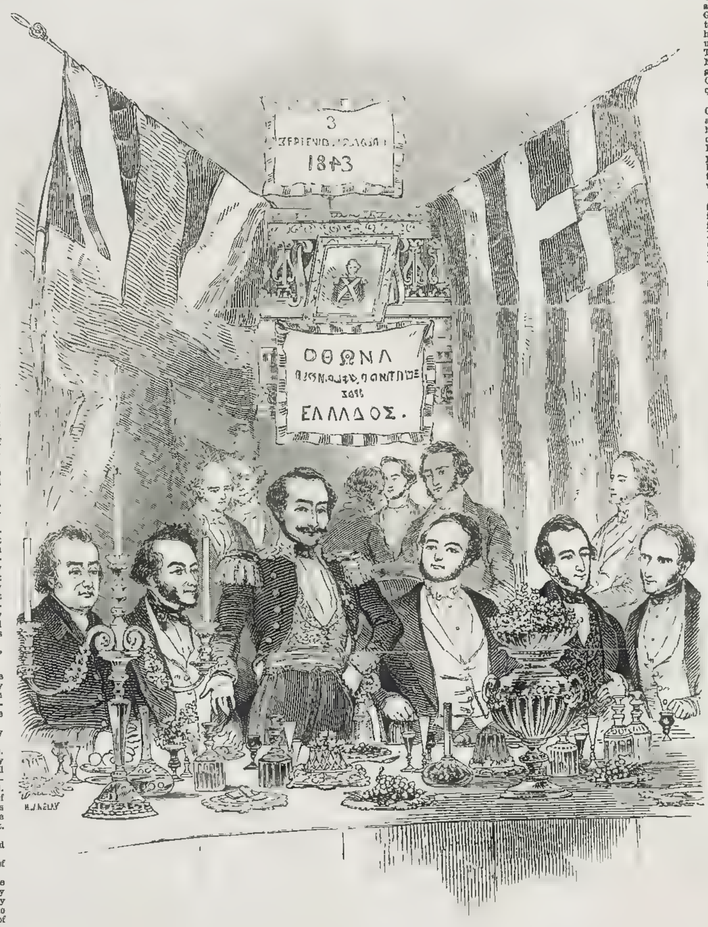
Drunk in solemn silence.

Mr. P. T. Ralli proposed—"The agriculture, commerce, industry, and mercantile marine of Greece."

"The health of the ladies," and of "The Vice-President and the Committee," followed, and were drunk with all the honours.

After this the gentlemen retired for a brief space, whilst the tables were removed, and the room was converted into a spacious salon de danse. Ladies then joined the party, and Terpsichorean enjoyments, aided by the excellent music of the band of the Coldstream Guards, were maintained till a late hour.

Our Illustration represents Kalergi addressing the company at the festival. We append a brief memoir of the General.



HELLENIC FESTIVAL TO KALERGI, THE GREEK PATRIOT, AT THE LONDON TAVERN.

> Out of three hundred, grant but three
> To make a new Thermopylæ.
> BYRON.

Three brothers—Emanuel and Nicolas, with the subject of the present notice, Demetrius Kalergi—responded nobly to the appeal of our noble poet. They left everything; devoted their properties and lives to the freedom of their beautiful country. Born in Candia, in the year 1806, educated liberally at St. Petersburg, Paris, and Vienna, Demetrius Kalergi barely attained his eighteenth year before he aroused his native island in a sanguinary, and for the moment successful, struggle against its Ottoman oppressors. Taken prisoner in the famous action of the Piræus, where 400 Cretans stood firmly for some hours before 20,000 Turks under Redschid Pasha, Demetrius escaped decapitation only by an immense ransom,—fortunate in that, when one of his brothers lay dead before his eyes, and the other brutally mutilated.

Having served for some time as Aide-de-Camp to the unfortunate Count Capo d'Istria, and disgusted with the appointment of Otho to the throne of Greece, Kalergi left his native land, only to return at the end of ten months, when he was cast into the dungeons of Argos upon a frivolous charge of treason. Tried at length by a Court-Martial at Navarino, under the presidency of our gallant countryman, General Sir Thomas Gordon, Kalergi was honourably acquitted.

Greece would not be Bavarized. The Constitutionalists conspired—the Greeks assembled on the Acropolis—Otho and his Bavarian Guards were on the point of being sent upon their travels, when Kalergi humoured the popular current—prevented the effusion of blood; obtained by his courage and wisdom the Constitutional freedom of the King and country without any humiliation to either.

Nor was the young King ungrateful for the timely interposition of Kalergi in defence of the Hellenic throne, and in vindication of Hellenic rights. His Majesty nominated Demetrius his Aide-de-Camp; raised him to the highest military rank, while the Senate invested him with the title and prerogatives of "the Great Citizen of Greece." But, alas! the gratitude of Princes and the intrigues of Courts! General Kalergi was no favourite with Coletti; for, no sooner was the latter installed as Prime Minister of Greece than the gallant General was stripped of rank and property—driven, like Themistocles, from the land which he served so devotedly.

STEAM NAVIGATION

ALONG THE SHORES OF ITALY.

THE Capri, (of which we annex a Sketch), and the Vesuvio, are new steam-vessels, lately built in the Thames, for the navigation of the Mediterranean; and both are remarkable examples of what British art and science can accomplish. They are the property of the Neapolitan Steam Navigation Company, and are intended to run between Marseilles and Malta, calling at Genoa, Leghorn, Civita Vecchia, Naples, Messina, and Syracuse; in connection with the Mongibello, Ercolano, and Maria-Christina—which vessels have been well known for several years to all the English tourists, as the best appointed in the Mediterranean. One of them leaves Marseilles, and another Malta, every week; and they stay one day at each of the intermediate ports, giving the passengers an opportunity of seeing them; as well as inspecting the classic shores of Italy and at the same time enjoying all the comforts and luxuries which the best hotel can afford. The Capri and Vesuvio are built of iron, by Ditchburn and Mare: they are 180 feet long; 600 tons; and 220 horse-power: the engines, double-cylinder, are by Mandslay and Field; and the speed of these vessels, 17½ miles an hour, is beyond anything which had hitherto been accomplished. The Vesuvio went from Falmouth to Naples in 7 days and 18 hours—which is a less time than the journey by land from Calais to Naples can be performed: a passenger who went out with her, remained four days at Naples, one day at Marseilles, and was in London on the twentieth day from his leaving Falmouth; which we believe unparalleled in the annals of travelling. These vessels have sleeping accommodation for 180 passengers, and are fitted up in the most elegant and commodious manner. The saloon resembles a drawing-room more than a cabin on ship-board: the panels are of maple-wood, and the mouldings are all carved in mahogany; the sofas are covered with crimson-figured velvet; the other furniture is maple and mahogany.

This superb apartment is used solely as a salle-a-manger. There are two ladies' cabins, and a sleeping cabin for gentlemen, fitted up in an equally elegant manner. Some idea of the style in which these vessels are appointed may be formed from knowing that each of them has five hundred pounds' worth of plate.

These vessels have been built and fitted up under the superintendence of Mr. Virgil Boni, the agent of the Company, who superintended also the Mongibello and Ercolano, and who has been engaged in the Mediterranean Steam Navigation, since its introduction in 1825.

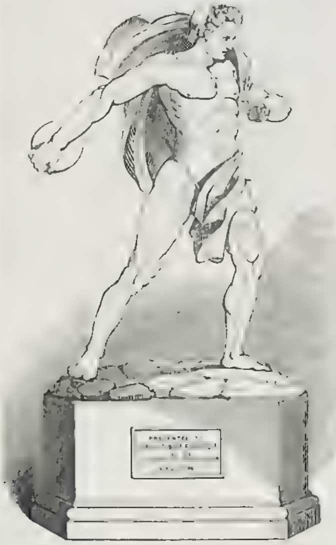
STOURBRIDGE CRICKET CLUB.

On Wednesday last, the gentlemen composing the Stourbridge Cricket Club, presented to H. T. Rufford, Esq., of Prescott House, a handsome Testimonial of the respect entertained by them towards him for his valuable services in connection with the Club. The event was celebrated by a dinner at the Talbot Inn, which was attended by between seventy and eighty gentlemen.

The Chair was taken by the Noble Lord Lieutenant of the County, Lord Lyttelton, who was supported on the right by H. T. Rufford, Esq.; and on the left by Wm. Trow, Esq.—Capt. Hickman ably officiated as Vice-President.



TESTIMONIAL PRESENTED TO MR. RUFFORD, BY THE STOURBRIDGE CRICKET CLUB.

After the customary loyal toasts had been duly honoured, the Testimonial was presented by the noble Chairman, and Mr. Rufford returned thanks.

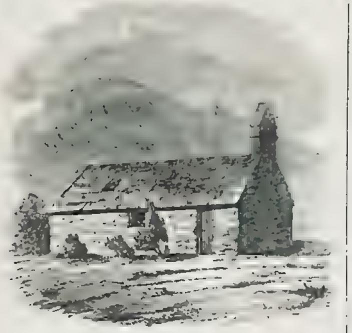
We have engraved the classic piece of plate, which has been manufactured in silver, by Messrs. Hunt and Roskell. The height of the figure is 20 inches; its weight, 80 ounces; and cost, 80 guineas. The design shows the ancient game, nearest to modern cricket—the hurling of the discus, in the manner of a bowl.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

CHAPEL, WASTDALE HEAD, CUMBERLAND.

The homely and diminutive churches of some of the thinly-populated rural districts, contrast strangely with the large and elaborate structures of our towns and cities. Wordsworth speaks of

> "Wythburn's modest house of prayer
> As lowly as the lowliest dwelling"



CHAPEL AT WASTDALE HEAD, CUMBERLAND.

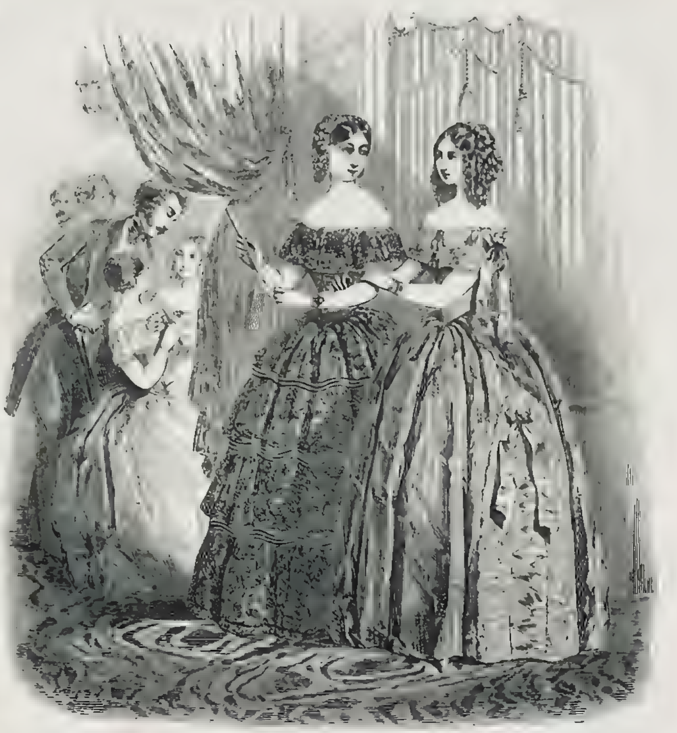
and the one amid the lonely sublimities of Wastdale Head is yet more lowly than Wythburn's. It is said to be the smallest in England, and is a mere hut with an open belfry and one bell, the rope swinging outside. It contains only eight pews, or rather forms, of old oak, and rude primitive construction. The service in this mountain sanctuary is more like a domestic than a public one; there is no regular clerk; any one of the congregation perform that office. On the morning when the writer of this note was there, the young daughter of the priest (as the clergyman is commonly called) read the responses, and that in a much more sensible and feeling tone and manner than is usual in churches of much higher pretensions. Wastdale Head is a very small hamlet in Wastdale, in Cumberland. It contains but few houses, and these of an unassuming character. It is in the midst of a deep and lonely valley, surrounded by scenery the most wild and grand. Lingmell, the Screes, Yewbarrow, and other mountains, rear their steep sides and huge backs and peaks around its wilderness of waters, which is often too stormy for a boat, and is so deep that it never freezes.

SADLER'S WELLS THEATRE.

We have already expressed our opinion of the impressive performance of Miss Laura Addison, as Isabella, in "Measure for Measure," at Sadler's Wells. (See our Journal, Nov. 7.) We have, this week, engraved "the Prison Scene," with portrait of Miss Addison, and that of Mr. Phelps, the Duke, in the monastic disguise. Both performers have, during the past week, repeated their enactment of these fine Shakspearean characters with increased effect.

"Miss Addison" is the daughter of a gentleman of independent property, resident in the metropolis. In childhood, she was of retiring manners, and thoughtful disposition; at the age of thirteen, she penned several poems and essays; and when seventeen, happening to meet with a "Life of Mrs. Siddons," the young reader was so charmed with the records of the genius of our great tragic actress, that she resolved upon the histrionic profession, and at once began to study the principal female characters in Shakspeare.

Contrary to the wishes of her friends, she applied to various managers, and, at length, succeeded in obtaining an engagement at Newcastle, where she appeared, under the assumed name of Addison, in November, 1842. From Newcastle, Miss Addison proceeded to York, where she was enthusiastically received. Next year, she sustained the principal characters in tragedy, comedy, and farce, in Worcester, Shrewsbury, and Coventry; and was pronounced the greatest favourite that had ever appeared on that circuit. From thence, Miss Addison went to Birmingham, Glasgow, Dublin, and Edinburgh; and, from the latter place, removed to Sadler's Wells, where this gifted actress has already earned the "golden opinion" of the metropolitan critics.



PARIS FASHIONS FOR DECEMBER.

FASHIONS FOR DECEMBER.

Till within three or four years past, there were regular and stated periods for the apparition of novelties in dress; at Easter and All Saints' the fashions for the ensuing months always took their most decided form, the innovations in the interim being but trifling. Matters are now altered. The Parisian fashionables, who imitate us in other respects, as we imitate them in dress, are by degrees adopting the English custom of remaining in their châteaux at least till December. They then return to Paris, to display their toilettes until the month of June, when they again disappear from the gay city. It is not, therefore, till December that anything positive can be known respecting the winter novelties, and costume presents, till then, should the weather be cold, a curious mixture of winter wraps and the remains of the lighter dress of early autumn.

As regards that most important article of walking costume, the bonnet, the material remains much the same as in past years—velvet, terry velvet, and satin trimmed with velvet, are still worn almost exclusively. But the shape bears no resemblance whatever to the Pamelas of last year; bonnets are now rather rounded at the temples, and closed at the chin, so that the curls lie inside them, and are, in this respect, similar to those worn several years ago. This shape, being less striking than the Pamela, is probably destined to more general favour, and a more prolonged existence. The curtain is again full. Ostrich feathers are much worn on these bonnets—they must be of the same colour, as also the ribbon. Real fashion invariably condemns such bizarre and showy mixtures of colours, as we occasionally see adopted; as, for example, a dark velvet trimmed with light-coloured ribbons and feathers, &c., for simplicity is always one of the greatest essentials of good taste. When feathers are not worn on a morning bonnet, velvet of the same colour and black lace must form its only ornament. For a toilette of more ceremony, a novelty of the best taste is a bonnet of sky-blue, with cross-way folds of terry velvet, surrounded with three little folds of blue satin. On the right side are placed two blue ostrich feathers, one of which is twisted round the bonnet en couronne. Inside the bonnet is worn a wreath of shaded brown leaves, confined by a light blonde. A pink capote, composed of three puffings of pink satin, and three of terry velvet, alternating with each other, is a style of coiffure quite Parisian and very coquettish. On the right side should be a bow of satin, of terry velvet, and point d'Alençon mixed, thus covering the curtain; and inside, pink satin ribbon, surrounded with terry velvet, forming large bows à l'Italienne.

The most approved style of head-dress, for the theatre, as well as for full dress, appears to be the turban, which will now be universally worn by very young married ladies, although hitherto only considered as becoming to those of a more advanced age. The Sainte Cecile Turban, in violet-coloured velvet, is made of a foundation of gold brocade, embroidered with a silver pattern, [illegible] draperies commencing on each side as high as the temples. The Zorraïde Turban, in white gauze, studded with gold, forming, above the forehead, a roll of gold, from which float two streamers of white gauze of unequal length, which fall on each side in the Moorish style, and terminate in a tassel of spun gold.

The spirit of flattery has led the milliners at Paris to bestow the name of the Infanta, Louisa Fernanda, and of her young husband, on different articles of dress. There is, for instance, the Coiffure Montpensier, which consists of gold blonde, [illegible] cut in the form of a large star, and studded with cerise velvet flowers. Above the star are three folds of cerise velvet fixed on each side of the head with a grenade of gold. The folds appear to continue under the blonde, and finish in two small barbes of the same material, of unequal length, and covered with gold fringe.

As regards dresses, the interminable variety of forms and trimmings will not permit us to enter much into many details on this subject. The most important piece of information we can give is, that the skirts are worn as full as ever, but that, on account of the trimmings (for all dresses, except those for evening wear, are made en redingotte, and trimmed in front), the folds should be carried more backward. The skirt forms somewhat of a train behind, and is shorter in front. The boddice is made quite high, and closed; or else opening en revers, or only sufficiently to display a small jabot. The sleeves of morning dresses are made quite tight at the top, but at the wrist slightly gathered into a cuff. For more habillé dresses the sleeves are still made with revers mousquetaires, and sufficiently open to show beneath an aramis sleeve with a second revers of lace. The principal trimmings consist of grelots, gimps, large buttons à la Fronde, and narrow velvets embroidered à la soutache.

We must now proceed to the description of out-of-door coverings, which are this year much varied in form, and in many cases most elegant. First we will mention the Mantlet Jeune Fille, made in velvet, in Court green, in blue Nemours, oreille d'ours, or black. It is rounded behind, but without defining the figure, high to the throat, and divided at the side; thus forming long lappets in front, rounded and trimmed, like almost all the mantlets worn this year, with black lace. The Mantlet Duchesse is also made in velvet, and forms into a point both behind and in front; the sleeves are opened and laced; the whole is trimmed with gimps and fringes. The Manteau Irène, intended principally for walking attire, is quite plain, rather tight over the shoulders, and enlarging towards the bottom; the sleeves forming en sabots. The Haydée Mantelet is in the highest vogue. It resembles that we have just mentioned, except that the sleeves are cut à la Grecque, and looped up with fancy buttons.

By aid of the elegant work, "Les Modes Parisiennes," we are enabled to anticipate the fashions for the coming month, in the annexed Illustration. In one of the costumes, the robe is of pearl-coloured silk, with satin stripes of cerise; and the bertha of rich lace. In the second costume, the robe is of lace; the coiffure of black lace, &c. The several articles may be obtained of Madame Frederick, 40, Albemarle-street, Correspondent of "Les Modes Parisiennes."

DESTRUCTIVE FIRE AT GRAVESEND.

IN part of our impression last Saturday, we gave an account of another very serious fire, which occurred at Gravesend early on the previous morning, and consumed forty houses and numerous other buildings. We repeat the account, with the addition of such particulars as have since transpired.

Singular to say, the locality of the fire was the same as the former fires, West-street, extending along the water side from the Town Pier towards the Rosherville Gardens. The fire was first observed from a body of smoke hovering over the premises occupied by Mr. Garratt, grocer, adjacent to the Pier Hotel, at the corner of West-street. The inmates having been got out in safety, steps were taken to bring the Corporation engines, which were soon on the spot, into operation; but the defective state of the water mains enabled the flames to extend themselves to the buildings on each side. The military at Tilbury Fort were mustered by the commanding officer of that fortress, who with every promptitude forwarded them to the assistance of the townspeople. Their efforts, however, were of little avail in stopping the conflagration; for at least four hours the wind, which was blowing a violent gale, completely baffled their operations, and increased the magnitude of the fire to a frightful degree. The scene by four o'clock was most awful; the flames had crossed the street and seven or eight houses were in flames, besides the whole of the premises from the Town Pier to considerably below the Talbot Inn, which was also amongst the number. From the south side of West-street the fire raged upwards, in the direction of the centre of the town, destroying in its course a great number of low dwelling houses in the various courts. These were principally tenanted by poor fishermen, hawkers, labourers, &c., &c. In one court there was no thorough[illegible] approach in West-street, and that being stopped by the dense body of fire, the greatest anxiety was entertained for the safety of the poor creatures who tenanted it. The police and soldiers, however, bravely exposed themselves in rescuing them, in which they succeeded, by dragging them in at the back windows of the adjacent houses. It was reported, notwithstanding, that one or two persons were missing. Happily this is not the fact. No check to the fire was effected until near seven o'clock in the morning. At ten o'clock, however, an immense body of fire existed in every part of the ruins.

The principal portion of the houses that were erected on the site of the fire in West-street are consumed, together with both sides of the street from High street to King-street. Amongst the buildings destroyed or materially injured, we may mention the Pier Hotel, Talbot Inn, Punch Bowl Tavern, and all the intermediate wharfs and buildings.

With respect to the origin, suspicions are entertained that it was not the result of accident. The chief bulk of the property is insured in the Sun, Phœnix, Exchange, Licensed Victuallers', and Kent Fire Offices.

The following is the report made by the firemen of the damage done:

W[illegible]REET.—Mr. [illegible]t, grocer, house burned down, stock in trade and fixtures de[illegible] Mr Pettit's eating-house, destroyed, and contents consumed. Mr. Gould, the Pope's [illegible] destroyed. Mr. Dixon, beer shop, burned down. Mr Lambert, dining-rooms, [illegible] Mr. Carlin's, hatter and general dealer, destroyed. Mr. Goodsell, hairdresser, [illegible] [illegible]wo houses burnt down b[illegible]ging to Mr Lenton and Mr King
W[illegible]EET.—Mr Beard, butcher, [illegible]ards, grocer, ditto. Mr W. Hi[illegible]r, greengrocer, ditto. Mr W[illegible] Mr. G. Rackstr[illegible] The Trinity Office, destroyed. Mr. Roxberr[illegible]onger, ditto [illegible]rton, fishmonger, ditto
NEW COURT. Nine small h[illegible] occupied by Messrs Jones, B[illegible]well, Brinckley, Wake[illegible]l, Noble, Ealing, and [illegible]
CHAPEL-LANE.—Two houses [illegible]

Several of the owners were insured in the Kent, Atlas, and other offices.

We are happy to say that no lives were lost.

The loss is estimated at from £20 000 to £30,000.

Much other damage has been occasioned by hasty removal of goods, furniture, &c. It is not, however, of much amount.

When the ruins were sufficiently cooled to permit any person to pass over them, not the slightest vestige of a street remained not one wall stood; the bricks, mortar, and stone of not less than twenty houses in the eastern part of West-street, being all turned into the carriage-way, which was completely choked up by them. Nothing remained standing except clumps of chimneys, most dangerous to pass, and tottering with the wind. It is almost unnecessary to state that the whole of the stock in the several houses is completely destroyed, and that the poor creatures in the alleys leading from West-street, several of whom are burned out, are deprived of house and home, and left consequently dependent upon the humanity of their fellow townsmen.

Fortunately, the Town Pier is uninjured, and in the direction of the High-street the fire was providentially stayed.

The greatest dissatisfaction prevails in the town, from the fact of the fire having, as in the previous case, made such fearful havoc before it was got u[illegible] In a great measure that may be accounted for by the large quantity of timber in the premises. In West-street there were not fewer tha[illegible] burnt, the major portion of which consisted of wood; whilst there were but two or three brick buildings in the same street that were totally destroyed. The Pier Hotel, and Nos. 83 and 84, High street, were also brick built, and the fire was at first confined to the top part of these premises. On Friday night (last week), however, owing to the great body of heat in the place, a fresh outbreak occurred in their Pier Hotel, and Loder, the engineer, who was left in charge of the place, was obliged to break open the front door, and set the engines again to work, and it was owing only to the extraordinary exertions of the police and firemen that the work of destruction has not again proved most disastrous. To add to the misfortune, whilst the engines were working on Friday night, the main water-pipe in the district burst, so that for the last three hours no water could be obtained from that source.

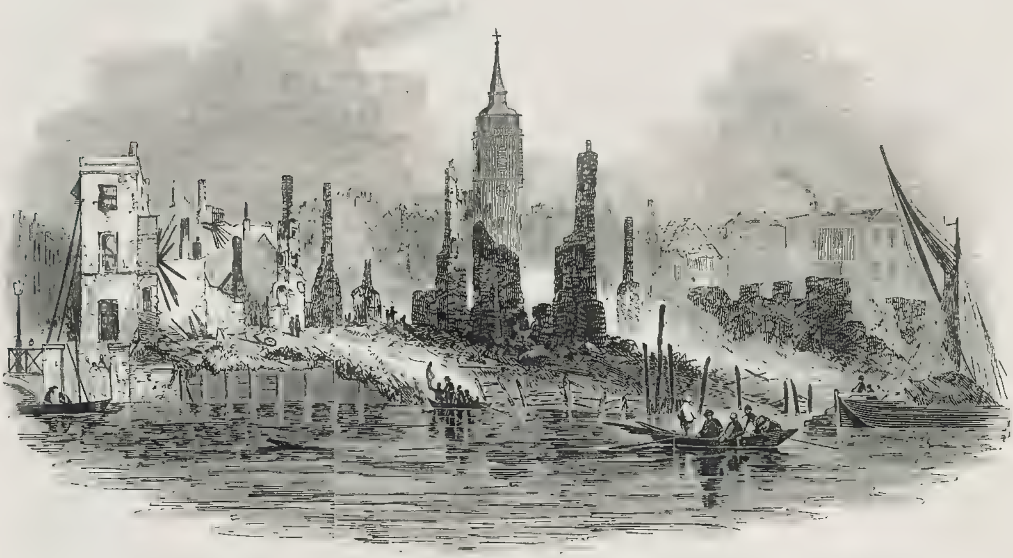
[illegible]eport of the surveyors, it appears that the actual damage [illegible]s totally destroyed, 30; warehouses and sheds burnt down, 4; houses pulled down, 2; considerably damaged, 5; slightly damaged, &c., [illegible] total, 46.

The r[illegible]ent a most desolate appearance; they cover an enormous space of ground, West-street being entirely blocked up by the rubbish, filling the carriage-way several feet above the surface.

It is calculated that, by the three fires that have occurred in the town during the last three years, upwards of 100 houses and other premises have been destroyed, while the loss of property will be little short of £100,000.

A diligent inquiry has been made to endeavour to ascertain how the fire originated, but as yet without success.

On Wednesday, a numerous meeting of the inhabitants of Gravesend took place in the Town-hall, relative to the fire, when the following resolutions were [illegible] solved: That the several Acts of Parliament which appear to give [illegible] municipal and parochial authorities the means of making adequate provision, [illegible], the Local Acts of the 3rd and 4th Wm. IV., c. 90, and the 2nd and 3rd Vict., [illegible]8, be referred to the Town Council and the Commissioners of Pavements, with [illegible] of the inhabitants that they will, without loss of time, co[illegible] [illegible]tablishment of adequate and permanent means for the suppres[illegible] [illegible]: That the Fire Insurance Companies should be written to, and be requested to contribute towards the support of an efficient fire establishment."



RUINS AFTER THE RECENT FIRE AT GRAVESEND.—(SEE PRECEDING PAGE.)

THE BEY OF TUNIS.

The Bey of Tunis, Ahmed Pacha, arrived on Sunday, at one o'clock, in Paris, by a special train of the Orleans Railway. M. de Lagau, Consul-General of France at Tunis, after having preceded his Highness to Paris, had returned to Orleans to meet him. M. Desgranges, First Secretary Interpreter of the King, who was sent to Toulon to await the Bey's arrival, and to compliment him, and Colonel Thiéry, aide-de-camp to the Duke de Montpensier, charged by the King to attend the Bey during his stay in Paris, received him at the railway terminus with six of the Royal carriages, the servants being in dress liveries The Bey immediately proceeded to the Palace of the Elysée Bourbon, where apartments had been prepared for him and his suite. The Duke de Montpensier had proceeded to the Elysée Bourbon to receive the guests of the King and of France. The Bey, on seeing him, hurried from his carriage, and ran up to the young Prince, whom he tenderly embraced, and who, on his side, testified the joy which he felt at seeing the Bey in France, and all the satisfaction that the King would feel in thanking him in person for the splendid reception which he had given to three of his sons. The Prince afterwards conversed with the officers of the Bey, almost all of whom he had known at Tunis. Along the whole road from Toulon to Paris, Ahmed Pacha was received as a Sovereign; the authorities everywhere came to felicitate him, and guards of honour were everywhere given him. In all the towns he left considerable sums to the poor; and at Roanne, hearing of the late disasters, he ordered 50,000f. to be placed at the disposal of the authorities. In quitting his States, the Bey gave a proof of his humanity. In confiding to his cousin, Sidi Hamda, and to Saeb Tael, the Government of his Regency, he expressly forbade that any life should be taken away during his absence. Such an idea in an Eastern Sovereign is calculated to honour his reign; and, in consequence, when the Bey embarked on board the steamer which was to take him to France, a multitude of boats followed him out of the port of Goulette, with all the marks of deep regret. The Bey was himself deeply affected. Before going on board he had collected together his troops at Goulette to pass them in review. At the last moment, he took in his arms the colours of the different regiments, and with tears in his eyes, said—"I leave you, but it is for you that I go to France. We shall soon meet again."

The Bey was received, on Monday, at the Tuileries, by the King, surrounded by the whole of the Royal Family. In the vestibule, refreshments were presented to the Bey, after which he ascended the staircase, at the top of which the King's Aide-de-Camps were in waiting to conduct him to his Majesty, who, as a mark of delicate attention, received him in the family saloon. The King, in the uniform of a general officer, advanced to meet the Bey, and, before his Highness could speak, took him kindly by both hands, and in Italian expressed the pleasure he had in seeing him. The Bey used his own language, the Arabic, to express in grave and noble terms a devotion almost filial. This being interpreted by M. Desgranges, the King replied in French that he felt the greatest joy in seeing his Highness; assured him that he was in the presence of a friend; that France had hitherto covered Tunis with protection, and would continue to defend it against every danger with which it might hereafter be threatened. The Bey expressed his thanks, and particularly the gratification the King had afforded him by sending three of his sons to visit him. His Highness was then presented by the King to the Queen, the Duchess of Orleans, the Count de Paris, whom he embraced with great affection, and the Princesses. On Tuesday the Bey of Tunis visited the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

The Palais d' Elysée Bourbon was built in 1718, after the designs of Molet, for the Count d'Evreux. It was afterwards purchased and occupied by Madame de Pompadour, mistress of Louis XV. Whilst in her possession, the palace-garden was enlarged by adding to it a piece of ground from the Champs Elysées. At the death of Madame de Pompadour, Louis XV. bought the property of the Marquis de Marigny as a residence for ambassadors extraordinary.

In 1773, it came into the possession of M. Beaujon, the famous banker, who enlarged and embellished it in magnificent style. On his death, it was purchased by the Duchess of Bourbon, who occupied it till 1790. In 1792, it became national property; and, during the most stormy period of the Revolution, the Palace was used as the Government Printing-office. In 1800, it was sold, and the grounds converted into a garden for public amusement. Murat bought it in 1804, and occupied it until his departure for Naples. It then again became the property of the Government, and was a favourite residence of the Emperor, till after the events of 1814. In 1814 and 1817, it was inhabited by the Emperor of Russia, and afterwards by the Duke of Wellington. Napoleon returned to it from the Isle of Elba; and all the drama of the Cents Jours was acted within its walls. In 1816, Louis XVIII. gave it to the Duke of Berry; and, on his assassination, it became the property of the Duke of Bordeaux. It now belongs to the French Crown, and is used for the reception of Princes étrangers.

GUARDIANS AND JURIES.

CONGRATULATIONS may be offered to Somerset House upon the disclosures of parochial management lately made in Marylebone and St. Pancras. The Commissioners, never popular, are at present somewhat more under a cloud than ever; and, while the New Law and its administrators are everywhere denounced, it must be a consolation to them to be able to point to parishes still under the old system, in which, cases as bad or worse than that of Andover, have come to light: many a tale of shipwreck tells us that even disgusting food is a shade better than "death from starvation;" men "did eat strange flesh" at Andover; but, at Marylebone, it is possible that human beings may die without food altogether. Now, as Marylebone is almost a pattern parish—a part of the Metropolis, in the very centre of wealth and intelligence—the Commissioners may derive from the calamity that has occurred in it, no small consolation. A foil is often useful; and there is great truth in the axiom that—

> ———not to be worst,
> Stands in some rank of praise.

The history of the cases that have drawn such verdicts from Coroners' Juries, and the evidence of what applicants for relief have to suffer before that relief is given—sometimes, before they are told that it is refused—confirm us in our belief that the thick-and-thin denouncers of the New Poor Law, overlook or forget the miseries that are possible under the old one. What is left of the former system still, from time to time, proves to us that it is not altogether the regime of patriarchal kindness and consideration which its eulogisers have represented it. In any law that can be framed for the relief of pauperism, it will prove,

> Whate'er is best administered is best.

Under both systems a great deal of suffering and oppression is possible; under both, much is needlessly inflicted, for which there is no necessity in the Law itself, but is caused by the imperfect arrangements of those who execute it.

We do not believe that the Poor Law, the far-famed Statute of Elizabeth, was passed from a charitable motive at all. It was a matter of police and necessity, to save property from plunder, and society from disorganisation and violence. The Crown had seized the lands of the Church, and the nobles had bought or begged most of them from the Crown: the old source of supply upon which the poor depended was cut off; and the destitute were driven either to starve quietly—like Louisa Mordaunt—if they were meek and unobtrusive, or to beg, or to steal: agriculture did not absorb them. If they did starve with due resignation, the State—as it does now—took no notice of them; they were buried somehow, and there was an end of it. But if we want to know how the "wisdom of our ancestors" treated poverty when it was brought before them by some overt act—the begging and stealing, as aforesaid—why, a perusal of the statutes on this subject passed by the "man-minded" Queen, will completely cure any one of all sentimentalism on the point. All the horrors that ever Inquest or Commission have raked up from the oppressions of the most stony-hearted "Board" are kindness itself compared with the treatment of the poor that was ordinary and common in what some deluded people still call the "good old times." Mendicants were branded, imprisoned, scourged, mutilated; by one statute, a third repetition of the offence (asking alms) was made a capital crime, and punished as such, too; for our ancestors were by no means squeamish in the matter of hanging and beheading; it was the era of axes and blocks for the noble, the stake for the conscientious or free of thought, and the gallows for the "rascal many," as they were called. In such an age, was it likely that pauperism received the silken and soft consideration which dreamers have asserted it did? Not at all; the object evidently was to exterminate it: the "poor Toms" were "whipped trom tything to tything;" and, bad as the Bumbles of our day may be, they are not authorised to outrage human nature by the act which made Shakspeare call on the "rascal beadle" to "hold his bloody hand." The whole system was one of terror and savage violence, as if men were perversely poor from choice, and could be frightened out of it! Alas! the causes of poverty lie far deeper; if it is an offence againt Society, it is mostly an unwilling and involuntary one, which all would readily cease to commit—if society could only show them the way! The exterminating statutes did not effect it, and the error begun to be perceived. Property, with all its terrible weapons against the destitute, was not safe, and it was resolved to part with a little of it that the rest might be enjoyed in quiet and safety. The idea was a wise one, and it has proved for England a fortunate one; but we cannot recognise it as either benevolent or charitable. It is State prudence, and little more: what is given is exactly as much as cannot be safely withheld. The constant endeavour is to make it as little as possible; and, by defects in the details of management, that little is given in the worst manner—the process of receiving a relief is in itself almost a punishment.

But even with our eyes open to present defects, we cannot rush to the opposite conclusion, and maintain that all former Poor Laws—all old systems of management—were good and unexceptionable The worst abuses may be found in parishes that are not Unions, and whose workhouses are not the denounced "Bastilles." Marylebone and St. Pancras manage their poor under their own local acts. The Commissioners, so far from controlling their business, do not know how it is done; they have just requested information on the point. Yet these independent parishes have figured before the public lately by no means with advantage. The defects are palpable enough in both—a too indiscriminate way of disposing of all applications, imperfect inspection, slow and careless distribution of what is given; all of which may be accounted for by the simple fact that the officials are overworked. It is physically impossible for the small staff of inspectors and relieving officers of Marylebone to deal with such an immense mass of poor. The arrangements appear almost ludicrously insufficient. One old man is appointed to inspect eight hundred permanent relief cases every month, besides being sent specially to visit cases out of the parish. He is weak, and "a flight of stairs" discourages him; he "has to go up and down so many." No doubt; for paupers do not keep shops on the ground floors, but have to mount to garrets. So, though bound to see the persons relieved, he does not see them, but gives his tickets to be given to them by somebody else. Not seeing them, he knows nothing of them; as the assistant overseer depends on the inspector, he knows nothing either; and thus things go on till some more than usually afflicting case occurs; and then all is regret, and inquiry, and consternation. Resolutions and reprimands, and a most elaborate shutting of the stable-door after the other part of the proverb has been exemplified; the said shutting not attended with the real precautions that can alone prevent the whole process having to be gone through again.

The Marylebone Guardians, for instance, call in and "reprimand" two of their officers. Will that give an old worn-out man the physical strength to do his duty? Will it enable the relieving officer to know in future the condition and character of applicants, that the "test" of "the House" may be applied as the law intended it, to the idle and profligate; not to the industrious strugglers, to whom work would be a blessing? The wholesale forcing of everybody into the "House" is the greatest defect in our mode of dealing with poverty. It does not follow that because people are being drawn near the brink of pauperism, they are to be pushed right into it as a remedy. But to enquire into facts needs more time and labour than a handful of men can bestow, when they have to deal with thousands.

Again, it is proved that applicants for relief often wait from nine in the morning till five in the afternoon for a loaf of bread! Surely a mere distribution might be rather more speedy. In all kinds of business, men proportion the number of their workers to the amount of work to be done; have parishes any exemption? Could not the enormous wealth of Marylebone find the means of distributing its casual relief a little more quickly? Seven or eight hours' waiting, in the keen cold of winter, for a loaf of bread, is a cruel mockery of the word "relief;" we wonder it does not kill by scores, instead of units. He gives twice who gives quickly; and besides, as the cost of the boon is the same, whether issued in one hour or ten, there is only the additional labour to be provided; could it not be done? Why, the very expenses incurred by one of these dreadful cases ought to be an inducement to a little more liberality; a fraction of what has to be spent after a death of this kind would have averted the catastrophe. First, there is the Coroners' fees, and the loss to the Jury, who are taken from their occupations, sometimes for two days. Then, there are meetings of Vestries to abuse the Guardians and officials for neglect; then, meetings of the Guardians to defend themselves, and call on their officers to explain; the explanation is ignorance of the facts, and proof that everything was done "as usual." All this takes up the time of twenty or thirty respectable gentlemen for two days or more, not one of whom but would rather be attending to his own business, or more pleasantly occupied elsewhere. If summoned as witnesses in a Court of Law, they would rate their time at a money-value of at least a guinea per day; would it not be worth while to try and prevent some of this, by a larger disbursement for the means of getting through the work better?

Boards of Guardians are not worse than any assembly of men of the same number. Individually they wish to do the best; but they get wedded to routine, and are obliged to see too exclusively through the spectacles of their underlings. These know that any exhibition of generosity with the parish funds or loaves would get them the character of weak and inefficient officers; so they err on the safe and sordid side, and refuse all they can, till "the Board" sits again. In the interval death ends the application; and an assembly of rich and Christian gentlemen are charged by implication with having caused the starvation of a fellow-being. Nothing but better arrangements can prevent this from occurring again and again. It is the fault of the New Poor Law that its machinery is too vast and too slow in movement to meet the need of such speedy operators as hunger and disease. In the rural districts death may be on the threshold of the peasant, and the relieving officer a dozen miles off, with a week to elapse before "the Board" can make an order. In enormous parishes like Marylebone, a similar defect is caused by the great number of cases, and the few officers employed to deal with them. And the remedy ought to be insisted on by the rate-payers—all the orders of Boards and the edicts of Poor Law Commissioners to the contrary, notwithstanding.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

LAYING THE FOUNDATION-STONE OF A NEW CHURCH IN MANCHESTER

On Wednesday, the foundation-stone of a fifth Church to be erected by the Manchester Ten Churches Association, was laid by the Ven. the Archdeacon. The site of the new Church is situate in the midst of a large and poor population, in Butler-street, Bradford-road. The Church is to be a large one, and is to be called St. Philip's. There was a large attendance of ladies and gentlemen who take an active part in the promotion of Church principles in this town.

Shortly after eleven o'clock, Henry Houldsworth, Esq., President of the Association, presented the Archdeacon with a silver trowel, and took occasion to address the company on the advantages of church accommodation for the poor.

The Archdeacon briefly replied; after which, the stone was laid with the usual ceremonies. The stone having been deposited,

The Rev. Hugh Stowel addressed the audience at some length; and, after an appropriate prayer, the proceedings terminated.

OXFORD. Nov. 30.

Balliol College.—This morning, Messrs James Riddell, B.A., and Edwin Palmer, B.A., were made Actual Fellows; and, on Saturday, Mr. Henry M. Oxenham, from Harrow School, and Mr. Henry Gordan, from Shrewsbury School, were elected Scholars on the open foundation; and, at the same time, [illegible] and Pindar were nominated Exhibitioners, the former on the Worcester, and the latter on the Somersetshire foundation.

The Army in India.—The 16th Lancers landed in India in 1822; of the numbers who then landed only one officer, Colonel M'Dowall, and three or four men, remain.

Important Geological Discovery.—A discovery is said to have just been made at Natchez, which, if confirmed, will set all the geological world in a stir. On the authority of a private letter from Philadelphia, it is alleged that Mr. Dickeson, of that city, has exhumed, near Natchez, on the Mississippi, from the depth of 100 feet below the surface, a fossil human bone. The fossil was examined at a meeting held in the house of Dr. S. G. Morton, of Philadelphia, the eminent ethnologist. Professor Agassiz, Mr. George R. Gliddon, and several other palæontologists and archæologists, were present. The fossil was pronounced to be one of the pelvic bones of a man between the ages of sixteen and twenty years. It was found amongst other fossilized remains of the megatherium, megalonyx, and other primeval creatures. The specimen has been deposited in the museum belonging to the Academy of Natural Sciences at Philadelphia. Hitherto the remains of men have been found only in the lacustrine, peat-bog, and other modern deposits, and in conjunction with the fossil remains of animals now existing. If this, however, be correct, we must carry him back to the era of the ossiferous gravels; and though these deposits are of very various antiquity, yet the bones of [illegible] ear to fix the era as bordering on the tertiary formation, and [illegible] the present temperate and frigid zones. It [illegible] asion much discussion and speculation, for it [illegible] infinitely more ancient than has hitherto been imagined.—Edinburgh Register.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

PARISIANA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Paris, Wednesday.

Nothing is more singular to observe than that, whilst political men are striving to separate England and France, all circumstances physical and moral are bringing them daily closer together. The Government post here brings you news two days old, whilst at Tortoni's you hourly have intelligence of less than thirty hours date, from gentlemen who have run across "the herring-pond," on that business which forms the real "mutuality of nations," and will ultimately render headlong rivalry, except in commerce, impossible. Still are you startled when you hear, in the above rendezvous of epicurism and pleasure, persons observing to their neighbours "yesterday morning I was in London!" In spite of themselves official men are obliged to follow the current; and dining a few days since at the same table as M. Laclave Laplagne, the Finance Minister, he told us that the new French Government packets, from Dover to Calais, would be ready in five weeks; and that the engine builders were to pay forty thousand francs forfeit if the new steam-boats did not beat the English on that station by ten minutes. Now, as the present French malles take four hours, and your boats on that station, such as the Garland, cross in an hour and a half, this rivality of Government amour propre will be another item of progression in the work of civilization.

Whilst such is the silent course and the irresistible logic of engineering, about to operate on international affairs, nothing can be more personally hostile than the state of the two Administrations and the two Courts of France and England. That most affable nobleman, Lord Normanby, so ready to dispense all that hospitality and those courtesies which characterise the discharge of his office, is, for the present, as isolated here as he would be were he Ambassador at Constantinople during the Bairam, or the yearly visitation of the plague. Beyond two angry encounters weekly at the French Foreign Office, an occasional solemn and stately appearance at some Court fête, and evening visits, sub rosa, to the universal political jobber's (Princess Lieven) côterie, he scarce sees a Frenchman of any eminence. Vain is their longing after the exquisite "flesh-pots" of his inimitable cook, M. Louis; the fear of personal altercation under such delicate circumstances as the present closes his portals to almost all but his countrymen, barring the dragoman of M. Thiers, and the Constitutionnel; for you are aware, no doubt, that the English Embassy in Paris has now, for the first time, a French semi-official organ, and that M. Thiers himself wields the pen once more in the office of that journal from which he and his colleagues indited the decree which, in 1830, overthrew the ancient Dynasty of Bourbons, and in 1840 hurled a war of words against England. There are, however, few Englishmen in Paris to enjoy your Ambassador's hospitality. Last week there was a dinner with two or three noblemen just arrived, with no little curiosity, inquiring as the "whereabouts" of Mr. Lumley, the proprietor of your Italian Opera, and his Lordship's frequent guest. On Sunday last his Lordship added to the above dinner circle the authors of "Paul Pry" and of "Pickwick," the former of whom is now a resident in Paris; the other is lately arrived.

To judge of the singular position of the present English Ambassador in Paris, after the protracted delusions of the long-vaunted entente cordiale, you should have beheld him at the recent theatrical performance at Court, given in honour, on the one hand of the Duchess de Montpensier, on the other of the Bey of Tunis. The coldness, the distant ceremony of all parties was most marked, and strikingly marked—above all, when this isolated instance was contrasted with the incessant shaking of hands, and incurvations of the spine, of his astute Majesty Louis Philippe, to the crowd present. All eyes and all observance were concentrated upon the Bey of Tunis—himself a man of the most pleasing countenance and agreeable manners, and surrounded by attendants, excepting old Chevalier Ruffo, his Prime Minister, remarkable for elegant manners and noble bearing. The Bey, like all Orientals are accustomed to do, was striving, all the time the performance lasted, to maintain his dignity by not looking astonished, or even impressed in the least by the wonder on the stage; although, occasionally, when Carlotta Grisi threw one of her marvellous somersets, there was a flashing of the eye, and a twitching of the features, which spoke out the internal sensations of the semi-civilised Ottoman. His Highness did not think it necessary to restrain so much his sensations when he contemplated the Beauties of the Court—above all, that galaxy of stars, Louis Philippe's daughters-in-law. It was not, however, the youngest, the Duchess de Montpensier, who fixed his attention, although she has that pale bistre sallowness of complexion, and those "liquid eyes" which characterise the Arabian blood of Spain. On the contrary, the young Duchess appeared to disappoint his Highness as much as she has done our good Parisians, who expected, as real gobemouches as they are, to behold the very incarnation of the portraits, official or literary, drawn by Bresson, Dumas, Theophile Gautier, and other personages [illegible] by profession. The Bey's eyes were fixed [illegible] on the [illegible] Duchess de Nemours during every entre acte; he looked at her as if he was going to devour her like the ogre in the fable; and, certainly, never did the star of the Coburgs—the most fortunate of any family in this or in any past age—shine with more dazzling lustre than in the person of the beautiful Duchess on this occasion. She had adopted for the nonce a new coiffure, now all the rage with the ladies in Paris, called the polka head-dress, which consists principally in tresses of pearls. These, interwoven with her beautiful hair, so luxuriant and of such a golden tint of auburn, combined, with her exquisite features and her large soft blue eyes, to make her look more "like an angel on a visit below" than a terrestrial being—at least in the eyes of the Bey. Nothing is talked of but the Bey; and the eagerness to be invited to the approaching grand fête of M. Guizot, at the Hotel des Affaires Etrangers, is beyond all precedent, at least as regards official galas, in Paris. It is to be given on Friday, [illegible] in honour of the Bey. [illegible] hundred persons are invited. As you pass the Boulevards, hundreds of hammers and saws at their discordant work attract your attention to M. Guizot's residence, where the workmen have been engaged for a week past in covering both courtyards with magnificent awnings, so that four or five carriages at once may deliver themselves of their gay burthens.

As everything was destined to combine to increase the mutual asperity of the two Courts of England and France, it is doubtful whether the English Ambassador will consent to be present; whilst the Ottoman Ambassador is of course excluded. The Bey is a rebel vassal of his liege lord the Padishah—the creation of France. Treated here as an independent sovereign, he is not recognised by England, to which his expressed intention of paying a visit has experienced a terrible rebuff—since it has been intimated to him that if he came to London he must be presented to Queen Victoria by the Ottoman Ambassador—an unpleasant condition of Royal intercourse, which, you will remember, a much greater personage, Ibrahim Pacha, had to endure even at the Court of Louis Philippe.

Amongst the minor subjects which excite attention in Paris, is the affair of Ponsard's new tragedy "Agnes de Merania," and its performance, which has summoned from all parts literary amateurs to behold it, and put every idler on the tip-toe of curiosity. This is not astonishing amongst my volatile and excitable countrymen, when on the eve of the performance of a drama, whose success is to decide whether France may boast of a new poet, confirmed in his position on the highest pedestal of fame, the Law Courts decree that whichever of the two actresses enacts the heroine, the author and the lessee must pay her rival 50,000 francs penalty.

FRANCE.

The National publishes the following manifesto, issued by the members of the Central Committee of the Polish Democratic Society, in the names of 1462 of their fellow countrymen, against the violation of the independence of Cracow:—

> The assassins of Poland have thrown down the gauntlet to Europe, by tearing up the treaty of Vienna, on the last ruins of our country.
> Democratic France, faithful to her duties, inspired by the holy revolution accomplished by their brethren, has armed herself in her rights, and has taken up the challenge. Thanks be to her for it. She has not failed towards Europe, and Europe will not fail towards her.
> In the name of democratic Poland, and there is no other, we bring to France the [illegible] alliance of a people which has never failed in its duties to its allies.
> You have seen Poland protest in arms on a hundred fields of battle; you will see it again; she prepares herself for fresh struggles, and this last attack on her, by causing her efforts to be redoubled, will hasten her deliverance.
> The treaty of Vienna no longer remains to Europe; that part of spoliation which was never binding on Poland, has been destroyed by its very authors. In its place will arise a more powerful alliance of people, which nothing will rend asunder.

A deplorable accident happened on Friday night (last week) on the Orleans Railway. M. Moumerqué, inspector of the traction on the line, was on the locomotive of a goods train coming to Paris, when the engine driver recommended him to place himself in a waggon, but he refused, saying that he wished to superintend everything himself, as he was the responsible person. He accordingly remained on the locomotive, leaning against the rail. When the train arrived at Sablons, it was discovered that M. Moumerqué had disappeared, and on an engine being sent back to seek him, the body of the unfortunate gentleman was found lying on the line, with the head completely severed from it. He was only thirty-two years of age.

The Débats contains an interesting extract of a letter from London, supposed to be written by Count Jarnac. It states that Lord Palmerston had despatched the protest of the British Government against the occupation of Cracow, to Lord Ponsonby, at Vienna. "In this document, of sufficient length, and written in dry and cold language," says the Débats:—"Lord Palmerston argues on the assumption that the usurpation of Cracow is as yet but a project, and he exerts himself to demonstrate the mischief (inconvenance) of such a measure. He subsequently discusses the two questions of 'right' and of 'necessity.' On the question of right, he establishes, by reference to treaties, that the articles agreed to solemnly by eight Powers could not be modified or annulled by three of them. Upon the question of necessity, Lord Palmerston does not admit the solution which the Northern Courts wished should be adopted. That three of the most powerful States of Europe should invoke necessity as an excuse for destroying the existence of a poor little republic whose population does not number 130,000 souls, is not to be admitted. The Powers complain that Cracow had 'become a focus of conspiracy and political intrigues.' But, even admitting the reality of that fact, two suppositions present themselves—either those conspirators were natives of the republic, or they came from abroad. In the second case, it is not Cracow that is to be blamed, but the Powers themselves, for their territory encloses on all sides that of the republic. In the first case, is it possible to believe that a city like Cracow would refuse three Powers, like Prussia, Russia, and Austria, to suppress conspiracies, and to put an end to those intrigues of which those Powers would have, in that case, so just a subject to complain? And, if it had the folly to refuse, what difficulty could those Powers find if obliged to do justice to themselves, within the limit of treaties? Such is nearly, it is said, the protest of the British Minister for Foreign Affairs. A copy of this document was likewise forwarded to Lord Normanby, to be communicated to M. Guizot."

The mail coach from Paris to Limoges was stopped on the afternoon of the 24th ult., between Orleans and La Ferté-Saint-Aubin. Three highwaymen rushed at the horses' heads, and endeavoured to compel the courier to descend from his seat and to give them the keys of the mail boxes. The courier replied by cocking a brace of pistols, and threatening to shoot the first man through the head who should attempt to touch the coach. An officer of rank, who happened to be the only passenger in the mail, and who was well armed, joined the courier in his threats against the highwaymen. Having met a different reception from what they expected, the highwaymen fled and the mail continued its journey.

The high price of provisions in France continues to lead to serious rioting. A very serious disturbance took place on the 24th ult. at Chateaurenault. Towards one o'clock in the afternoon, notwithstanding the presence of a brigade of gendarmerie, the corn-market was invaded by a body of 500 or 600 persons, who commenced selling by auction the sacks of wheat in the corn stores at 23f. for twelve bushels. M. Pesson, the Mayor of Chateaurenault, hastened to the scene of disturbance, and endeavoured to persuade the multitude to desist. But all his efforts were in vain, and the sale by auction continued. Quarrels, however, soon began amongst the buyers. The crowd next rushed upon the sacks of wheat, divided the corn, and carried it off without payment, notwithstanding the exertions of the gendarmes. The rioters next repaired to the dwelling-houses of two persons accused of having purchased corn on commission, but they were fortunately absent from home, and thus they escaped the contemplated violence. A body of troops having arrived in the meantime, sixteen of the most daring of the rioters were captured, and order was restored. The market which was held at Azay-le-Rideau on the following day, was disturbed in the same manner as that of Chateaurenault. A serious decline in the price of wheat had already taken place, when the multitude, not considering that sufficient, began to express their dissatisfaction. From menaces, the rioters proceeded to acts of violence. They took forcible possesssion of the corn stores, and commenced selling the wheat at two francs the bushel. They, moreover, compelled the Mayor to sell all the wheat in his stores at the same price, two francs the bushel.

Fresh corn riots have taken place at Chinon, (Indre et Loire). On Thursday, (last week), the new measures were broken and the corn-dealers were obliged to sell the wheat at a reduced rate. One of the ringleaders was arrested, but was quickly taken out of prison by the peasantry, armed with their rustic weapons. Ninety persons have been arrested, viz., 85 men and 5 women.

The Bey of Tunis, on Thursday evening (last week), went with all his suite to the Palace of St. Cloud, to be present at the representation of "Lucie," given by the performers of the Academy of Music. On Friday he visited the Central Depôt of Artillery, where he was received by General Gourgaud, President of the Committee of Artillery, and a numerous staff. His Highness witnessed, with much curiosity, some experiments which were made before him of the explosive cotton. In the evening, the Bey was present at the Theatre Français, at the representation of the tragedy of "Phèdre." The Bey of Tunis, on Saturday received a visit from the Duke de Montpensier. His Highness afterwards visited the Hotel de Ville, and expressed his admiration of the building. His Highness in particular expressed his wonder at seeing the different public monuments commenced by the Emperor Napoleon, such as the Arc de Triomphe, the Palais of the Quai d'Orsay, &c., and finished by Louis Philippe. In the East, this never takes place, the Sovereign who ascends the throne leaving as he finds it, finished or unfinished, the work of his predecessors. The Bey of Tunis, on Monday morning, visited Versailles, accompanied by General de Rumigny, one of the King's aides-de-camp, and M. Cailleux, director of the Royal Museums. After going through the palace for about an hour, the Bey found in one of the rooms breakfast prepared for him, of which his suite, the authorities of the town, and some other persons, amongst whom was M. Horace Vernet, partook. After breakfast, his Highness continued his inspection, and expressed the utmost admiration at all he saw. On retiring he left 10,000f. for the poor.

The evening semi-official journal, the Messager, announces that it will cease to appear at the end of the present month. It is said that this journal had a monthly subvention of 7,000 francs from the Government.

The Infante Don Henry of Spain has left Paris on his way to Madrid. The National says, previous to leaving Paris, Don Henry "addressed to Queen Christina, under the form of retractation, a humble supplication, written under the dictation of the Tuileries, in which he requested to be allowed to return to the favour of Queen Isabella, and the mother of his august sister-in-law." The National adds, that "the young Prince has thus disappointed all the hopes entertained of him, and his career is henceforth finished." It is believed at Paris that Louis Philippe has been using all the influence which he and his family possess over this weak young man to induce him to retract the protest against the marriage of the Infanta with the Duke de Montpensier, which was presented on the part of his Royal Highness to the Cortes. No public demonstration of success has yet been made, but it is believed that Louis Philippe has succeeded in his wishes.

SPAIN.

A letter from Mansera (Catalonia), of the [illegible]3th ult., in the Clamor Publico, says: "A person worthy of confidence, who passed a night at Navareles, saw a Carlist band, composed of 200 men, half of whom were armed with musketoons and the rest with Spanish rifles. They were [illegible] the [illegible] of all their band of partisans, as they were going across the country, without exercising any kind of vexatious proceeding. On their banner was inscribed, 'Carlos VI., the Constitution of 1837, and death to the partisans of the tributary system.'"

A letter from Vich, of the 14th ult., in the same journal, says: "Several Carlist bands are scouring this neighbourhood. Up to the present time all they have done is to call at country houses and demand rations."

We see from the Madrid papers that vast exertions are being made to return M. Salamanca for the city of Madrid, in opposition to M. Mon, the Minister for Finance, and it was conjectured that perhaps twelve or more Progressista members might find seats in the new Cortes.

The three paintings intended as a present from the Queen to M. Guizot, were being packed up at the hotel of the French Ambassador.

El Clamor Publico publishes the following letter, dated Vittoria, 20th ult.:—"The expedition of General Flores is at an end, in consequence of the revolt of his troops at the depôts of Durango, and that of Ordana, who, on being commanded to march to Santandar for embarkation, dispersed through the country."

A letter from Bayonne, dated Nov. 26, says: "Everything seems to announce the approach of the long-looked-for Carlist movement in Spain. All at once money appears to be abundant, and arms and ammunition are pouring into Navarre, Catalonia, and the Maestrazgo, Valencia, where the skeletons of several of the old Carlist battalions are being re-organised."

The Espanol states, that subsequently to the banquet given to Mr. Cobden at Cadiz, an association for the diffusion of the principles of free trade was established in that city. Mr. Cobden arrived in Malaga on the 19th ult.

The Heraldo publishes a letter from Corunna, which states that an English frigate had anchored in the Bay, and had sent a boat on shore without having complied with the usual formalities. This circumstance is said to have given rise to various unpleasant rumours. It was said that several British ships of war had taken positions along the coast, establishing a species of blockade.

THE UNITED STATES AND MEXICO.

The Britannia has arrived with accounts from New York to 5 P.M., of the 15th ult. The political news brought by this vessel is unimportant. Nothing further of interest had transpired relative to the opposing armies of Mexico and the United States. With regard to the latter, it seems to have been determined by the Cabinet at Washington, that no further movements are to be made by the American army now in Mexico till the assembling of Congress in December. The most striking features of our advices, in a political point of view, are the recurrence of the former unsuccessful attempt of the American squadron in the Gulf of Mexico, to capture the insignificant town of Alvarado, though led by the commodore of the squadron in person, and the abandonment of the pass of Saltillo by the Mexicans. The general aspect of the war remained otherwise unchanged.

At the last dates from the city of Mexico, the Government had received news of the arrival of Santa Anna at San Luis Potosi, where he already found himself at the head of an imposing force. He announced that he would be enabled in the course of a very short period of time, by the levies which had been made on the several departments and cities, to collect around his standard a host of patriots, that would swell his army to a figure sufficiently large to drive the invaders from the soil.

By far the most important part of the information communicated is precisely that which the dispatches to the United States Government failed to supply—namely, that the Mexicans have withdrawn from Saltillo, and fallen back on San Luis Potosi. The advance of General Taylor to that city, under present circumstances, is a matter of impossibility. At last accounts, the General appears to have settled down comfortably at Monterey; but the reaction taking place in the army, after so much fatigue and excitement, is described as painful in its effects. Judging from present appearances, the wisest and longest-sighted of the officers have arrived at the conviction that the war has only commenced.

It is very possible that General Taylor will await at Monterey the doings of the Mexican Congress, to which the American propositions for peace were to be referred. In that case he will not move until about the middle of December, and it is said that instructions are to be sent him to that effect.

It appears by the New York papers that the Mormon city of Nauvoo had been the scene of renewed disgraceful disorders. The "Anties" were pursuing an utterly lawless course of wrong, and had put at defiance the determination of the Governor of the State to maintain order, though backed by a force of 200 men and two pieces of artillery. A number of the unfortunate sect who had been expelled the city by the riotous mob desired to return, but their persecutors declared that they would not permit it.

The advices by the Britannia notice the fact of a large number of ships having sailed from New York and the other American ports bound to England, and in nearly all cases laden nearly to the water's edge with flour, corn, and other provisions. Nearly thirty ships of large tonnage are represented to be taking in cargoes in the port of New York alone, all of them bound for Great Britain, and the demand for shipping has, of course, had its natural effect of raising freights. The Britannia's news reached New York on the 9th, and created a great routing amongst the speculators. Corn and flour instantly advanced considerably, but when the speculators looked upon their enormous supply, prices fell back almost as rapidly as they had advanced.

THE CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

Cape of Good Hope papers to the 10th of October have been received by the Madagascar. This is four days later than the last arrival, although the dates then received were of the 7th from Simon's Bay.

The interval, however, does not furnish any new facts possessing any material degree of interest. The Deputy Commissary, General Palmer, had left the seat of Government for the frontier, in order to superintend the department in person, in consequence of the complaints that had been made of the inefficiency of that most essential branch of the service. The weather had been more moderate in Waterloo Bay, and the greater part of the provisions and stores sent round to the mouth of the Buffalo had been landed in safety. The aborigines are now broken up into small parties along the whole line of the frontier adjoining the bush, more from necessity, for the purpose of procuring subsistence, than with the view of making any successful inroad on the colony.

Colonel Hare had arrived in Cape Town from the frontier, on his way to England; that gallant officer, as previously reported, being compelled by ruined health to succumb to the harassing service in which he has been so long employed.

THE ISLAND OF TAHITI.

Letters from Sydney announce the arrival in that colony, on the 2nd of August, of her Majesty's ship Carysfort, having on board the new Governor, Sir C. A. Fitzroy and family. A vessel arrived at Sydney had brought news from Tahiti, announcing that the French troops had surprised several of the posts established by the natives, but had themselves suffered severely in the encounter. The commander, M. Bruat, was killed in the affray, and his aide-de-camp lost his legs. The natives reported their loss at five killed and two wounded, and represented the French to have had one hundred killed, and nearly as many wounded. The court-martial on Captain Bonard, of the Uranie, charged with having attacked the natives of Huahine without orders, had acquitted him, and Admiral Hamelin had sailed for California, taking with him M. Mœrenhout, appointed Consul at that place. The state of Tahiti appears to be truly wretched. Trade and agriculture have been entirely abandoned; and, in order to starve the natives into submission, the French are said to have destroyed the bread-fruit and other trees upon which the unfortunate people depended for subsistence.

ARRIVAL OF THE BOMBAY OVERLAND MAIL.

The Half-Monthly Mail, which left Bombay on the 2nd November, arrived on Wednesday, and brings news of some importance

The alarming aspect worn at the date of last dispatch by the affairs of Cashmere has, in a great measure, passed away. The troops of the Maharajah have, by repeated successes, retrieved the reverses originally encountered by them. The Sheikh Emaum-ood-Deen has sent in his submission, and in evidence of the sincerity and peacefulness of his intentions has caused the siege of Hurree Purvut to be raised. Not trusting to appearances, however auspicious, the Governor General has directed the military arrangements, commenced in apprehension of an active campaign, to be continued until everything be satisfactorily concluded. The suspicions of the good faith of the Lahore Durbar appear to have been groundless. Mooltan affairs seem in a fair train for satisfactory arrangement, and the threatened interruption of the even tenor of our pacific policy has proved transient and temporary. It seems highly probable that the whole of the provisions of the treaty of Umritsir will be carried out as originally intended. The force of Brigadier Wheeler is in possession of Jamoo; that from Lahore being in communication with them. Severe sickness is beginning to make its appearance again in Upper Scinde. The services of four of the war-steamers of the Indus flotilla have been made over for the use of the Government, and will be employed for the purposes of river transport. The Government five per cent. loan—mainly required, as is understood, for the exigencies of Scinde—is filling up apace.

An insurrection in Bhopal, which threatened serious consequences, has been suppressed by force of arms.

The Madras monsoon has been ushered in by a hurricane of unusual violence, and a deluge of rain—no less than 17½ inches of a fall, two-thirds of the English fall for the year, having occurred within twenty-four hours.

The Governors of the three Presidencies are at present all enjoying themselves above the Ghauts. Sir H. Roper left Bombay on the 2nd of November, and Sir D. Pollock was to be sworn Chief Justice on the 3rd. Great curiosity existed to know who would be named Governor of that Presidency, and also who would be the next Commander-in-Chief.

This arrival does not supply us with intelligence from China later than that received by the Calcutta mail.

IRELAND.

The Dublin Corporation.—Their honours met on Tuesday, and elected Alderman Staunton Lord Mayor for the ensuing year. Alderman O'Connell gave notice of a motion, that the Corporation should petition for a Repeal of the Union—the discussion not to take place till January. He hoped all the other Corporations would do likewise. Alderman Kinahan and other Conservative members were of opinion that a second discussion in that body was not necessary, and could not be useful, while famine and pestilence were ravaging the land.

The Repeal Association.—All that occurred worth notice at the Repeal Association on Monday was a speech from Mr. O'Connell, in which he stated that money was due to him, and again urged the necessity of doing something substantial for Repeal. Mr. O'Connell said: "The tenth audit of the 'Rent' accounts had been just completed—that Mr. Ray was in possession of all the books and vouchers—that they were kept in the most orderly manner—and that Mr. Ray would permit any member of the Association to inspect them. As to the state of the balance, he might as well inform the meeting that the Association was in his debt, and owed him a sum of £97 10s. 9d.! The vouchers for each and every item expended were carefully preserved, and amounted in number to 73,000. They were so arranged that any required voucher might be procured and produced at once. This was all he had to say about the funds: he need not, perhaps, have said so much; but he thought it right to satisfy the public mind upon the subject." (Hear, hear.) In reference to Repeal, Mr. O'Connell said: "Their first duty was to do something to work out Repeal. They were uncompromising Repealers. (Hear, hear.) He was one of those who had formed this Association, and he could say that they were now as lively as ever to prosecute this great object. (Hear, hear.) But the land was visited with an awful calamity. The most extreme misery desolated the country. In other countries—in Belgium, for instance—the potato crop had failed, and yet a famine had not ensued. Nothing in ancient or modern history was recorded similar to the terrible visitation which was now wasting the people of this country. The weather, too, had become most severe; frost had set in at an unusual season. Oh! if this should continue, he knew not what would become of them. But, as to the cause of the famine, he attributed it to the Union. He relied on the evidence of Lord Devon's Commission to show that the Irish agricultural population were the poorest in Europe, and this evidence given before the failure of the potato crop. What, then, had the Union done for Ireland? Oh, it was the fatal and horrible Union that had done all the mischief which had brought all our present miseries upon us. Who, then, was there that would not join him in seeking to repeal it? He lamented the divisions that had sprung up among them. The Young Irelanders were not content with leaving them; they were abusing and vilifying them, as if they, who had notoriously joined the Orange party, were the only honest Repealers. He then descanted on the moral force principle as contrasted with that of the Young Irelanders. With respect to what he meant next to do for Ireland, he would tell them. He would introduce the question again into the Common Council, and have the question discussed, not only there, but in every other Civic Corporation in Ireland. He would not be satisfied with any Corporation that refused to discuss it."—The rent for the week was announced to be £46 14s. 5d.

Another Attempt at Assassination.—On Wednesday afternoon (last week), a disgraceful and wanton outrage was committed by three armed men, disguised as women, on Mr. George Walton, of Ballysheen House, near Six-mile-bridge, county Clare, close to his own residence. One of them pointed a gun to his breast, which Mr. Walton grasped, and tried to take from his assailant, when a second threw him down, and while on the ground struck him several times with the butt end of a gun, and inflicted three or four severe wounds about his head. They immediately decamped, leaving him nearly senseless. One of the party on going away, said, "Take that, and keep your corn at home." Mr Walton has not sent any corn to market this season; this observation could only refer to a load of corn sent that morning by him to the Relief Committee of Six-mile-bridge. Mr. Walton was some time after discovered by his servants, and medical assistance procured, when his wounds were dressed, and though not considered out of danger, he is much better. On leaving Mr. Walton, his brutal assailants passed on to a place about 150 yards off, where about forty persons were employed by the Board of Works. Here they cried out "Heads down," and fired over the people. They then reloaded, and passed on without any molestation being offered to them.

Another Murder.—The provincial Irish papers contain numerous accounts of outrages of every kind upon person and property, of which the following is one of the worst samples:—On Sunday evening, the 22d ult., between seven and eight o'clock, an armed body of men, amounting to between 30 and 40, supposed to be from the county of Westmeath, traversed the neighbourhood of Castle Wilder, Foxhall, &c., in the south of this county, and visited several farmers' houses, inquiring of them if they had paid their rent, and, on being answered "No," ordered them not to do so, on pain of being again visited and punished for it. On coming on towards the residence of John Flood, of Ardandra, he being alarmed by the barking of his dog, went and opened his door, and demanded what the ruffians wanted,—when three or four of them came over to him, and, attempting to force in through the door, he defended himself, and with a shovel parried with a man who had a long gun, but who, finding he could not force an entrance, discharged the contents, consisting of slugs and shots, into poor Flood's hip, who dropped down and died in half an hour. Flood was a married man, in middling comfortable circumstances, and has left a wife and eight children.

Captain Warner's Long Range.—The experiments with Mr. Warner's apparatus for destroying ships or other objects, at a "long range," have been tried, and, as was expected, terminated in their total failure. The officers selected by Government were Captain Chads, R.N., C.B., Colonel Chalmers, R.E., and Colonel Dundas, R.A. The Master-General of the Ordnance (the Marquis of A[illegible] Mr. Warner was requested to fire in that direction, and endeavour to strike the tree, or propel a shell near it; two of the officers stationed themselves at proper distances, to observe the result; after some time had elapsed, in Mr. Warner getting all ready, which he kept a profound secret, not being interfered with by any of the committee, the explosion took place, but the shell fell very far short of the object. Several other trials afterwards were made, but on no occasion did the shell ever reach three miles. After some time Mr. Warner admitted that he had failed in his experiments, and the investigation finished. The official report has been made to the Master-General of the Ordnance. One of the officers was so satisfied that the "long range" would prove a failure, that he stood under the tree during the explosion.—Morning Chronicle.

The "Great Britain" Steamer.—The following information regarding the fate of this steam-ship may be relied upon as correctly stating the present condition of the vessel:—The late gales destroyed the breakwater before it was entirely finished; they also altered the position of the ship, and have given her a cant, with her decks exposed to the sea. It is intended to careen her over, so as to expose her port or larboard side to the waves, and keep her in that position till the fine weather sets in. During the late gales, the water rose higher on the coast of Ireland than it has been known to do for a great many years, and, the wind being southerly, it drove with great force into Dundrum Bay.

EPITOME OF NEWS.—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

The St. Petersburgh Journal announces that the Russians obtained, on the 16th ult., a great advantage over the troops of Chamyl. This account states that he was forced to fly, leaving 800 men in the field of battle; that he has lost four pieces of cannon, 21 caissons, several colours, 300 prisoners, and the axe which he always had carried before him. The account also declares that the Murides pursued the mountaineers, and took from them all the booty which they had amassed in the beginning of the campaign. Chamyl is said to have entered Weden on the 21st ult.

Several of the German journals assert that the three sons of the King of Bavaria, the Prince Royal, Prince Luitpold, and King Otho, of Greece, are about to meet together at Palermo, in order to agree amongst themselves relative to the eventual rights of succession of Bavaria to the throne of Greece, King Otho having no children.

The Staats Courant contains the text of the treaty concluded between Holland and Russia. This treaty establishes reciprocal freedom of trade for the subjects of the two contracting nations. The vessels of the two countries will be treated in the ports of each on the same terms as the national ships. Merchandise, without distinction of origin, imported into Russia by Dutch vessels, or into the Netherlands by Russian vessels, will pay no higher duties than those which would be exacted if the importation had been by the national vessels.

Accounts to the 15th October from Ceylon, mention that the cholera prevailed in that island to a serious extent. It broke out in Kandy on the 6th of September, and in three weeks seventy men out of 350 of her Majesty's 95th Regiment, fell victims to its ravages. From Kandy the disease travelled to Colombo, where, on the 12th of October, twenty cases had broken out in the town, and three in the fort. It was expected, however, that the disease would soon disappear, as very heavy rains had fallen.

By a recently issued Parliamentary return it appears that there are as many as 205,051 licensed dealers in tobacco and snuff in the United Kingdom. In England there are 170,048; in Ireland, 16,601; and in Scotland, 15,402 There are 12,958 dealers in London, and the number within ten miles of the Excise Office is 23,807.

A deplorable accident took place on the Austrian Northern Railway on the 17th ult. The nine o'clock evening train ran into two luggage vans at the station of Marset, and three persons were killed by the shock.

A Canada paper states that there has been a new waterfall discovered in the River St. Louis. This cataract falls into the western part of Lake Superior, which has never yet been described by the geographer. It would appear that this new wonder is second only to the falls of Niagara. The volume of water is immense, and the height of the fall is 150 feet.

The Nuremberg Correspondent states that a maritime convention has been concluded between Austria and the State of Mecklenburg Shwerin.

It has been determined to carry the electric telegraph from the terminus at Euston-square to Liverpool and Manchester. The wires have been already placed as far as Watford. It is also intended to complete the telegraph from Manchester to Liverpool. The cost of laying down the wires, &c., amounts to £140 per mile. When the apparatus is complete the entire distance to Liverpool, wires are to be laid down from the terminus at Euston-square to the Royal Exchange.

The Truelove, Parker, from Davis' Straits, has arrived at Hull with two fish. She reports that nothing has been heard of the Terror and Erebus, forming part of Sir John Franklin's expedition. They were supposed to be in Lancaster Sound, but there was so much ice that the whaler could not go in search of them.

The Submarine telegraph was laid across Portsmouth harbour last Saturday, from the watering island in the dockyard to the steps at the Royal Clarence-yard. The former experiments were repeated, and they fully confirmed the fact that one wire, as prepared by Messrs. West and Taylor, is sufficient for electric telegraph purposes under water.

A deputation from the Anti-tea Duty party, at Liverpool, arrived in Birmingham on Monday, and commenced the agitation in that town. A public meeting is accordingly about to be held there.

The Post-Ampt Gazette of Frankfort, of the 28th ult., states from Rome that the Pope intends to abolish the salt-tax, and some other taxes which press particularly on the industrious classes, and to supply the deficit, which this abolition will cause, by a tax upon real property.

For the last two days there has been a remarkable dearth of eggs, which were not to be obtained at any price in many parts of the metropolis, whilst they were generally sold at very advanced prices.

The Aix-la-Chapelle Gazette, of the 28th ultimo, has the following from Berlin, dated the 26th:—"It is reported that a document has been discovered, which proves that the Royal house of Prussia has claims to the succession of Schleswig and Holstein. It is generally believed here that Prussia will insist on the maintenance of the independence of the duchies."

The Cologne Gazette of the 25th ult., says:—"Important reforms will take place in Galicia and the territory of Cracow. There will be a Regency at Cracow, and a military division, and a regiment will be raised at Cracow itself. The regiment of the Archduke Louis, which was to have gone into Moravia, will, it is said, proceed to Gallicia. That country, including the territory of Cracow, has now a population of five millions."

A letter from St. Petersburgh states that such a quantity of snow fell on that capital on the 15th ult., that sledges could be everywhere used. On the 16th ice having appeared on the Neva, the bridges were removed. On the 17th and 18th large quantities of ice were floating down the river, but communication by means of boats had not yet been interrupted.

The assassin Reinell, who for his attempt to murder the Emperor of Austria was sentenced to 20 years' imprisonment in the celebrated fortress of Munkats, in Hungary, died there a month ago.

A letter from Boulogne states that the town was again in great agitation on the 27th ult., in consequence of a merchant wishing to embark 500 sheep and 60 oxen for England. The public force was called out, and the embarkation was effected without hindrance under their protection. The rioters are said to be strangers to the town.

By a recent decision of the Russian Government all the peasants of Livonia who embrace the orthodox creed are exonerated from the tithes which they paid to their clergy, and as a further inducement to profess the religion of the State they are to be exempted from taxes generally. The nobles of Livonia have petitioned the Emperor to annul this decree, and, waiting his decision, have engaged to pay to the clergy the tithes which are refused by the peasantry.

The project of establishing a line of steamers between Havre and New York has been abandoned

The Universal Prussian Gazette, of the 26th ult., in an article on the arguments that have appeared in some of the foreign journals against the incorporation of Cracow, says it can contradict, from the best authority, the assertion that the Prussian Government was actuated by a desire for an augmentation or exchange of territory in connexion with the abolition of the independence of Cracow. No pretension of this kind, says the Gazette, was ever set up by Prussia on the negotiations on the subject of Cracow.

OUR MAGAZINE COLUMN FOR DECEMBER.

MRS. PIPCHIN, AT BRIGHTON.

This celebrated Mrs. Pipchin was a marvellous ill-favoured, ill-conditioned old lady, of a stooping figure, with a mottled face, like bad marble, a hook nose, and a hard grey eye, that looked as if it might have been hammered at on an anvil without sustaining any injury. Forty years at least had elapsed since the Peruvian mines had been the death of Mr. Pipchin; but his relict still wore black bombazeen, of such a lustreless, deep, dead, sombre shade, that gas itself couldn't light her up after dark, and her presence was a quencher to any number of candles. She was generally spoken of as "a great manager" of children; and the secret of her management was, to give them everything that they didn't like, and nothing that they did—which was found to sweeten their dispositions very much. She was such a bitter old lady, that one was tempted to believe there had been some mistake in the application of the Peruvian machinery, and that all her waters of gladness and milk of human kindness had been pumped out dry, instead of the mines. The Castle of this ogress and child-queller was in a steep bye-street at Brighton; where the soil was more than usually chalky, flinty, and sterile, and the houses were more than usually brittle and thin; where the small front-gardens had the unaccountable property of producing nothing but marigolds, whatever was sown in them; and where snails were constantly discovered holding on to the street-doors, and other public places they were not expected to ornament, with the tenacity of cupping-glasses. In the winter-time the air couldn't be got out of the Castle, and in the summer-time it couldn't be got in. There was such a continual reverberation of wind in it, that it sounded like a great shell, which the inhabitants were obliged to hold to their ears night and day, whether they liked it or no. It was not, naturally, a fresh-smelling house; and in the window of the front parlour, which was never opened, Mrs. Pipchin kept a collection of plants in pots, which imparted an earthy flavour of their own to the establishment. However choice examples of their kind, too, these plants were of a kind peculiarly adapted to the embowerment of Mrs. Pipchin. There were half-a-dozen specimens of the cactus, writhing round bits of lath, like hairy serpents; another specimen shooting out broad claws, like a green lobster; several creeping vegetables, possessed of sticky and adhesive leaves; and one uncomfortable flower-pot hanging to the ceiling, which appeared to have boiled over, and tickling people underneath with its long green ends, reminded them of spiders—in which Mrs. Pipchin's dwelling was uncommonly prolific, though perhaps it challenged competition still more proudly, in the season, in point of earwigs.—Charles Dickens, in "Dombey and Son."

BACCHANALIAN SONGS.

There is not a greater error ever allowed to go about loose, than the supposition that "Bacchanalian songs," as the Little Warbler calls them, tend to merriment. And how "slow" are the convivial songster's images, when pulled down from the stilts of imagery to the level of common place! How cravenly the soul lighting the beacon of truth in the eye falls to the babbling and bewilderment that must end in the next morning's seediness and headache: what nonsense it is, to be told to wreathe a bowl with flowers, when nothing of the kind is at hand: and if the guests were to begin to do it, what a ridiculously slow performance it would be. We are not at all wedded to teetotalism. We allow that in the gurgling of tall bottles, and the popping of champagne corks, there is much music, but then every thing must be equally fast about them. But how folks can imagine there is any thing entertaining in these dull songs, by themselves, is above the comprehension of any but beery German students and tavern harmonists..—Christopher Tadpole

THE BATTLE OF POICTIERS

On the 19th of September, 1356, the battle began with a duet played by two trumpets—one on each side—but this did not last long, for neither party desired to listen to overtures. The French commenced the attack, but they came to the point a little too soon, for they actually ran upon the arrows of the English bowmen. The Constable of France tried to inspire courage into the troops on his side, by roaring out "Mountjoy! St. Denis!" but a stalwart Briton, telling him to hold his noise, felled him to the ground. A strong body of reserve, who carried their reserve to downright timidity, fled without striking a blow. They had scarcely drawn their swords, and received the word of command to "cut away," when they did literally cut away, and, having cut, refused to come again. John of France flourished his battle-axe with ferocious courage; but at last he received two tremendous blows in the face, which brought him to the ground. His son Philip, a lad of sixteen, fought by his side, encouraging him with cries of "Give it 'em, father!" which aroused the almost exhausted John, and caused him to recover his legs. Every kind of verbal insults was offered to him by the enemy, and particularly by the Gascons, who indulged in a great deal of their usual gasconade. "Stand, and surrender!" cried a voice; to which John replied, "If I could stand, I would not surrender; but I suppose I must fall into your hands." With this he tottered into a circle of English knights, by whom he was nearly torn to pieces in the scramble that arose for the Royal captive.—Comic History of England.

PARISIAN SOCIETY.

To enter into all the various characteristics of different Parisian salons, would be almost a hopeless task. One prevailing tint, with shades of difference, which it would take infinite time to paint, pervades them all. One remark, however, that a foreigner cannot fail of making, on entering any of the more extensive reunions in the French capital, such as those of the Embassies, is the diversity of political parties that meet together in them, and the general diffusion of so many contrary elements. Vinegar and oil, with all their accompanying but incongruous et-ceteras in a salad-bowl, do not mix together into a more pleasant and harmonious whole, than do political contraries in that great salad bowl, society. Names always clash, and fight, and howl defiance, when they meet together, upon paper; but the very men who bear them, may be seen standing peaceably, side by side, in a Parisian salon, like relics in an old curiosity shop, where idols of every age and clime lie pell-mell by each other, the head of a Grecian Apollo near an Indian fetish, an Egyptian Apis beside an Ecce Homo of the middle ages. In that curious museum of humanity, called a Parisian salon, an old mousquetaire, who has danced with Marie Antoinette, is shouldered by a philanthropist, who has been worshipped in the National Assembly, or a tamed Republican, who has been enshrined in the Directional Luxembourg—a great dignitary of the Empire, before whose sway all Europe trembled, bows to a lay Jesuit, a sovereign of the Restoration,—all alike divinities of their day, and now, alike fallen, mutilated, tarnished, worm-eaten,—false gods, whose religion is rejected, and in whom few any longer put their trust, while Legitimist and Orleanist, Doctrinaire and Liberal of the present day, shake hands in "much admired disorder." Bentley's Miscellany.

CIVIC HOSPITALITY.

The City of London and good living, a Common Councilman and a sirloin, a Sheriff and a second helping, an Alderman and a tureen of turtle, and a Lord Mayor and plenty to eat, seem inseparable companions. You cannot think of a common hall without an uncommon dinner, or a Lord Mayor living, like George III., on a boiled neck of mutton and turnips. Barons of beef, and whole hogs barbacued—quantity and quality both—belong by descent to the Civic chair. As for an inhospitable Alderman, one under weight, thin, and spare, and long, and lank, and lean, there is no conceiving for a moment that such a specimen could exist. One can fancy a man with a tail, and all Monboddo believed, much sooner. But still such things as un-Lordlike Lord Mayors may be found in the catalogue of our City functionaries. A late Lord Mayor, like a late Prime Minister, let his fires out, his spits rust, and City hospitality cease for a time, to be a proverb. A factious Sheriff, commemorated by Dryden, was famous for the mean and scandalous shrivealty which he kept.—

No Rechabite more shunn'd the fumes of wine;
Chaste were his cellars, and his shrieval board
Th[illegible] of a City feast abhorr'd;
His cooks, with long disuse, their trade forgot—
Cool was his kitchen, though his brains were hot.

His name was Slingsby Bethell, and the poor shrivealty which he kept has found a lasting celebrity in a satire like "Absalom and Achitophel."—Fraser's Magazine.

CASTLES IN THE AIR.

Snipeton is still a happy man. As yet he knows not of his misery; dreams not of the desolation that, in an hour or so, shall blast him at his threshold. He is still at his desk; happy in his day-dream; his imagination running over, as in wayward moments of half-thrift, half-idleness, it was wont to do, upon the paper on his desk before him. Imagination, complete and circling; and making that dim sanctuary of dirty Plutus a glistening palace! The pen—the ragged stump, that in his hand had worked as surely as Italian steel, striking through a heart or so, but drawing no blood—the pen, as it had been plucked from the winged heel of the thief's god, Mercury, worked strange sorcery; crept and scratched about the paper, conjuring glories there, that made the old man sternly smile; even as an enchanter smiles at the instant handiwork of all-obedient fiends. Reader, look upon the magic that, cunningly exercised by the Snipetons of the world, fills it with beauty; behold the jottings of the black art that, simple as they look, hold, like the knotted ropes of Lapland witches, a power invincible. Here they are; faithfully copied from that piece of paper; the tablet of old Snipeton's dearest thoughts, divinest aspirations:—

"£70,000"—"£85,700"—"£90,000"—"£100,000"
"£150,000"—"£1,000,000!"

In this way did Snipeton—in pleasant, thrifty idleness—pour out his heart; dallying with hope, and giving to the unuttered wish a certain sum in black and white; running up the figures as a rapturous singer climbs the gamut, touching the highest heaven of music to his own delight, and the wonder of the applauding world. In this manner would Snipeton take pastime with his spirit. In this manner was the paper on his desk writ and over-writ with promised sums that, it was his hope, his day-dream, would surely some day bless him. And the numerals ever rose with his spirits. When very dumpish—with the world going all wrong with him—he would write himself down a pauper; in bitterness of heart loving to enlarge upon his beggary, as thus: 000,000,000,000.—Douglas Jerrold, in the Shilling Mag.

THE NEW PLANET, 1846.

Immortal Newton! did thy glory seem
A dew-drop quivering in the light of noon,
Whose prism of splendour was to perish soon
'Neath the strong sunbeams? Did they fear or dream
Thy genius not a spark from the Supreme—
King of those myriads? Lo! unto the skies
Men lift their watching and unsleeping eyes—
Waiting for what?—an unborn Planet's beam!—
And look! in truth the prophesied-one breaks
Forth 'mid its lustrous brethren on their sight.
Welcome! oh, unimaginably far!—
Eloquent Planet!—truth-attesting star!—
In whose deep silence the Eternal speaks—
"I am the Prophet-Fount of genius and of light." —M. H.

ENTRANCE ARCH TO THE CASTLE.

VISIT OF HER MAJESTY AND PRINCE ALBERT TO ARUNDEL CASTLE.

ON TUESDAY, her Majesty and Prince Albert paid their proposed visit to Arundel Castle, Sussex, the seat of the Duke of Norfolk, where they arrived at halfpast four in the afternoon, after a very rapid journey from Osborne House, during which they were received with every demonstration of loyalty and respect, more especially from the people of Chichester and Arundel. The Royal travellers were again fortunate in having fine weather — a sharp frost, but clear air and brilliant sun.

At Portsmouth, in anticipation of her Majesty's landing, the most extensive preparations were made, to express the warm sentiments of loyalty and respect, both on the part of her Majesty's representatives at the port, and the inhabitants of the town.

The landing-place called the King's Stairs, the principal entrance to the Dockyard from the harbour, was most beautifully decorated. At the entrance from the Dockyard was raised a triumphal arch, formed of flags and evergreens, the whole surmounted by five gilt crowns. The space immediately around the offices was railed off, the favoured public being stationed on the outside.

The Queen and Prince Consort both looked remarkably well. Her Majesty wore a black velvet visite, trimmed with sable fur, an ermine muff, white silk bonnet, and a light lilac dress,

At half-past twelve, the Royal party, consisting of the Queen and Prince Albert, the Marchioness of Douro (lady in waiting), the Hon. Miss Napier (maid of honour), Colonel Bouverie and Capt. Phipps (equerries), embarked in the Fairy, from Osborne Pier; and, with the Royal standard flying from her main, the yacht steamed direct for the harbour, which she entered at one precisely, when a salute was simultaneously thundered forth from the St. Vincent, Victory, and the Platform Battery.

At ten minutes past one, her Majesty descended into the Royal barge, which was steered by Lord Adolphus Fitzclarence.

On landing, her Majesty was received by Sir Charles Ogle, the Duke of Norfolk, Lieutenant-General Sir Hercules Pakenham with the keys of the fortress, the Hon. Lady and Miss Pakenham, and a brilliant staff. Taking the hand of Prince Albert, her Majesty passed through the brilliant rank, preceded by the Duke of Norfolk, as Master of the Horse, and followed by the whole train of officers, profoundly acknowledging the loyal and affectionate tributes of respect and loyalty paid by the assembled throng, amidst the waving of handkerchiefs and cheers of the populace.

At fourteen minutes past one, the Royal cortège, consisting of three carriages and four, escorted by a party of the 12th Lancers, who joined the train outside the gates, left the yard, taking the route round by the Commander-in-Chief's mansion, passing through St. George's-square, St. James's-street, and out of the citadel by the Lion Gate, from which floated the Royal standard. The whole range of thoroughfare, from the dockyard to the outside of the suburbs, was thronged with the inhabitants as the cortège passed.

The route of the Royal party lay through an interesting country. The escort of troops which accompanied her Majesty from the dockyard, continued to attend her as far as a place called Farlington, a small village, at a short distance from which relays of horses had been provided. Neither at Havant nor at Emsworth were there any very remarkable preparations; but considerable numbers of people had assembled, in the hope of seeing the Queen. At Emsworth there were some bands of music, and the inhabitants gave the Royal party a very loyal reception; but there was a paucity of arches, festoons, and flags. The people of the district, it seems, were under the impression that such displays were distasteful to the Queen.

The county of Sussex is first reached at a place called Emsworth Bridge, immediately beyond the town of Emsworth. Here the Royal troops ceased to escort her Majesty, but were replaced by an escort of the Arundel and Bramber Yeomanry Cavalry, commanded by Mr. J. A. Smith, M.P. for Chichester, his brother, Mr. M. T. Smith, and Mr. Montefiore. Her Majesty was loudly cheered by the people as she passed.

At the entrance of the town from Chichester, a triumphal arch of tasteful design, composed of evergreens, and ornamented with the usual gratulatory inscriptions, was thrown across the road, and here it was arranged the borough authorities should be in attendance to receive her Majesty on her arrival.

The authorities and the inhabitants of Chichester had prepared for the Queen a most loyal reception. It had at first been the wish of the Corporation to present her Majesty and Prince Albert with addresses, but on inquiry it was found that it would be distasteful to her Majesty to be detained (more especially at so inclement a season) during the time required for the reading and the reception of addresses, and the Corporation, without making any formal application, abandoned the idea. As Chichester is too remote from Arundel to justify the Corporation in offering her Majesty an address at the Castle, they were obliged to come to the resolution of voting no address at all. But they compensated themselves for this deprivation by giving her Majesty and the Prince a very brilliant reception on their arrival in the town. There was scarcely a house that was not in some way or other decorated; and the windows were filled with spectators, of whom the proverbially handsome ladies of Sussex formed the most numerous and the most agreeable portion. Besides the display made by the inhabitants individually, there were also preparations under the control of the authorities, the expense of which was defrayed by a general subscription. In West-street, opposite the very beautiful cathedral (small as compared with such edifices generally, but remarkably elegantly in structure), a capacious platform, adorned with appropriate devices, contained upwards of 1000 poor children, natives of the town and immediate neighbourhood. As the Royal party drove by, the juvenile occupants of this pavilion, each with a small flag in hand, shouted shrill welcome to the Queen, animated with as much of loyalty as their young comprehensions could embrace, and enforced by the certain expectation of prospective plum-cake, which was liberally provided by the authorities to be enjoyed by the children as soon as possible after the performance of their portion of the general reception. While the horses were being changed, the chief authorities of the town, the Mayor and Corporation, the Bishop of Chichester, the Dean, and a large number of the Clergy, attended to pay their respects to her Majesty and the Prince, by whom they were most graciously received. All the while the cheering was loud and hearty, and the Royal party appeared to be much pleased with their reception. At the top of this street, where the main streets are crossed by others to the north and south, is the old cross of the town of Chichester, a very elegant and elaborate piece of middle age architecture,—one of the most remarkable, indeed, in the kingdom. When her Majesty before passed through Chichester, she was so struck with the beauty of this structure, that she alighted from her carriage to view it. On the present occasion it was made the station for a band, who played with more enthusiasm than taste while the Royal party passed. In the other parts of the town which the Royal cortège traversed, there was every possible demonstration of loyalty. Every house boasted some decoration or other, and not the least attractive of the many gay embellishments were the flags lent for the occasion with so unwonted a relaxation of rigid naval etiquette, by Sir Hyde Parker, from the Portsmouth Dockyard.

The first troop of the Arundel and Bramber Yeomanry escorted her Majesty as far as a place called Ball's Hut, about six miles and a half from Chichester, and immediately opposite the entrance to Slindon House, the seat of the Countess of Newburgh. Here another troop, commanded by the Earl of Arundel and Surrey, Mr. T. Evans, and Mr. Grey, relieved them, and escorted her Majesty on to Arundel. Here, also, the Duke of Norfolk, who had gone out to meet his Royal visitors, joined the cortege, accompanied by some of the chief guests at the Castle, including the Duke of Wellington. His Grace and party returned towards Arundel with the Royal cortège.

On the approach of the Royal cortege to the town of Arundel, the speed of the horses was slackened, in order to allow the spectators an opportunity of observing the Royal party. The Queen's carriage having passed under the triumphal arch at the end of Maltravers-street, where the Mayor and borough authorities were assembled, was here brought to a stand, while Mr. Howard Gibbon, who wore underneath his scarlet robe of office his uniform as York Herald, advanced to the window, and presented the borough mace to her Majesty in the following terms:

"May it please your Majesty to accept this mace, which I, as Mayor of this ancient borough, humbly present, in dutiful submission to your Majesty's Royal prerogative."

The Queen graciously acknowledged Mr. Gibbon, and, with a scarcely suppressed though exceedingly good-tempered smile, returned the symbol of official power to his charge, assuring him it was not possible it could be in better keeping.

A sort of procession was then formed, the municipal authorities preceding the Queen's carriage along Maltravers-street to the Castle precincts, where they filed off and allowed the Royal cortège to enter.

Her Majesty was greeted most affectionately by the spectators in her passage through the town. The Royal pair graciously acknowledged the salutations offered to them, and appeared much gratified at the appearance of the children of the National School, who were drawn up in holiday attire opposite the residence of the Mayor in Maltravers-street.

An evergreen arch, of gigantic dimensions and very effective design, was erected at the lodge gate by which Arundel Castle is entered. The crown of this arch bore two inscriptions, as follows:—

"Victoria .... 1846 .... Albert"
"Adeliza .... 1139 .... Matilda."

in commemoration of the present Royal visit, and of the residence therein of the Empress Matilda, daughter of Henry I., when she landed in England in 1139, to assert her claims against Stephen, at which era the Castle was occupied by Queen Adeliza, from whom, in the female line, the present noble house of Norfolk is descended.

As the Royal carriage entered the Castle gate, two Royal standards were run up on either side the same; and, as it passed into the quadrangle, the Duke's flag was lowered from the summit of the keep, and the British flag hoisted in its stead. At the same moment, a most brilliant illumination in gas, extending entirely across the keep, burst forth in great brilliancy, exhibiting in colossal letters these words—"Welcome Victoria and Albert."

On the arrival of her Majesty and the Prince at the Grand Entrance Hall of the Castle, they were received by the Duke and Duchess of Norfolk, Lord and Lady Arundel, the Duchess of Sutherland, and the Ladies Mary and Adeliza Fitzalan Howard. Lord John Russell was also present. The Earl of Ellesmere and Lord Edward Fitzalan Howard had previously gone out with the Duke of Wellington towards Balls' Hut to meet the Royal party.

Her Majesty was then conducted by the Duke of Norfolk, the Prince offering his arm to the Duchess, to the Library, where the rest of the guests were assembled. There were the Duchess of Bedford, the Countess of Ellesmere, Lady John Russell, Viscount Morpeth, Lord Brooke, Lady Caroline Leveson Gower, and Mr. B. Lyons. Her Majesty, after addressing a few words to the company present, retired to her apartments with the Prince. Viscount and Viscountess Palmerston were not present in the Library, but they arrived shortly after, and were present at the dinner, as was also the Marquis of Granby.

Before dinner, her Majesty and the Prince were conducted by the Duke of Norfolk to the State Drawing Room. They were attended by the Duchess of Norfolk, the Duchess of Sutherland (Mistress of the Robes), Lord Edward F. Howard (Vice-Chamberlain), the Marchioness of Douro (Lady in Waiting), and the Hon. Miss Napier (Maid of Honour).

Here the Mayor of Arundel, Mr. Edward Howard Gibbon, had the honour of presenting the address of the Corporation to her Majesty and the Prince.

The address to the Queen was as follows:—

"TO THE QUEEN'S MOST EXCELLENT MAJESTY.

"THE LOYAL AND DUTIFUL ADDRESS OF THE MAYOR, ALDERMEN, AND BURGESSES OF THE BOROUGH OF ARUNDEL, IN THE COUNTY OF SUSSEX.

"Most Gracious Sovereign,—We, your Majesty's loyal and dutiful subjects, the Mayor, Aldermen, Burgesses, and Inhabitants of the ancient borough of Arundel, endowed by your Majesty's Royal predecessor Queen Adeliza, and confirmed and chartered by Queen Elizabeth, most gratefully avail ourselves of your Majesty's auspicious presence amongst us to offer the expression of devoted loyalty which we at all times feel towards your Majesty's person and throne.

"We offer up our fervent aspirations that every blessing which life affords may conduce to the happiness of your Majesty and your beloved Consort, that your Majesty's reign may be long, prosperous, and peaceful; filled as we are, in common with all your Majesty's subjects, with a deep and grateful sense of the benefits and blessings enjoyed under the influence of those beneficent virtues which adorn your Majesty and your Royal Consort, and endear your Majesty to the hearts of your Majesty's faithful people."

The following is the address to Prince Albert:—

"TO HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS PRINCE ALBERT.

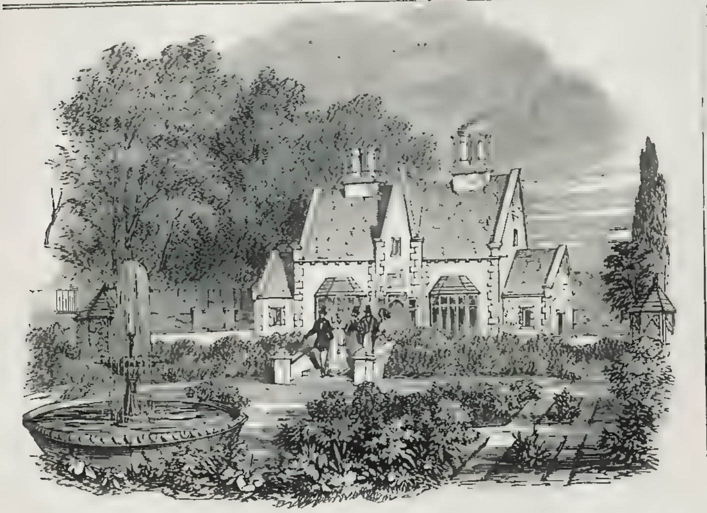
"THE LOYAL ADDRESS OF THE MAYOR, ALDERMEN, BURGESSES, AND INHABITANTS, OF THE BOROUGH OF ARUNDEL, IN THE COUNTY OF SUSSEX.

"May it please your Royal Highness,—We, the Mayor, Aldermen, and Inhabitants of Arundel, joyfully submit to your Royal Highness our profound respect and devotion, and hail with the most heartfelt pleasure your Royal Highness appearance in our loyal and ancient borough. United by the most sacred ties to our beloved Queen, and intimately interwoven with the future prosperity and happiness of the nation, we cannot but earnestly pray for your Royal Highness' life and welfare, and we trust that your Royal Highness may continue to receive every blessing which Heaven can bestow."

At eight o'clock, in accordance with an ancient family custom at Arundel, an immense Chinese gong, suspended in the entrance hall of the Castle, was sounded, to announce the dinner hour. The noble Duke's band at the same instant struck up the national air, "Oh, the roast beef of Old England," and the company left the state saloon for the banqueting room.

The dinner party consisted of her Majesty and Prince Albert, the Duke and Duchess of Norfolk, the Duke and Duchess of Bedford, the Duke of Wellington, the Duchess of Sutherland, the Earl and Countess of Arundel, the Marquis of Granby, the Marchioness of Douro, Lady Mary F. Howard, the Earl and Countess of Ellesmere, Lord Edward F. Howard, Lord and Lady J. Russell, Viscount and Viscountess Palmerston, Viscount Morpeth, Lord Brooke, the Hon. Miss Napier, Colonel Bouverie, Colonel Phipps, Sir Harry Goring, the Mayor of Arundel Mr.

THE RECEPTION IN THE GRAND CORRIDOR.



THE NEW DAIRY, ARUNDEL CASTLE.

Countess of Newburgh, and Mrs. Huskisson, widow of the celebrated statesman, were invited. The Duke of Wellington, accompanied by Lady Ellesmere, both on horseback, rode through the town for an airing during the morning. The gallant Duke was respectfully and cordially greeted as he passed.

The dinner to-night will comprise the accustomed party, with the addition of the High Sheriff, — Mitford, Esq. The Distin Family will afterwards perform a Select Concert, and Mr. Young, the Wizard of the North, attempt to deceive the eyes of Majesty itself.

The Royal Visit will close to-morrow; the Queen taking her departure for Osborne House at ten o'clock, under the same arrangements as at her arrival.

Her Majesty has been pleased to express to the Duke of Norfolk her sense of the loyalty and affection displayed during the Visit, and his Grace has, in like manner, evinced his satisfaction at the excellent feeling with which all have endeavoured to do honour to the Sovereign, on this very interesting occasion.

THE OWLS.

The Queen, accompanied by the Duke of Norfolk, inspected the Keep, and ancient remains of the Castle, yesterday (Wednesday).

There are now eight Owls, of this "peculiar breed;" and, since they were first domiciled here, four only have been hatched—one during the past year, which is the finest bird of the lot. The bird named "Lord Thurlow" is well known. There is also one other Owl of singular appearance and smallness of growth—quite the Tom Thumb of the race.

THE DAIRY.

On an arm of the Arun, just under the Castle, was a short time since to be seen snugly nestling under a high chalky scarp, almost concealed by luxuriant trees, and crowned by the ivy-covered keep, a picturesque water-mill, erected on the site of an ancient feudal mill, particularly described in "Domesday," and every subsequent record of the baronial appendages; and forming, with its tall roofs, huge wheel, and projecting gables, a bit that was seldom met with by any lover of the picturesque.

Among the alterations and improvements that have been carried into effect by the present noble proprietor, this mill has disappeared; and, in its stead, has arisen the tasteful building depicted in our Engraving; it was inspected by her Majesty yesterday.

From this spot, only a very small portion of the Castle is visible, and all about is still, save only by the rush of the escape of water known in old records as the old Swanbourne Lake.

The building itself is more extensive than at first sight might be imagined it consists of four distinct designs. first, the engine-house, containing ten-horse power for forcing the water to the eminence above; this is in the Norman style

Imprimis. Chorus of Owlis

Who-whoop! whoo-whoo-here's a to do;
With clatter and din,
Withoute and withinne,
Of spawn and crowder
And clarion louder,
We're all eyes and ears
In wonders and fears,
With dismaye we view
Our Citadel too
Is all [illegible]
Of lumin[illegible]
[illegible]
[illegible]
[illegible]
Our sage Chancellor
Will arouse, then who Will soothe the crabbed gentleman-who whoo-whoo.

J. A. Smith, M.P., and Mr. M. T. Smith. After dinner the Duke of Norfolk gave the "Health of the Queen," and afterwards that of "His Royal Highness Prince Albert," in the usual form, and the guests soon after retired to the drawing-room. Her Majesty and the Prince withdrew early to rest, and shortly after the company retired.

The table presented a gorgeous display of plate. The dessert service was of gold.

The town was gaily illuminated on Tuesday night. At the Castle the keep was brilliantly lighted with gas, from a platform which bore the words "Welcome, Victoria and Albert," in characters five feet in size, each jet being covered by a glass cup. There was a grand display of fireworks in the meadow at the foot of the Castle hill. There were also innumerable flags, some of enormous size, and many of them very splendid. The streets were crowded with a gay and well-behaved population, whose orderly motion was, however, perpetually disturbed by the quantities of squibs and crackers, of rockets, and other fireworks, that were let off in the public thoroughfares with indiscriminate liberality and mischievous fun. These amusements, varied by the occasional ascent of a fire balloon, continued till a very late hour, but no disturbance or accident occurred.

WEDNESDAY.

On Wednesday morning, the Queen and Prince, as usual, on their visits to the aristocracy, breakfasted alone.

The Queen, in the early part of the forenoon, accompanied by Prince Albert, and attended by the Duke of Norfolk, promenaded the gardens within the walls of the Old Castle.

His Royal Highness Prince Albert, the Duke of Bedford, the Earl of Ellesmere, the Earl of Arundel and Surrey, Viscount Palmerston and Lord John Russell, left the Castle about ten o'clock for the Duke's preserves at Bury Coombe, near Whiteways, to enjoy a few hours' shooting.

The Duke of Wellington did not leave the Castle during the morning.

The Bishop of Chichester, Colonel and Mrs. Wyndham, and a select party, are to join the dinner circle this evening; and the banquet is to be succeeded by an assembly.

The dinner party on Wednesday evening comprised those who have been already named as being the guests in the house during her Majesty's stay, with the addition of the Bishop of Chichester and Mrs. Wyndham, of Petworth, the Rev George Arthur Clarkson, and the Misses Clarkson.

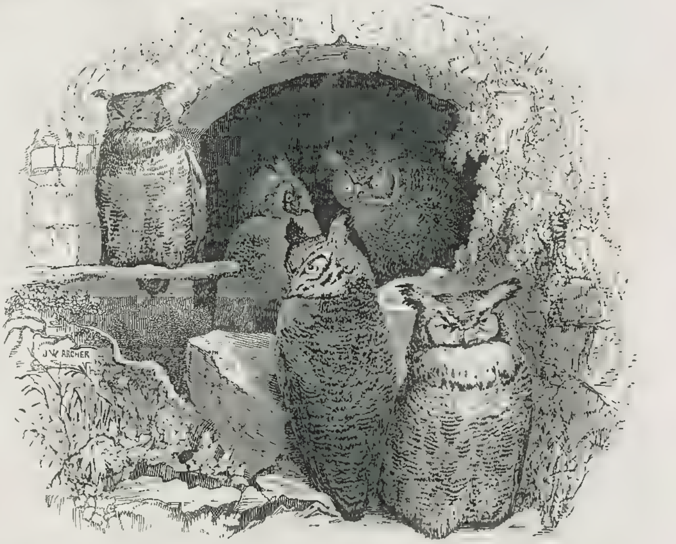
The water in the great pond, which covers 80 acres of ground in Burton Park, has been let off, and a large supply of fish has been sent as a present to Arundel Castle. The quantity taken is immense; one pike weighed 35lbs. Several pieces of ordnance have arrived from Woolwich to fire the royal salutes; and a detachment of the London Police arrived on Monday to preserve order.

Arundel, Thursday Evening.

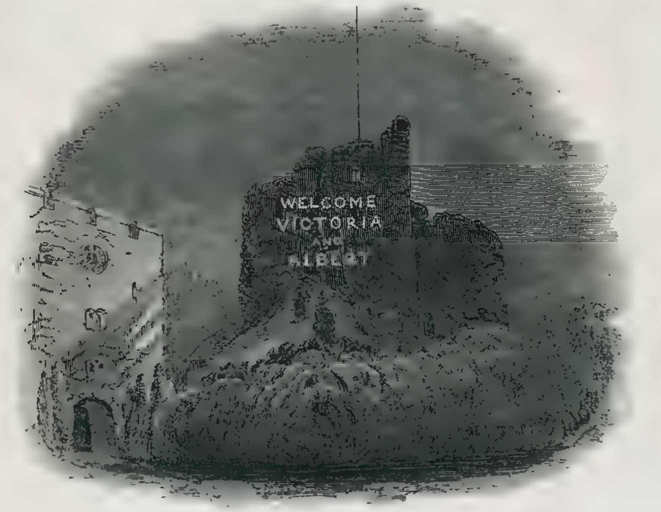
We are enabled to continue our report of the Royal sojourn up to this evening.

Last evening, in addition to the party already assembled at the Castle, the Bishop of Chichester, and Colonel and Mrs. Wyndham joined the circle at dinner. After the banquet, the Ethiopian Serenaders, who had been especially engaged for the occasion, performed several pieces, with which her Majesty, the Prince, and assembled guests were highly amused. In the course of the evening, several of the surrounding gentry were presented; and her Majesty withdrew to her private apartments at half-past eleven. The company, after partaking of refreshments, served in the Dining-Room, in the most recherché style, likewise retired.

This morning, her Majesty, accompanied in the same carriage by his Royal Highness Prince Albert, the Duchess of Norfolk, and the Duchess of Sutherland; a second carriage, by Lord and Lady John Russell, the Marchioness of Douro, and the Hon. Miss Napier, the Ladies in Waiting; as well as by her noble host, on a splendid charger, and the remainder of her Majesty's suite, left the Castle at half-past ten for Petworth House, distant about ten miles. The Royal and noble party returned to luncheon at two o'clock, to which, Ann,



THE OWLS IN THE CASTLE KEEP.



THE KEEP ILLUMINATED.

Owl called ye Chancellor awakeneth and singeth.

Odds bobs! here's a riot,
Disturbing our quiet,
What! what's the row now,
Fire—fire—I declare!
A [illegible] affair
Where [illegible] the Mayor!
Call the Yeomanry out
The rabble to rout.
Habeas Corpus suspend
Till the thing's at an end.
Hurrah for the Queen!
What can that shout mean?
In the days of the Georges
Such furious orgies
Were promptly put down
By a nod from the crown
What a pity that Pitt
Has made his exit.
I doubt and I doubt
Some screw there is out,
I fear [illegible]
[illegible] clear
The tears from my eyes
My groans and my sighs,
Like tempest and rain,
I cannot restrain,
But sit and complain
In vain all in vain,
Hoo-hoo-a screw's loose tis plain—very plain

Young Owl called Lord John speaketh, and reproveth the Chancellor

Peace, O querulous owl!
Be calm, thou ancient fowl;
The days are gone
Thou doatedst on;
Our ruler now is loved, instead of feared.

This day our gracious Queen
At Arundel is seen;
Sedition's brow
Is laid full low,
Those sounds are shouts that hail a name revered;
So clear thine ancient throat,
And change thy croaking note
For joyful shout,
And join the rout
That hails Victoria's name with joyous din
But lo, what sprites of fame,
To hear that potent name,
Appear again
With duteous strain
Their homage here to pay to England's Queen
[Owls perform a stately pavan, and retire somewhat.]

Shade of Sir Bevis, of Hampton, appeareth, and singeth

When wight Kyng Arthur he dydde reign,
He was a goodlye Kynge;
The knights that followed inne hys trayne
Thys caroll wont to syng.

But hadde these champyons seen thys daye,
They soothlie mote have sayde,
And sung, to boot, in roundelaye,
Here is a table spread.
Thatte he who made the puddinge rare
Had stared, belike, to see—
And owned thatte was but sorrie fare
Of barlye meal made hee.

Or hadde great Arthur's self been here,
He would have sworne by fay,
Here is a Dame for queenly cheer
Hath borne the bell awaye.
[Shade of Sir Bevis maketh a legge, and standeth back.]

Shade of Earl Roger appeareth, and chaunteth.

Whenne Norman William ruled the land,
Thys castell to maintayne
To me hee gave, who crossed the sea,
For Hastings fight with meyne.

And here at feast and wassail high,
Fair dames and warriours free
Made ring the halls of Arundel
With daunce and mynstrelsye.

But not in bower or banquet hall
Eretime was ever seen
Such stately pageant and renowne,
As greets this beauteous Queen
[Shade of Earl Roger maketh seemlye obeisaunce, and taketh hys place over against Sir Bevis of Hampton.]

Shade of Queen Maude appeareth at ye window of her chamber and singeth.

Of these fayre realms by Stephen's might
Despoyled, in exile lorne
To foreign land across the seas,
My cardise frame was borne.

Yet still, in merry Arundel,
My sprite doth wander round,
Where erst an errant queen I came,
And faith and shelter found.

Lo! here, on thys auspicious day,
By mortal ken I'm seen
And [illegible] appears,
[illegible] England's Queen.

Chorus of Sprites

Ladye of ancient lineage, hail!
Hail, Prince of noble line!
His Grace attends—the banquet waits;
Be pleased—O Queen—to dine.

Old Nightingale, the Keeper appears in the body, with hys long pole. The Sprites vanish and the Owlis disperse, each bird to hys perch.

[Here endeth the Masque.]

of architecture. Next to this are the cow-sheds; and separated by a yard is the dairy itself, an octagon building, surmounted with a cupola and lantern, and surrounded by projecting enriched colonnade of wood, beautifully carved in the Tudor style, with alternate heads of lion (Howard) and horse (Arundel), at each pendant. The interior is lit with seven windows and the lantern; the roof pannelled oak, and the walls of the purest porcelain tiles, with a moulding of the Maltravers' pet ornament in Royal blue, carried round each compartment of the eight sides; projecting troughs of marble run along seven of the sides, for the milk pans, which are all uniform, edged with blue; in the centre is a marble basin and fountain, on either side of which are tripod tables, seven of beautifully seived marble; the floor is composed of earthen encaustic tiles, sexagon shape, the interstices filled with triangular-shaped tiles of the same manufacture, coloured black. Connected with this by an open corridor, continuous to the colonnade, and of similar style, is the building shown in our Engraving, forming a residence for the Dairyman, Churning Room, &c. The left-hand window lights an apartment fitted especially for a reading room, for the use of the Duchess; opening on a bird-terrace walk, at either end of which are alcoves in the rustic style, and communicating with the ornamental garden below, which was laid out from the design of the Ladies Mary and Adelza Fitzalan Howard.

We must not close this Report without acknowledgment of the facilities afforded to our Artists at the Castle, and the readiness with which access and information have been given in aid of the completeness and accuracy of the annexed Illustrations.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON ALMANACK—SECOND EDITION OF 40,000.
This Day, Price 1s., gilt edges,
THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON ALMANACK,
AND PICTURESQUE CALENDAR FOR 1847

This ALMANACK is submitted to the Public by the Proprietors, with confidence of its superiority over its predecessors. The Work was commenced in 1845, with a view of furnishing a Repository of Useful Knowledge of permanent value for constant reference, in Astronomy, Astronomical Occurrences, and the Natural History of the Year

The ASTRONOMICAL DEPARTMENT has been placed entirely under the superintendence of JAMES GLAISHER, Esq , F R.A S., and of the Royal Observatory at Greenwich

On the third page of each month is a series of tableaux of Memorable Events, carrying out in a true spirit what is usually and properly introduced into our Almanack; not for occasional reference only, but to cherish respect for these landmarks of British History

The fourth page of each month is devoted to Natural History. The whole of this portion is from the very able pen of Mrs. LOUDON, and the interesting series of Illustrations to this department has been drawn and engraved by Miss LOUDON, under the immediate superintendence of Mrs LOUDON

The Calendar Illustrations are from the masterly pencil of WILLIAM HARVEY, and engraved in the first style of Art, by LINTON, illustrative of the National Sports.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 5, 1846.

War is a very different thing to make than to write about; and General Taylor, on the territory of Mexico, could enlighten many a scribe of the "States" as to the difference between a campaign in the field and a campaign upon paper. It is a wholesome check upon all men that they cannot move singly or in bodies without money; that they cannot fight unless they eat; and that, when five or six thousand troops are brought together, every difficulty that would stand in the way of one man is multiplied five thousand times. These difficulties of the field, experienced by the American army, are beginning to tell on the Treasury. They are met personally with courage and gallantry enough; but the invasion even of a desert, if it is very extensive, is hard work; add a sprinkling of enemies, not always the bravest, but who can and will fight sometimes, when they make up their minds to it, and the history of a military movement becomes by no means conquest made easy. The climate, the want of communications, and the immense territory are doing more against the American forces than the Mexicans themselves; and the enemies that are met with in such natural causes are the only foes that are invincible; they weary the most iron strength, and exhaust the most fiery courage. The French can always rout Abd-el-Kader; but the deserts and mountains remain—things against which weapons are useless. War is much easier and more decisive in results in an old community, with many centres of population, and abounding in resources, than in an imperfectly settled or unpeopled region. Mexico might have a dozen hostile armies on her territory at once, and hardly know it. Occupation of the fringes and skirts of such an empire is of very little consequence. The difficulty is how to get at the heart. By wasting money enough it may be done; and, with a proper disregard of the cost, the Americans may manage to sink as many millions sterling as they choose on the portion of Mexican soil they hold at present. If they have a fancy for a national debt, they can now make a very good beginning; but we hope the common sense of the republic, generally supposed to be sharpest where it comes in contact with money matters, will extricate them from the embarrassment they have plunged into in time. There are many symptoms of this: the peace party is gaining the majority in the elections; the Presidency of James K. Polk is drawing to a close; and the mob of office-hunters begin to look beyond him. Mr. Webster's speech at Boston, just received, is an able denunciation of the whole of the President's Mexican policy. He says distinctly that

> The Mexican war is universally odious throughout the United States, and we have yet to find any Sempronius who raises his voice for it. The war, in its origin, was a Presidential war. But the Constitution declares that Congress alone shall have the power of declaring war; and I beg to know where, when, and how they so declared it?

He adds further on this point:—

> Congress alone has power to declare war; and yet it is obvious, under the present construction, that if the President is resolved to involve the country in a war, he may do it. This, I say, is a great misjudgment on the part of the President; it is a clear violation of his duty; in my judgment it is an impeachable offence. The great objection to this war is, that it is illegal in its character. There has been a great violation of duty on the part of the President. He has plunged the country into war, whereas, unless in case of invasion of our actual limits, he has no right so to do. In that case of such invasion, the power does exist in the President to take measures to repel aggression. But to go out of our limits, and declare war for a foreign occupation of what does not belong to us, is no part of the power invested in our President by our Constitution. So much for the origin of the war.

It is remarkable enough, and a most gratifying proof of the value and efficiency of open discussion of such matters by the press, that this movement in America is towards the general opinion of Europe, and particularly of England, where the wild, rash policy of the President was especially condemned, and the results predicted, with singular accuracy. It was a case of the lookers-on seeing the game better than the players; payment of the stakes has opened their eyes. Mr. Webster thus pursues his subject:—

> Who knows anything about the war, except that our armies have reached to Monterey, and will reach to Mexico if they can? And what then? Is the whole country to be fortified—taken possession of as American territory—a territory equal to the formation of forty new states? These are questions which it is time for us to put with sobriety and seriousness. It is time for us to know what are the objects and designs of our Government. The natural justice of a war it is, perhaps, not an American habit to consider. But it is an American habit to count the cost, and I may be indulged a moment while I look at that.

A sum in simple addition does the rest: on such questions, figures of speech are nothing to the figures of arithmetic; and Mr. Webster proves that the American Government is at the present moment spending more than double its revenue! All the old Monarchies of Europe cannot match such reckless financial profligacy. It is high time the "Spirit of the Counting-house" should step in and rectify the balance.

The momentous 30th of November, which was last year celebrated by such a crush and crowd of railway plans poured in upon the Board of Trade, such a driving of express trains and post-horses, and such an amount of official Sabbath breaking that Ministers were obliged to promise Sir Robert Inglis never to do so again, has passed over this week almost unmarked. The requirements of the Standing Orders were completed without the slightest disturbance of that gentlemanly ease and composure which inhabit Government Offices. The transfer of the lodgment of plans from the Board of Trade to the new Railway Commission caused some mistakes, as, by some great oversight, no notice of the change had been given: parties were, therefore, sent from the Board of Trade to the office of the Commissioners as they arrived. The attendants, who had good reason to remember the 30th of November, were all rejoiced at the ease with which the day of dread was got through; and, in their good humour at being released from the larger portion of their work, could not bring themselves to believe but it was all got rid of to the new establishment: so they incontinently sent applicants with plans of canals, turnpike roads, improvements, &c., after the railways, to the same locality, from whence they were as promptly sent back again. But, short as the days are, the 30th, this time, was long enough for the work. The new lines proposed are but few; and the greater part of the Bills are applied for by old companies, for extensions and branches.

Abolition of Punishment of Death. On Wednesday a public meeting was held in the London Tavern, Alderman Sidney in the chair, to adopt measures to secure the total abolition of capital punishment. Messrs. Gilpin, Vincent, and several others having denounced the punishment of death as a remnant of barbarism, equally opposed to divine legislation, the law of nature, and the civilisation of the present century, a petition to Parliament against its continuance was adopted

COURT AND HAUT TON.

The Duchess of Kent.—Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, attended by Baroness de Speth, left Cassiobury Park, Herts, the residence of her Majesty the Queen Dowager, on Tuesday morning, for Frogmore House, Windsor. Her Royal Highness was accompanied by the young Count Mensdorff, who, it is understood, will remain on a visit to her Royal Highness for some weeks.

Departure of the Grand Duke and Duchess of Mecklenburgh Strelitz. Their Royal Highnesses the Hereditary Grand Duke and Duchess of Mecklenburgh Strelitz, left London on Monday, on their return to their own dominions

The Count de Montemolin.—The Count de Montemolin, the eldest son of Don Carlos, has, during the week, received the visits of several distinguished individuals. Amongst his visitors was Lord Palmerston, who remained with him for some time. On Wednesday, the Count visited Westminster Abbey, the Temple, and Lincoln's Inn.

Return of the French Ambassador to London.—His Excellency Count de St. Aulaire, the French Ambassador, arrived at his residence in Manchester-square on Monday, from Paris.

Brighton Fashionables. Lord Castlereagh has taken one of the largest mansions in Brunswick-square. The Earl of Fingall has taken a residence in Brunswick-terrace. The Marquis and Marchioness of Aylesbury are expected to pass the winter in Brighton. The Hon. Lady Palmer has arrived at the Bedford Hotel. The Duke and Duchess of St. Albans, Lord and Lady Cottenham, &c., are prolonging their stay at Kemp Town. Sir Augustus and Lady Clifford are expected here shortly.

Lord George Bentinck. Lord George Bentinck has arrived at Knowsley, the Earl of Derby's seat in Lancashire, on a visit to Lord and Lady Stanley.

Aristocratic Marriage.—The marriage of the Lady Elizabeth Grosvenor, third daughter of the Marquis and Marchioness of Westminster, with the Hon. Beilby Lawley, eldest son of Lord Wenlock, was solemnised on Saturday last at St. George's Church, Hanover-square.

Death of Lady Elizabeth Whitbread.—We regret to record the death of Lady Elizabeth Whitbread, the last survivor of the children of the first Earl Grey, sister of the late and aunt of the present Earl.

Illness of Sir G. Cockburn.—We regret to state that this officer, who is staying at his country seat, High Beach, Essex, has lately experienced an attack of paralysis. We are happy, however, to add, that the latest accounts received in town are of a favourable nature

Mr. Claude Lascelles.—Mr. Claude Lascelles is steadily recovering from the effects of his late accident.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

THE WEATHER.

During the past week, the metropolis has been visited by frost, the first time this winter. The reading of the thermometer, in the previous part of the month, had ranged between 40 deg. and 60 deg. On the afternoon of Thursday, the 26th of November, the cold suddenly set in, and the reading of the thermometer descended to 33 deg. in the night. Since then, we have had a steady cold. The following have been the highest and lowest readings each day, as noted by good thermometers at Blackheath:—

On Friday, Nov 27,	the highest was	51 deg.,	the lowest was	33 deg.
Saturday, Nov 28,	„	40	„	29½
Sunday, Nov 29,	„	39	„	20
Monday, Nov. 30,	„	32	„	25
Tuesday, Dec. 1,	„	32	„	25
Wednesday, Dec. 2,	„	34	„	32

It will be seen that the reading descended on Sunday night to a very low point, being 12 deg. below that of freezing water. J. G.

Royal Society.—The anniversary meeting of the Royal Society was held on Monday, on which occasion the President, the Marquis of Northampton, delivered his customary annual address, passing under review the progress of science during the past year. The Copley gold medal, which was happily called by Sir Humphrey Davy "the ancient olive crown of the Royal Society," was awarded to M. le Verrier, and received for him, at his request, by Sir John Herschel. One of the Royal gold medals and the Rumford gold medal were awarded to Professor Faraday, for his brilliant discoveries in magnetism, published in the Philosophical Transactions; and the second Royal gold medal was awarded to Professor Owen, for his able and elaborate paper "On the Belemnite," also published in the Philosophical Transactions. The officers and council for the ensuing year were then elected, after which the Society dined together at the Crown and Anchor.

Royal Academy Elections.—At a meeting of the members of the Royal Academy on Tuesday last, Mr. W. E. Frost and Mr. P. F. Poole were elected associates of that body. Mr. Frost is known by a picture from "Comus," and by his "Diana Surprised by Actæon," in the exhibition of the present year. "A Scene from the Great Plague," and the "Visitation and Surrender of Syon Nunnery," are two well known pictures by Mr Poole.

Society of Arts. The first meeting for the session, which had been postponed on account of the extensive repairs and re-decorations was held on Wednesday evening. The chief business of the evening was the reception of the reports of committees and the preliminary matters for the commencement of the business of the session. It was announced that the first meeting for illustrations would be held on Wednesday se'nnight.

Botanical Society of London.—The tenth anniversary meeting of this Society was held an Monday last at the Society's rooms, 20, Bedford-street, Strand, J. E. Gray, Esq., F.R S., President, in the chair. From the Report of the Council it appeared that 27 new members had been elected since the last anniversary, and that the Society now consisted of 201 members. Some thousands of very valuable specimens of British and foreign plants had been received, and would shortly be distributed to the members. The Report was unanimously adopted, after which a ballot took place for the Council for the ensuing year, when the President was re-elected, and he nominated J. Miers, Esq., F.R.S., and E. Doubleday, Esq., F.L S., Vice Presidents.

Improvements at the Carlton Club.—The improvements now going on at this club-house will be on a magnificent scale. The building will be considerably enlarged, and, on the completion of the whole, will present a front larger than that of its neighbour, the Reform Club.

Re-Opening of St. James's Church, Piccadilly.—This fine ecclesiastical structure, which for a considerable time past has been undergoing repair and redecoration, with the addition of a painted window, was re-opened for public worship last Sunday. The most noticeable feature is the painted window. This portion of the renovation of St. James's has long been contemplated, it having been proposed so far back as thirty or forty years ago to fill up the window with a copy of the Transfiguration of Raffaelle; but various circumstances occurred to prevent the execution of the design, and it was only recently that effective steps were taken to carry out the long-contemplated improvements by the appointment of a committee, strengthened with the requisite funds. It appears that the views of the committee were more ambitious than the results of their labours would manifest, as it is stated that they originally fixed on a very beautiful sketch in the modern style, by Corbould, representing, in various compartments, the Birth and Death of our Saviour. The Bishop of London, however, having expressed a strong opinion in favour of a more ancient style of art, the design which has been so effectively carried out was selected. The beautiful carvings of Gibbons over the altar have been judiciously touched, bringing out more forcibly the requisite richness of the foliage, and a rail of marble has been added round the altar.

The Parish of St. Pancras.—A numerously-attended meeting of the Board of Guardians of St. Pancras was held on Tuesday to consider the report of the inquest held on Joseph Woodward, a child two years old. (An account of the inquest will be found under the usual head.) Mr. J. B. E. Wright was in the chair. The long detention of the poor at the workhouse before they are relieved was severely denounced. Mr. Marley contended that the inquest was unfairly conducted, and that the verdict was that of the Coroner, not the Jury. Finally, however, resolutions for ensuring a more speedy relief of the poor, in rotation, were adopted.

Parish of Marylebone.—At a full meeting of the Board of Guardians, held on Tuesday, at the workhouse, an inquiry was instituted into the conduct of the relieving officer and inspector, with respect to the case of Louisa Mordaunt, whose death "was caused from the want of the common necessaries of life." Sir J. Hamilton was in the chair. A letter from the Poor Law Commissioners was read, requesting the details of the case, and a full statement of the number and duties of the relieving and inspecting officers. Mr. Messer, Langley, the inspector, and Mackenzie, the beadle, were examined, and, after a long discussion, the two first were, by formal resolution, severely reprimanded for neglect of duty.

Sheriffs' Fund.—The half-yearly general meeting was held on Monday at the London Coffee House, Ludgate-hill, when the chair was taken by Mr Alderman and Sheriff Challis, who was supported by Mr. Sheriff Kennard, Mr. Alderman Johnson, the late Lord Mayor, Mr. Under Sheriff Tilliard, Mr. Deputy Bedford, Mr. Eagleton, and several other of its active friends. The report recommended the appropriation of £500 from the permanent fund to the Elizabeth Fry Refuge for the Relief of Destitute Females, on the principles long advocated by the Society. Several members spoke in favour of the recommendation, which, on the proposal of the late Lord Mayor, was agreed to, and the officers and committee for the ensuing year were appointed.

Association for Relieving the Poor in the City of London.—The annual general meeting of the members of the above society, which is more generally known by the name of the "City Kitchen," was held, on Wednesday night, at the London Coffee-house, Ludgate-hill, the Lord Mayor in the chair. From the report it appears that the City Kitchen was opened for the season last year on the 5th of January, and remained open for twelve weeks, during which time they distributed 25,640 cwt. of coals. The Committee had discontinued the practice of giving potatoes, and had increased the quantity of coals for every ticket from 89lbs, to 112lbs. The receipts for the year amounted to £1924 13s. 9d., and the expenditure to £1917 7s. 7d., leaving a balance at the banker's of £7 6s 2d. Alderman Wilson moved, and the Reverend J. Harding, M.A., seconded the adoption of the report. The following gentlemen were then elected as a Committee for the ensuing year:—Alderman Wilson, Alderman Gibbs, Alderman Hughes, Rev. James Harding, M.A., J. T. Bedford, Esq., G. Simpson, Esq , Rev. Michael Gibbs, M.A., the Treasurer, President, and the Secretary. A vote of thanks was passed to the Chairman, and the meeting separated.

Taking the Veil.—On Wednesday the ceremony for the reception of two postulants to what is termed the Order of Mercy, took place at the Chapel adjoining the Convent of Mercy, in Parker's-row, Bermondsey. It having been known that the Hon. Miss Middleton, and Miss Byrne, another lady of distinguished family, were about to seclude themselves from the world by taking the white veil of this order, long before the appointed hour a very numerous assemblage had filled the body of the chapel. After the usual ceremonies, the postulants retired for the purpose of putting off their secular dresses. These habiliments were both alike, elegant bridal robes, each consisting of white satin, beneath a splendid robe of lace. The head-dress decorated with a profusion of orange blossoms, surmounted by elegant lace veils. During their absence, the choir, led by the Rev. Mr. Collingwood, sung the psalms "In exitu Israel." The habits were th[illegible] blessed, sprinkled with holy water, and taken to the postulants. The white veil was also blessed, &c. The choir sung an Otiphen; the novices slowly advancing, knelt down, and, after some further ceremony, they were invested with the wi[illegible] veil and the cloak of the church, and subsequently prostrated themselves before the altar, while the hymn "Veni Creator" was sung in full choir. The ceremony, which commenced at twelve did not conclude till two o'clock, and each of the young ladies, who looked in remarkably good health and spirits, answered the interrogatories of the celebrant with an exceedingly firm and clear voice, and bore the ceremony without apparent fatigue.

The Deposit of Railway Plans at the Board of Trade.—Our readers will recollect that last year we had to describe a very exciting scene, which took place on the night of Sunday, the 30th of November, at the Board of Trade, in consequence of the general anxiety "to be in time" with the railway plans, &c., at the Board of Trade. The scene presented on Monday last contrasted strongly with that witnessed on the same date in 1845. The doors in Whitehall were thrown open at an early hour. In virtue of a standing order passed last session, it was necessary that all plans should be lodged before eight P.M. The new commissioners, however, had arranged to receive all lodged before midnight. But, taught by experience, the majority of promoters had this year got everything ready for lodgment a few days before. At intervals, on Monday, cabs drove up to the commissioners' rooms, and after the documents they contained had been deposited, drove off again without any appearance of bustle or excitement. The total number of lodgments of plans effected amounts to 260, being about 40 in number fewer than appeared by notice in the Gazette, computed at 300. The number deposited last year amounted to 678, including Scotch and Irish; so that for this session there are about half that number

Smithfield Club Cattle Show.—Active preparations are being made at the Horse Bazaar, King-street, Portman-square, by fixing cattle-stalls and sheep-pens for the reception of stock intended to be exhibited for prizes. The stalls, &c., will be on an extensive scale, and the upper portion of the building will be appropriated for agricultural implements and machinery, roots, seeds, &c. The stewards of the club will appoint cattle judges, who will give their decision on the merits and breed of the stock offered for competition, and award the respective prizes on Tuesday next, December 8th, and on the following day the premises will be opened for inspection and sale of cattle, &c., and the exhibition will continue open four days successively, and will be lighted up with gas in the evening

Westminster-bridge.—The relaying of the foot pavement on this bridge and the wooden parapet is proceeding very rapidly, and it is now said that the bridge will be re-opened to the public in a fortnight.

Further Reduction in the Price of Bread.—On Monday morning nearly all the bakers at the west end of the metropolis reduced the price of their bread from 8d. and 7½d. to 7d. and 6½d. the 4lb. loaf. Many of them in the neighbourhood of St Giles's are charging as low as 6d. for bread of a similar quality Country bread, which is not weighed to the customer, is sold at 5½d. the loaf.

Births and Deaths in the Metropolis.—The total number of deaths registered in the metropolitan districts during the week ending Saturday, November 28, was 944, a return considerably below both the autumnal and annual averages, in which the numbers stand respectively 1,000 and 968. During the same period 1,273 births were registered, being an excess over the mortality of 329.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

ANOTHER CHECK TO RAILWAY LITIGATION.

In the Court of Common Pleas on Thursday, a case was tried Lees v. Nicholson the result of which is calculated to check the reckless spirit of lit[illegible] against provisional committeemen. It was an action brought by Mr. Charles Lees, a surveyor, against Mr. William Nicholson, a gentleman residing in Manchester-street, to recover £100, being the defendant's proportion of debt, which it was alleged, as one of the provisional directors of the Southern Counties Union Railway, he owed to the plaintiff, who surveyed the line. The whole bill charged was £3250, which had been reduced by the payment of £1350. The defendant pleaded not indebted.

Mr. Sergeant Byles having stated the case, called the following witnesses:

George Pellit, a clerk in the employ of Mr. Wells, the solicitor to the company, deposed to the receipt of a letter from Mr Nicholson, accepting his appointment as one of the provisional directors of the company, and also accepting a number of shares.

J. B. Wells, the solicitor, gave evidence as to the origin of the company, and the appointment of a surveyor.

Cross-examined: Mr. Lees, the plaintiff, was witness's brother-in-law, as was also the solicitor who brought the action. In all there were about 250 provisional directors; out of which 100, along with Mr. Nicholson, gave their consent. About 150 paid in their shares.

Joseph Lees, a sharebroker, of Manchester, deposed that the firm with which he was connected were sharebrokers of the Company, and that he had showed Mr. Nicholson the prospectus with his name on it. The note produced, with Mr. Nicholson's name written in it, was filled up by witness, but he did not see that gentleman sign it.

Dugald M'Farlane, of the Register Office, produced the registry of the company. The first registration was in the name of Gadsden alone, but, subsequently, the names of a number of provisional directors were registered; among others that of Mr. Nicholson. The names were written all in one hand-writing, that of the secretary, he supposed.

Mr. Lees was recalled, and deposed to his having been present at the allotment of the shares, and that 100 were set apart for the defendant. It was, he believed, in pursuance of the letter received from the latter.

George Adam Jacobs said he was acting secretary in November last year. On the 8th of December he sent out the notices of the allotment to the applicants for shares. They were given to a clerk to be posted. The capital was fixed at £2,500,000, but out of all the shares issued, there was but £150 paid up. Not one of the provisional directors had paid anything on their shares.

Cross-examined: The panic had taken place before this time, but he could not say what the reasons were that caused an allotment of shares under such circumstances. He was not aware that the provisional board of directors were the real parties who were conducting this prosecution, in order to place all the expenses on the general provisional director.

This being the whole of the case for the plaintiff,

Mr. Justice Cresswell, on the application of Mr. Martin, ordered the plaintiff to be nonsuited, inasmuch as there was no evidence as to the responsibility of the defendant. The decision of the Exchequer in "Wyld v. Hopkins" was the ground upon which the application of Mr Martin was founded.

Mr. Sergeant Byles tendered a bill of exceptions to the ruling of the judges.

CROCKFORD'S CLUB-HOUSE.

In the Court of Exchequer, on Wednesday, a case was tried—Crockford v Lord Maidstone. It was an action on behalf of the plaintiff, Mrs. Sarah Crockford, executrix of the late William Crockford, who had been for many years manager of the well-known club in St. James's-street which bore his name. The action was brought to recover 20 guineas for the use and occupation of the club for the year 1840 (being 10 guineas subscription, and a similar sum, the entrance-fee on election thereto), and £75 for dinners and wines. The defendant pleaded, first, payment of £37 17s. 6d. into court, in discharge of the last-mentioned demand, and "never indebted" with respect to the remainder. In addition to those pleas, he also pleaded "that the said club was a common gaming-house."

The case lasted all day on Wednesday, and was resumed on Thursday. Evidence having been given as to the supply of the dinners, wines, &c., Mr. James addressed the Jury on behalf of Lord Maidstone, and contended that the defence had been made out.

The Lord Chief Baron, in summing up to the jury, said, that in his opinion the house in question was not a "common gaming-house" under the meaning of the Act, there being no evidence to prove it, the only evidence going to show that several members of the club did at various times play among themselves for a considerable amount, and that the custom existed to a most deplorable extent.

The Jury retired, and, after a short consultation, returned a verdict for the plaintiff for the full amount.

Upon the Jury giving in their verdict for the full amount in the above case,

The Lord Chief Baron said that he thought it a duty to call the attention of the Counsel in the case to the very loose manner in which the verdict had been returned. The verdict was for the full amount; but for a great number of the items in the bill of demand there was not a tittle of evidence in support thereof. He would, therefore, advise the Counsel upon both sides to strike out from the amount of the verdict such articles for which no evidence had been given.

The proposition of his Lordship having been acceded to by both parties, the verdict was entered by consent for the reduced sum of £54 14s. 6d., exclusive of the sum paid into Court.

Alleged Libel.—In the same Court, on Wednesday, an action was tried for an alleged libel upon Mr. W. J. O'Connell, published in the Northern Star and Leeds General Advertiser, of which Mr. Feargus O'Connor and Mr Joshua Hobson were the registered proprietors. The libel imputed to Mr. O'Connell that he could only be seen on Sundays, as he was fearful of arrest, and that he had embezzled money entrusted to him. It was proved, on the part of the defendants, that they had made a retractation of the libellous charges. The Jury found a verdict for the plaintiff; damages £50, including £5 paid into Court.

The Robberies on the Great Western Railway.—The Court of Common Pleas has been occupied several days with the case of Wareham v. Prance, and others. It was an action of trespass, in which the plaintiff sought to recover damages for a false imprisonment against the defendants, Mr. Vaughan Prance, a solicitor at Nether Stowey, Somerset; Mr. Joseph Collard, Superintendent of Police at the London station of the Great Western Railway, and Mr. Charles Nash, late clerk to Messrs. Maples and Co., solicitors, Old Jewry, by whom the plaintiff and his wife had been taken up and detained in custody for a night, on the 20th of August, 1845, on suspicion of being connected with several railway robberies, for one of which two persons, Garrett and Maynard, had been transported. The defendants put a number of pleas upon the record besides the [illegible]ral issue of "Not Guilty," the substance of which was, that the plaintiff was taken into custody upon reasonable suspicion of being connected with the felony committed by Maynard and Garrett. After all the evidence and the arguments of counsel had been heard, the Chief Justice entered most minutely into all the evidence, and having left the case most fully in all its aspects and bearings before the Jury, they retired to consider their verdict, which, when returned, was twofold first, for the defendant Prance; secondly, for the plaintiff, as against Collard and Nash, with one farthing damages.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

THE INDIFFERENCE OF THE PARISH AUTHORITIES OF ST. PANCRAS

On Monday, Mr. Mills concluded an inq[illegible] adjourned from a few days previously, at the Victory, Albany street, Regent's park, respecting the death of Joseph Woodward, aged 23 months, whose death, it was alleged, was hastened by want of food.

The mother of the child stated that she resides at No. 90, Alba[illegible]treet. The deceased died on the 22nd ult., after about a week's illness, during which Mr. Lambert, a surgeon, prescribed for it. Her husband had been in prison for some time for debt, and was released on the day of the child's death. During his confinement she was in great want, with two other children besides deceased. She applied for relief in the first instance on the 1st of October, at the St. Pancras Workhouse She received an order for two loaves of bread, but represented that she was without fire or proper nourishment for the deceased child, at that time in a sickly state. Money was, however, refused her, but the asylum of the workhouse was offered to her. That she refused, because she must then lose the little occasional work she had. She went a second time to the workhouse on the 2nd of November, and was again relieved with bread, but nothing else. She received similar relief subsequently, but never received any money. Admission to the workhouse with her children was again offered to her, which she would not accept. Two of her children could eat bread, and were thankful for it; but deceased could not. She had not represented to the parish authorities that her child was ill. She only spoke of the destitution of the family. In order that her children might have a little food, she had herself, during the last seven weeks, gone for two days without any. Her chief nourishment was a little tea and dry bread. Her landlady had given her arrowroot for the deceased, and she had procured biscuits for it, but it had lost its appetite for a few days preceding its death. Before and at the time death took place, deceased had more food than it could eat. Her other children had not, but they were healthy

Mr. Lambert, surgeon, of Albany-street, had never seen the deceased child alive, but had prescribed for it according to the symptoms described to him by the mother. Since death, he had examined the body. The child was a very small one for its age, emaciated, and deformed. He had found extensive disease of some of the internal organs, which had been the cause of its death.

Mrs. Woodward, the mother, having been recalled, stated that when she went to the workhouse, she was kept waiting, sometimes from nine, A.M., to n[illegible] five, P.M., before she obtained the relief of a loaf or loaves. The place was crowded with applicants, kept waiting as long as she had been kept, more or less. On the day when the inquest commenced, a person from the workhouse called and inquired into her condition. He gave her 2s. and an order for two loaves, and told her, when that relief was exhausted, to apply to the workhouse.

Mr. Coultard, assistant relieving officer, here stated that he recollected the woman calling on the 15th of October, and having been relieved with bread. She made a statement, to his recollection, that her case was an urgent one. She did not apply again for 17 or 18 days. If she had applied sooner and repeatedly, and urgently, the condition of herself and family would have been inquired into, although that would have been going beyond what the law permitted. She and her family belonged to Marylebone, and had been removed thither about three years ago, at the expense of the parish of St. Pancras. They were, therefore, strictly speaking, entitled to no out-door relief in St. Pancras. All that parish was bound to do, was to take them into the workhouse, and then pass them to St. Marylebone.

The Jury returned this verdict—"Died from effusion into the cavity of the chest, produced by natural causes"; and, in returning that verdict, the Jury unanimously expressed their opinion, founded on the evidence—"That certain of the relieving officers of the parish of St. Pancras have been grossly apathetic and negligent, respecting the family of which the deceased child was a member, when the direful wants of the family were made known to them on two or more occasions by the mother. The Jury further say that proper attempts were not made by the said officers to distinguish between the necessitous or the truly deserving poor in St. Pancras, and those of persons who are not so deeply in need of food, firing, and clothing, as were Mrs. Woodward and her family, living at home, during the last seven weeks. They fear that a weak and orderly manner of application disarms the said officers of all apprehension that distress is real and urgent; they condemn most strongly the wanton and cruel system of keeping large numbers of persons waiting for relief, when early and prompt attention might, by other arrangement, be given; and they consider that, in the winter season, the practice is especially wicked and injurious. Finally, the Jury hope that immediate steps will be taken in the parish, that the errors which have become manifest at this inquest, and the system of relief to the poor, may be removed, in order both to render the system more humane, and prevent the necessity, in the approaching winter, of the summoning them and their brother inhabitants to inquire into causes of death, produced by the want of the common necessaries of life."

CURIOUS CASE OF MISTAKEN IDENTITY

During the last week, a fashionably-attired person, of gentlemanly appearance and address, representing himself as the Hon. Mr. Best, successfully preyed upon many of the tradesmen and innkeepers of Birmingham. An imposing "imperial," a showy gold watch, gold chain, and seals, fancifully disposed over a rich satin vest, and a rather handsome silver-headed cane, added considerably to the Hon. Mr Best's appearance. Numerous complaints of the gentleman's exploits having come to the ears of the police, a strict inquiry was instituted, and on Wednesday night (last week) a person answering the description of the gentlemanly thief was apprehended by Sub-Inspector Tandy, of the detective force, in a house in Digbeth; but, although this person was convicted, still the complaints were as numerous as ever from the victims of the gentleman's exploits.

On Thursday evening, "The Honourable Mr. Best" called at the shop of Miss Stephens, asked change for a sovereign, and while she was complying with the blandly-polite request, he snatched the 20s. from her hand, and made a most unceremonious retreat. Information was given to the police, who now entertained no doubt of there being "two Richmonds in the field." Having obtained an accurate description of the offender's person, Inspector Glossop discovered that he had resided for nearly a week at the Nelson Hotel, "faring sumptuously every day," on turtle and the best wines, but had suddenly departed without paying his bill, and carrying along with him the identical silver-mounted cane, which he twirled with such an imposing grace. The White Horse, in Congreve-street, had also been honoured with his patronage, where he had lived equally well, and from which he departed under somewhat similar circumstances. The Clarendon Hotel was his next resort, where, after some difficulty, he was traced by Mr. Glossop, who quietly sat down in the coffee-room which the Hon. Mr. Best frequented, and waited his arrival. Meanwhile he was busy in his usual style. Going into a milliner's shop, in Bull-street, he requested to be shown two caps, as his lady wished him to purchase them for a grand dress ball. They were accordingly handed him, when, under pretence of showing them to his lady, who was looking at some things in the window, he went to the door and never returned. Livery-street was the scene of his next operations, where he succeeded in snatching 20s. from the hand of a young woman who was about to favour him with change for a sovereign. No doubt imagining that he had done a pretty fair day's work, he returned to the Clarendon, where Mr. Glossop was quietly awaiting his arrival, along with one of the detective constables. The gentleman advanced into the room with an imposing air, and sat down, but observing the constable leave the room, his suspicions evidently became excited, and he was about to follow his example, when Mr. Glossop placed his hand against the door and prevented his egress until Miss Stephens arrived, who fully identified the now crest-fallen gentleman as the Hon. Mr. Best who had robbed her of 20s. He was then taken into custody and searched, when a most miscellaneous collection of articles were found upon him, consisting of a silver spoon marked "B" (evidently purloined from some hotel), a large snuff box, two pair of gloves, the stick which had been stolen from the Nelson, two new "doilleys," which had probably been borrowed from some shop he has been patronising, between £2 and £3, and two or three little silk purses containing programmes of the Monday evening organ performances, probably selected for their great resemblance, when folded up, to a £5 note. It does not appear that his operations have been altogether confined to this species of swindling, as several small files, seven keys, and some other articles of the apparatus of a "crack" burglar, were found in his possession. In consequence of some doubts existing in the mind of Mr. Glossop, the parties who had been victimised in the beginning of the week were then sent for, and here a scene of the most awkward and unfortunate kind occurred, for it was then discovered that the person apprehended by Sub-Inspector Tandy, sworn to by them, and committed on their evidence, was the wrong man, and that the gentleman now apprehended was the real culprit. The consternation and distress of the parties were extreme, and many of them fainted at the discovery

The case is certainly one of the most singular which has occurred for some time, and may be followed by somewhat disagreeable consequences.

The Forgeries by a Post-Master.—Morse, the late post-master at Barnet, charged with having forged post-office orders to the amount of nearly £3000, has been taken into custody at Ostend, where he had assumed the name of Morton.

Death of the Brother of Riego.—On Monday, Mr. Mills resumed an adjourned inquiry, at the Coronation, Seymour-street, Euston-square, touching the death of Miguel Riego del R[illegible]go, aged 67, form[illegible]y Canon of Oviedo. His death occurred suddenly on Friday (last week), at his residence at No. 57, in the above street. Mr. Clements, surgeon, of Euston-square, who made the post mortem examination, stated that the cause of death was organic disease of the heart. Admiral Sir Charles Malcolm, who had known deceased since 18[illegible]0, when he w[illegible] his guest at Oviedo, said that, from the state of deceased's health, latterly, he was not surprised at hearing of his death, and was satisfied that it resulted from natural causes. A verdict to that effect was given.

Extraordinary Suicide at the Tower. About four o'clock, on Sunday afternoon, a distressing case of suicide occurred in the Tower of London. Up to a few months since, three public-houses were licensed in the Tower, one of which, namely, the Stone Kitchen, which is as ancient as the time of Henry VIII, was occupied by Mr. Lund, yeoman-warder of the fortress. Another victualler, licensed for the Tower, named Sutcliffe, also received notice under the new regulations, that his house, called the Golden-chain, close to the Iron-gate, must also be done away with on the opening of the new canteen. As both these parties were more or less under the influence of the authorities of the Tower, they quietly succumbed to the new regulations, though at an immense sacrifice. The deceased, George Tidy, who was also a licensed victualler in the Tower, but not at all responsible to any of the authorities, resisted the order up to the last; and, imagining that his length of holding gave him a prescriptive right, refused to obey the injunction. Finding, however, that the order was imperative, and fearing to meet the consequences, at four o'clock on Sunday last, after having exhibited for some time symptoms of great mental distress, and frequently said he would never be taken out of that house alive, he cut his throat in his bed-room, inflicting a most frightful gash. Application was made to the nearest surgeon, but Tidy was dead.

POSTSCRIPT.

ALARMING COLLISION ON THE BOLTON RAILWAY

A[illegible]character took place on Wed[illegible]nd Leeds Railway, whereby a ballast-train, in which were twe[illegible]s, in the employ of the Company, was run against by a luggage-train travelling on the same line of rails, but in an opposite direction. The engine of the ballast-train was seriously damaged, and the carriage containing the work-people thrown off the rails and turned over.

The engineer and foreman of the luggage-train, seeing the opposite train approaching, shut off the steam, and had time to jump off, and escape uninjured. Assistance was procured as soon as possible, and the men, all of whom were more or less injured, were sent to their homes, where some of them at present remain in a very bad state.

The accident appears to have been occasioned by the wilful disobedien[illegible] orders by one of the engine-drivers, named Steventon, who has been s[illegible]d to hard labour for a month, and, in the event of the death of any of the men, he will be tried for manslaughter. The injuries received by some of the men are stated to be of a serious character.

LATEST FOREIGN NEWS.

ITALY.

A letter from Bologna, of the 25th ult., states that, on the preceding afternoon, a disturbance, which menaced serious consequences, occurred in that city. On the 23rd, a new piece was represented at the Theatre of Bologna, entitled "Christian VIII., King of Denmark." Several passages in the piece, alluding to and reprobating foreign intervention, were loudly applauded. The following day the piece was withdrawn by authority: but, on the theatre being opened, the house was filled by a turbulent mob, who commenced by tearing up the benches and destroying the handsome mirrors and lustres of the theatre. When the work of destruction was complete they withdrew, before a military force which had been sent for had time to arrive

It appears, by accounts from Rome, that since the visit made by the Pope to the Abbess of Minsk, at the convent in which she has found a refuge, his Holiness gave her an audience of three quarters of an hour, on the 4th of November last. These interviews of the head of the Roman Church with this persecuted witness of her faith, were understood to have been granted by Pius IX. for the express purpose of dissipating all doubt as to his belief of her story.

MEXICO.

Subsequently to the delivery of the papers by the Britannia, a private letter has been received, containing the following telegraphic despatch. If the contents be genuine, the communication is a most important one:

"Office of the Boston Times, Nov. 16, ten o'clock.

"The Great Western not in"

"A little Later from Mexico.—Santa Anna seized 2,000,000 of dollars intended for English capitalists. The money was on its way to Tampico for shipment in two British steamers, when Santa Anna seized it. Another revolutionary attempt in the City of Mexico, by parties in favour of annexation to the United States. President Salas addressed the mob, and quieted them. Dissensions in the Cabinet. Secretly adjourned.

"New York, Nov. 16, ten o'clock."

EGYPT.

Information has, it is said, been received from Egypt by a respectable mercantile house in Belfast, that the overflowing of the Nile has carried away 93 villages in Lower Egypt, with all the produce they contained, including a very large quantity of flax. The Government had set vigorously to work to repair the dykes.

WESTERN AUSTRALIA.

The Western Australia Chronicle contains a letter from Freemantle of the 14th of September, announcing the discovery of copper ore, as well as coal, in that part of Australia. Mr. Davey, upon whose land the ore was discovered, had smelted it, and obtained a small portion of copper, and was about to make further investigations when the news left.

POLICE.

CIRCUMSTANTIAL PROOF OF AN ARTFUL ROBBERY

At Lambeth Office, on Monday last, Edward Lock, alias Laughton, alias Locklee, a man about thirty years of age, described in the police sheet as a theatrical hosier, was charged with having broken out of the dwelling-house of Messrs. Martin and Co., linen-drapers and silk-mercers, in the Whitechapel-road, near the London Hospital, and stolen money and securities to the amount of £310

Mr. Pelham stated the case for the prosecution. On Friday night (last week), Mr. Thomas Martin, one of the prosecutors, deposited gold to the amount of £30 in his cash-box below, in which he placed securities and I O U's to the amount of £225 more. The box was placed as usual for security in a desk in the counting-house, a small room in the shawl department, at the rear of the premises. On the following morning, at six o'clock, Mr. Martin's attention was directed to the state of his shop and the fastenings. The street door was open, the box of the lock was off, and two bolts had been drawn back. There were two locks on the shop-door, and both had been removed. On further search, he ascertained that the cashier's desk in the shop had been forced open, and the slide of the drawer or till forced away. The counting-house door was not made fast on Friday night because the lock was out of repair. The desk appeared to be all right at the first glance, but some chips on the floor caused Mr. Thomas to institute a more rigid examination, and he soon discovered that the bottom of the desk had been cut away, and the cash-box and its contents removed through the aperture without disturbing the lid of the desk at all. There was a pane of glass taken out of the window at the back of the counting-house, where the thief had entered from a lobby. A ball of wax was inserted between the door and the door-sill, which caused it to stick fast, after it was slammed to on the exit of the burglar. The police constable on the beat pushed against the door several times during the night while going his rounds, and it appeared to be fastened in the customary manner. The suspicions against the prisoner were founded upon circumstantial evidence. He was formerly a porter in the service of the prosecutors, and was dismissed about three weeks ago. Soon after he quitted their service a screw-driver was missed; it was sought for at the time, and could not be found. On Saturday morning, after the discovery of the robbery, the screw-driver was found on the stairs leading from the cellar to the shop. Beside it was a lantern of a very peculiar description, made out of a common pepper-box. A circular hole had been made in the centre, and a taper inserted in the interior, which afforded sufficient light for the thief to carry on his operations after coming from the cellar, where he must have concealed himself all day, and till the inmates had retired to rest. The finding of the screw-driver directed suspicion to the prisoner, who hired a lodging at No. 6, Printinghouse-square, Blackfriars, on the night of Sunday, the 22nd ult. The prisoner slept there every night except Friday night. He came home at six o'clock on Saturday morning, and was admitted into the house by Mr. Morgan, another lodger. He entered the house in a very hurried manner, and Mr. Morgan, who had not seen him before, asked him who he was, to which he replied that he was a lodger, and was going into his own room. Mr. Morgan heard him enter his apartment, and saw no more of him. On Saturday evening the prisoner came home, and appeared in a very agitated state. He spoke to his landlord, Tipper, and said he was in a little trouble; that he had been taken into custody by the police with several others, about a robbery, and that he was questioned very closely as to where he lodged, and where he had been staying on Friday night. He requested Mr. Tipper to say he was at home on Friday night at half-past eleven, if any inquiries were made about him. Mr. Tipper put several questions to him, and asked him if there had been a robbery, and he said he did not know. Directly afterwards, the prisoner left Printing[illegible] square and proceeded to the house of his sister, in Vine-court, White[illegible]oad, where he was immediately afterwards taken into custody. In [illegible]g the boxes of the prisoner the police constables found three files and a knife. They also found in his sister's room a mask and a hammer. A piece of the wood cut from the desk was produced, and the indentations upon it corresponded with the size of the hammer head.

Mr. Pelham's statement was confirmed by a great many witnesses, and as none of the cash, bills, &c., had been traced, the solicitor requested a remand for a week. His request was acceded to, and the prisoner was remanded till Monday next.

SUSPICIOUS DEATH AT DULWICH.

Mr. Robinson, the superintendent of the P division of the metropolitan police, attended at Lambeth Police-Court, on Tuesday, and placed before Mr. Elliott, the magistrate, several documents which had reached him relative to the death of a youth named George James Benwell, whose body had been found in April last, in a pond near Dulwich, under exceedingly suspicious circumstan[illegible]

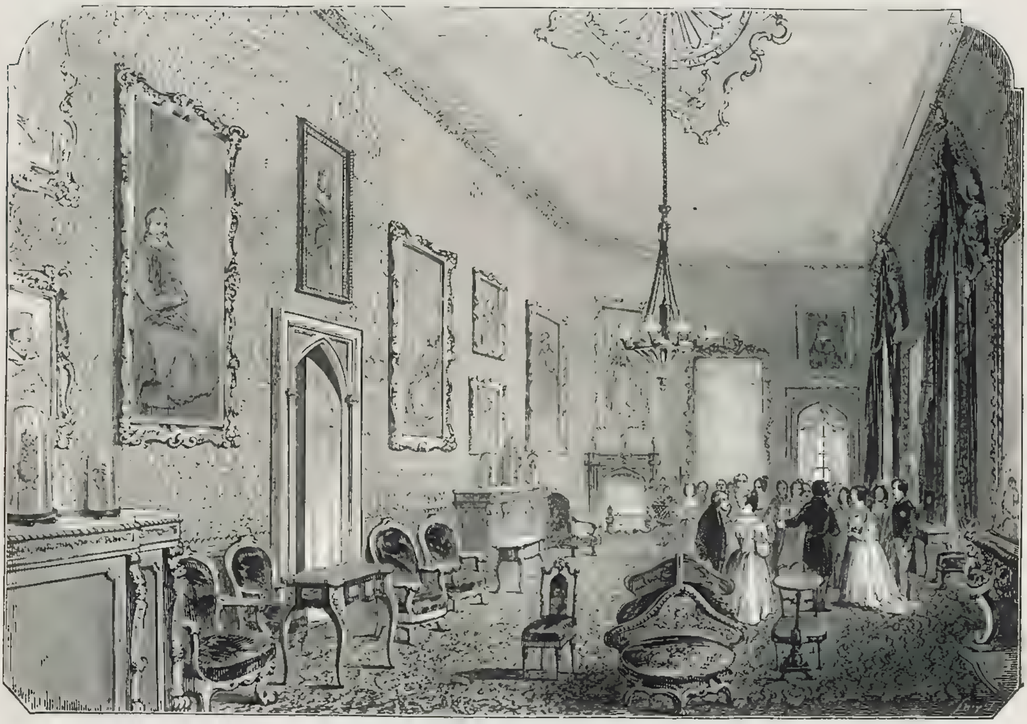
A long inquiry took place before one of the Coroners for t[illegible]ounty of Surrey, and from the facts elicited it appeared that the deceased y[illegible], whose friends were respectable, lived with a person of eccentric habits, named Evans, who at that time was a manufacturer of piqua, or herb tea, residing in the vicinity of Dulwich. The lad was admitted to be of cheerful and lively habit, and had been left at home in care of the house one evening, while his master and his son proceeded in a pony chaise to Sydenham, for some groceries, and on the return of the two latter, the former could not be found. On the foot-board of his bed there was a chalk writing to the effect that his body would be found in a pond close by. This caused Evans and his son to go to the pond, and on reaching it they found a board floating on the water, with the following written in chalk, in a legible and bold hand: "The body of George Benwell will be found near this." The pond, as it was called, but which was nothing more than a shallow stagnant pool, was, in consequence, searched, and the lifeless body of the unfortunate youth was found in the centre with a 28lb. weight made fast round the neck, and both the hands made fast; but, while one wrist was tied fast, the other was secured by a running noose, so that it was not impossible for the deceased himself to have accomplished the fastening, and the jury returned a verdict of suicide.

Some weeks after, the case was brought under the notice of Mr. Elliott at the Court, when circumstances of a suspicious tendency were disclosed, but not sufficient directly to implicate any individual.

A female named Theobald, who had been a witness in the former case, and who has taken much trouble in the matter, has latterly forwarded to Mr. Robinson several written communications, and amongst them some writing from a near relative of the deceased, which bore a similarity to the chalk writing spoken o[illegible] at the inquest.

Mr Elliott, after carefully reading over all the documents placed before him, and comparing the writings, admitted that there was a similarity, but still did not think that this would be sufficient at present to bring home the guilt to the parties suspected, but desired the police would keep the case in view.

HER MAJESTY'S VISIT TO ARUNDEL CASTLE.



THE GREAT DRAWING-ROOM.

THE INTERIOR OF ARUNDEL CASTLE.

Of this ancient seat of "the head of all the Howards" we engraved three fine exterior views in No. 180 of our Journal; together with a brief outline of its eventful history. Since the great work of its re-edification was commenced by Charles, the eleventh Duke of Norfolk, and second cousin to the present Duke, a sum exceeding half a million of money must have been expended in the great work.

To the present noble representative of the family, however, attaches the merit of having rendered complete, or nearly so, the improvements commenced by his predecessors. The intimation of the present Royal Visit, if we remember rightly, was conveyed to the Duke of Norfolk nearly two years since; and, during the interval, the noble owner of Arundel has caused the interior of the Castle to be refitted in a style of gorgeous magnificence for the proper reception by England's premier Duke of his Sovereign and her Royal Consort. His Grace's official position as Earl Marshal may have led to the expectation of much magnificence; but we question whether the completeness and splendour of the appointments had been, in any instance, anticipated; for not a single apartment had been opened prior to the Royal Visit.

We shall now proceed to detail the principal apartments.

The Corridor.—Entering the Castle from the court-yard, the visitor is conducted through the hall to a double staircase, with brass railing, which leads to the first Corridor, the dimensions of which are 200 feet by 12 feet. This gallery is crowded with the choicest works of art, including a variety of exquisite specimens of sculpture: among the latter should be particularly mentioned two busts of her Majesty and the Prince Consort, placed at the top of the staircase, and a full length figure of the Lady Adeliza Fitzalan Howard, at the southern extremity of the Corridor; all executed by Francis, in his best style. The Chair of Recognition, used by her Majesty upon the occasion of her coronation, and presented by the Queen to the Duke of Norfolk, as Hereditary Earl Marshal of the Kingdom, is also preserved here. It bears the following inscription:—"The Queen to the Earl Marshal." It is of oak, and the cushion and panel are covered in blue silk velvet.

THE GREAT DINING-ROOM.

HER MAJESTY'S VISIT TO ARUNDEL CASTLE.

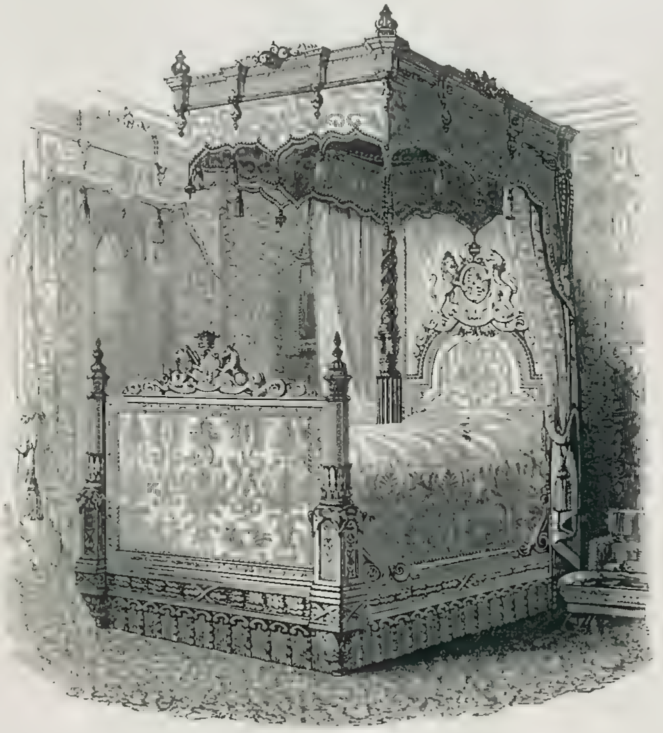
The effect, on entering this Corridor, is very fine. It is separated from the stair-case by five stone arches, alternately semi-circular and pointed, and enriched with the billet and star Norman mouldings; the capitals of the supporting columns being foliated with the oak, rose, vine, and strawberry. The stairs are of stone, and the railings of brass, in the design of intersecting arches.

From this point, a single flight ascends to a handsome triple window, dight with the chevron ornament and roses; and flanked by handsome canopied niches, containing busts of Cromwell and Charles the First. Here the stairs again branch in two other divisions to the Upper Corridor, of similar dimensions to the Lower, and fitted in corresponding style.

Returning to the Corridor, from it are entered the Barons' Hall, a superb room, 115 feet in length by 35 in width, and of proportionate height; the roof being formed of Spanish chesnut, in a masterly style of workmanship. This apartment being in an unfinished state, could not be brought into service during her Majesty's visit.

The Banquetting Room was originally the ancient Chapel of the Castle. Over the fireplace in this apartment is a fine portrait of the present Duke of Norfolk, when Earl of Arundel and Surrey, in his robes as a page at the Coronation of George IV., by Hayter. Other portraits of Charles, thirteenth Duke of Norfolk; of Henry Frederick Howard Lord Mowbray and Maltravers; of Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey; and of Henry Fitzalan; and of Lord Maltravers, also, grace the walls of this room. The Music Gallery is enriched by exquisite carvings, and furnished with gilt music stands, formerly used in Westminster Abbey. But the most striking effect is produced by a vast window, 27 feet in height, in which are two paintings, on plate-glass, of the Mercy Seat and the Inner Temple. The appointments of this room are truly gorgeous. The candelabra are silver-gilt, the service principally of gold; besides which, there are on the table, a representation in silver, a foot and a half in height, on a pedestal of silver-gilt, of Henry VIII. meeting Francis I. on the Field of the Cloth of Gold; and a representation of the same size and in the same style of art, of a Norman Crusader and a Saracen in conflict. In addition to this, are six gold coronation cups a foot in depth and 7 or 8 inches in diameter



THE SUPERB STATE BED.

The Great Drawing-Room is upwards of 60 feet in length, and proportionate height. It is lit by four noble windows, commanding a pleasing view of the Vale of the Arun, extending as far as the Miller's Tomb, on Highdown-hill. The walls are hung with paper of gold and green, of the richest design The furniture is of the most gorgeous description, and comprises buhl and marqueterie cabinets, tables lounges, &c.; a pianoforte, richly ornamented in gold and white enamel; pier tables of the same descriptions, surmounted by the richest china vases and elaborate clocks. The curtains and chair coverings are of splendid crimson and gold silk damask. The chimney-pieces are of Carrara marble, profusely ornamented and embattled; each bearing, in a centre panel, the Ducal crest, and the Arundel Horse. Mirrors are placed between the windows and at either end of the room, each surmounted by the crests of the various branches of the family, in ornamental decoration, the greater portion of which, embodying the armorial bearings, autographs, and insignia of the family, are stated to have been executed from designs furnished by the ladies of the family. The portraits in this room include those of Thomas Duke of Norfolk, by Holbein; of Henry Howard, the Sixth Duke; of Thomas Howard, Earl of Arundel, the celebrated collector; of Alethia Talbot, Countess of Arundel and Surrey; of Mary Fitzalan, Duchess of Norfolk; of Ludovick Stuart, Duke of Richmond; and, above all in historical interest, of John Howard, first Duke of Norfolk of the Howard family, the celebrated "Jocky" of Shaksperian celebrity.

The Small or Ante Drawing-Room is connected with the room just described and furnished in similar style: it contains several paintings, among which are an original cabinet painting of Richard III., for which the Duke of Norfolk has refused 3000 guineas; of Charles I. and Henrietta Maria, by Vandyke; and Mary and Elizabeth of York. Here is also deposited the original full-length portrait of Christina, Duchess of Milan, painted by Holbein at the command of Henry VIII., and who, it will be remembered, returned to him, on the solicitation of her hand, the memorable answer, that had she more than one head it should be at his service. Of more immediate interest, however, are three portraits of her Majesty Queen Victoria, at the respective ages of four, ten, and nineteen years, all painted by Fowler. Here, also, is a fine portrait of the present Duke of Norfolk, by Pickersgill. On the table is a copy of a matchless work by Rubens, relating to some members of the Howard Family.

On the opposite side of the Corridor is the Library, 120 feet in length by 24 in width. It is entirely fitted with mahogany, exquisitely veined. The bookcases and reading galleries are supported by fifteen columns, wrought out of the finest solid mahogany, highly polished. The ceiling is formed out of the same material, enriched with exquisite carvings of fruit and foliage, &c. The library contains, in addition to a rare collection of manuscripts, about 14,000 volumes. The draperies are of rich crimson velvet, and the effect of the whole is rich; though we scarcely admire the employment in a Gothic building of mahogany, which has been known in this country but a century and a quarter.

A second staircase leads to another Corridor of equal extent with that just described, and in the same manner studded with pictures and works of art. In the eastern wing of this Corridor is the suite of apartments which has been prepared for her Majesty and her Royal Consort. It consists of six rooms, furnished in a style of regal splendour, every item throughout the suite being new for the occasion. The draperies and furniture coverings are of the richest silk damask, in white enamel and gold.—Her Majesty's Dressing-Room contains some choice bits of the scenery of Arundel, painted by Copley Fielding; and a fire-screen, beautifully worked with the Norfolk arms.—The Queen's Private Sitting-Room has a matchless buhl cabinet and writing-desk; several portraits of the juvenile branches of the Royal Family; and two unrivalled specimens of Prout's pencil: "Munich" and "Milan."—The Royal Breakfast-Room displays a series of etchings by the present Duchess of Norfolk; they are much admired for freedom and beauty of touch.

The Royal State Bed has been built expressly for this Visit: it is of highly artistic design, with lavish brilliancy of decoration. It is of white and gold, and richly carved throughout, surmounted by a gorgeous canopy, in the centre of which rises a dome, formed of gold-coloured satin, interlaced and looped with thick rope of gold. In the corners of the interior of the canopy, appear the letters "V. R.," in gilt carving, laid upon and relieved by white satin. The head pillars which support the canopy are beautifully carved; and the twisted reeds of the upper part of the columns are intertwined with strings of pearls, producing a remarkably pleasing and elegant effect. The cornice which encloses the canopy is ornamented at the angles with carved Imperial crowns; and in the centre of the sides and front appears the Horse of Arundel, with an oak-branch in his mouth, and supported by a series of elaborate scroll-work. The head of the Bedstead is beautifully rayed in gold-coloured silk, and the head-board is covered with crimson brocade, surmounted by the Royal Arms, exquisitely carved; together with a profusion of the flowers and leaves of the rose, thistle, and shamrock. The foot-board is also richly carved, and surmounted by the Ducal Arms, beautifully chiselled, and richly gilt; the foot-rails, &c., are literally covered with carved and gilt oak-leaves; and the bases are of heavy crimson-silk bullion fringe, interspersed with gold-coloured silk hangings. The draperies of the Bed are of rich crimson and gold brocade, lined with gold-coloured satin; the shaped balances being looped with massive silk-rope tassels, and trimmed with gold bullion fringe. Altogether, the State Bed has a most splendid effect. The window-curtains correspond with the Bed. In this chamber, too, is a richly-carved screen, worked with the Sutherland arms. The walls throughout this suite are hung with paper richly and tastefully gilt; and, in addition to the pictures already described, present several splendid mirrors and works of art. The State Bed and Furniture of the Royal Bed and Dressing Rooms have been designed and executed by Mr. Morant, of 91, New Bond-street, and they are in artistical taste rarely equalled.

HER MAJESTY'S VISIT TO ARUNDEL CASTLE.

Where Arun's gentle wavelets glide
  Beneath the Howards' hoary keep,
Still towering in its Saxon pride,
  Where all its pristine glories sleep,
There floats upon the free-born breeze
  Britannia's standard bright and high;
And shouts are echoing to the seas
  Of Britain's heartfelt loyalty.

The Queen has come! The Premier-Duke
  Receives with joy his Sovereign Liege,
In the old halls which often shook
  With the wild work of sack and siege.
Whence "Norfolk's Jock," and "Belted Will"
  Oft sallied with their gallant train.
Their noble blood flows purely still,
  Their blazon is without a stain

And the old Keep looks bravely now,
  A myriad lights illume its walls,
And gladness gilds the people's brow,
  In humble cots, or princely halls
The Queen is loved. Her "hearted throne"
  Soars as the proud cliff o'er the wave.
A noble empire hails their own
  Queen of the beautiful and brave!

Honour eternal to the crest,
  And homage to the patriot crown,
That well obey high Heaven's behest,
  Unmov'd by Faction's smile or frown!
This, the true link to bind the men
  Who rally round our banner free
From Indus' source, to Highland glen Fair Queen! to strike for Thine and Thee!

LITERATURE.

Lucretia; or, the Children of Night. By the Author of "Rienzi," etc. 3 vols. Saunders and Otley.

Somewhat more than three years since, Sir Bulwer Lytton took leave of the public as a writer of fiction, in a work of less than his wonted brilliancy and success. The withdrawal was not altogether "well graced;" so that we are happy again to meet "the Author of Rienzi" in the field wherein he has achieved so much for the gratification, and, let us hope, for the humanising, of his many thousandfold readers. To this retracing he seems to have been induced by a desire to work out "the strange and secret ways through which that Arch-ruler of Civilisation, familiarly called 'Money,' insinuates itself into our thoughts and motives, our hearts and actions; affecting those who undervalue as those who over-estimate its importance; ruining virtues in the spendthrift no less than engendering vices in the miser." This design Sir Bulwer Lytton had attempted to realise upon the stage; but, although he succeeded to a popular extent, he was not satisfied with the result; and, in the work before us, he again takes up the great subject, uniting with it some exhibition of what seems a principal vice in the hot and emulous chase for happiness or fame, fortune or knowledge, which is characteristic of that crisis of society at which we have arrived. The vice to which Sir Lytton alludes is Impatience—"that eager desire to press forward, not so much to conquer obstacles, as to elude them; that gambling with the solemn destinies of life, seeking ever to set success upon the chance of a die; that hastening from the wish conceived to the end accomplished; that thirst after quick returns to ingenious toil, and breathless spurrings along short cuts to the goal, which we see everywhere around us; characterising the books of our writers, the speeches of our statesmen, no less than the dealings of our speculators, seem, I confess," says the author, "to constitute a very diseased and very general symptom of the times." This portion is sought to be wrought out in the histories of two criminals, existing in our own age, "remarkable whether from the extent and darkness of the guilt committed—whether from the glittering accomplishments and lively temper of the one, or the profound knowledge and intellectual capacities of the other." These are "the Children of Night;" the crimes related in the work took place within the last seventeen years; there is no exaggeration, we are assured, as to their extent, no great departure from their details, and the means employed have their foundation in literal facts. In the more salient points, a history is related, not a fiction invented.

The work opens with a "Prologue to the First Part," or, it is rather, an Apologue, in which a glimpse is gained of the futurity of the work, through the medium of one of the orgies of popular vengeance so common in the Reign of Terror. This is vividly drawn.

The narrative then commences with "A Family Groupe," at a fine old place, of the age of James the First:—

"Upon the terrace, and under cover of a temporary awning, sate the owner, Sir Miles St. John, of Laughton, a comely old man, dressed with faithful precision to the costume which he had been taught to consider appropriate to his rank of gentleman, and which was not yet wholly obsolete and eccentric. His hair, still thick and luxuriant, was carefully powdered, and collected into a club behind. His nether man attired in grey breeches and pearl-coloured silk stockings; his vest of silk, opening wide at the breast, and showing a profusion of frill, slightly sprinkled with the pulvilio of his favourite martinique; his three-cornered hat, placed on a stool at his side, with a gold headed crutch-cane—hat made rather to be carried in the hand than worn on the head, the diamond in his shirt breast, the diamond on his finger, the ruffles at his wrist—all bespoke the gallant who had chatted with Lord Chesterfield, and supped with Mrs. Clive. On a table before him were placed two or three decanters of wine, the fruits of the season, an enamelled snuff-box, in which was set the portrait of a female—perhaps the Chloe or Phillis of his early love-ditties; a lighted taper, a small china jar containing tobacco, and three or four pipes of homely clay—for cherry-sticks and meerschaums were not then in fashion; and Sir Miles St. John, once a gay and sparkling beau, now a popular country gentleman, great at county meetings and sheep-shearing festivals, had taken to smoking, as in harmony with his bucolic transformation. An old setter lay dozing at his feet; a small spaniel—old, too—was sauntering lazily in the immediate neighbourhood, looking gravely out for such stray bits of biscuit as had been thrown forth to provoke him to exercise, and which, hitherto, had escaped his attention. Half seated, half reclined on the balustrade, apart from the Baronet, but within reach of his conversation, lolled a man in the prime of life, with an air of unmistakable and sovereign elegance and distinction. Mr. Vernon was a guest from London: and the London man, the man of clubs, and dinners, and routs—of noon loungings through Bond-street, and nights spent with the Prince of Wales, seemed stamped not more upon the careful carelessness of his dress, and upon the worn expression of his delicate features, than upon the listless ennui which, characterizing both his face and attitude, appeared to take pity on himself for having been entrapped into the country. * * * * Further on, and near the steps descending into the garden, stood a man in an attitude of profound abstraction; his arms folded, his eyes bent on the ground, his brows slightly contracted; his dress was a plain black surtout, and pantaloons of the same colour; something both in the fashion of the dress, and still more in the face of the man, bespoke the foreigner.

The latter is Olivier Dalibard, a Provençal, a man of considerable learning and rare scientific attainments, who had taken some part in the French Revolution, and possessed the esteem of Robespierre. He had been tutor in the house of the Marquis de G———, whom he had accompanied to Laughton, where he was provided for as secretary and librarian to Sir Miles St. John, and teacher of languages to Sir Miles's favourite niece. Dalibard had under his charge an orphan boy of some ten or twelve years old—whom Sir Miles was not long in suspecting, and rightly, to be the scholar's son:—

"Such, and rightly, was in truth the relationship between Olivier Dalibard and Honoré Gabriel Varney—a name significant of the double and illegitimate origin—a French father, an English mother dropping, however, the purely French appellation of Honoré, he went familiarly by that of Gabriel. Half way down the steps stood the lad, pencil and tablet in hand, sketching. Let us look over his shoulder—it is his father's likeness—a countenance in itself not very remarkable at the first glance, for the features were small; but, when examined, it was one that most persons, women especially, would have pronounced handsome, and to which none could deny the higher praise of thought and intellect. A native of Provence, with some Italian blood in his veins—for his grandfather, a merchant of Marseilles, had married into a Florentine family settled at Leghorn—the dark complexion, common with those in the south, had been subdued, probably by the habits of the student, into a bronzed and steadfast paleness, which seemed almost fair by the contrast of the dark hair which he wore unpowdered, and the still darker brows which hung thick and prominent over clear grey eyes. Compared with the features, the skull was disproportionally large, both before and behind; and a physiognomist would have drawn conclusions more favourable to the power than the tenderness of the Provençal's character, from the compact closeness of the lips and the breadth and massiveness of the iron jaw. But the son's sketch exaggerated every feature, and gave to the expression a malignant and terrible irony, not now, at least, apparent in the quiet and meditative aspect."

Gabriel himself, though of girlish complexion, bore something hard in the lip, and bold, though not open, in the brow. "All the hereditary keenness and intelligence were stamped upon his face at the above moment; but the expression had also a large share of the very irony and malice which he had conveyed to his caricature."

In a distant part of the grounds were a pair of characters who must next be introduced:—

"The one was a young man, whose simple dress and subdued air strongly contrasted the artificial graces and the modish languor of Mr. Vernon; but though wholly without that nameless distinction which sometimes characterises those conscious of pure race, and habituated to the atmosphere of courts, he had at least Nature's stamp of aristocracy in a form eminently noble, and features of manly, but surpassing beauty, which were not rendered less engaging by an expression of modest timidity. He seemed to be listening with thoughtful respect to his companion, a young female by his side, who was speaking to him with an earnestness visible in her gestures and her animated countenance. And though there was much to notice in the various persons scattered over the scene, not one, perhaps—not the graceful Vernon—not the thoughtful scholar, nor his fair-haired, hard-lipped son—not even the handsome listener she addressed—no, not one there would so have arrested the eye, whether of a physiognomist or a casual observer, as that young girl—Sir Miles St. John's favourite niece and presumptive heiress."

The young man is William Mainwaring, "without ancestry or career," who dares not aspire to the hand of Sir Miles's niece, Lucretia Clavering, on account of the Baronet's pride of family, almost the leading attribute of his character. The pair separate, and Dalibard seizes upon the opportunity to declare his passion for Lucretia. We quote a portion of their dialogue:—

"'Mr. Vernon, I did not speak of him!' Lucretia gazed hard upon the Provençal's countenance—gazed with that unpitying air of triumph with which a woman who detects a power over the heart she does not desire to conquer, exults in defeating the reasons that heart appears to her to prompt. 'No,' she said, in a calm voice, to which the venom of secret irony gave stinging significance—'no, you spoke not of Mr Vernon; you thought that if I looked round—if I looked nearer—I might have a fairer choice.' 'You are cruel—you are unjust,' said Dalibard, falteringly. 'If I once presumed for a moment, have I repeated my offence? But,' he added, hurriedly, 'in me—much as you appear to despise me—in me, at least, you would have risked none of the dangers that beset you if you seriously set your heart on Mainwaring.' 'You think my uncle would be proud to give my hand to Monsieur Olivier Dalibard?' 'I think and I know,' answered the Provençal, gravely, and disregarding the taunt, 'that if you had deigned to render me—poor exile that I am!—the most enviable of men, you had still been the heiress of Laughton.' 'So you have said and urged,' said Lucretia, with evident curiosity in her voice; 'yet how, and by what art—wise and subtle as you are—could you have won my uncle's consent?' 'That is my secret,' returned Dalibard gloomily; 'and since the madness I indulged is for ever over—since I have so schooled my heart, that nothing, despite your sarcasm, save an affectionate interest which I may call paternal, rests there—let us pass from this painful subject. Oh, my dear pupil, be warned in time! know love for what it really is, in the dark and complicated history of actual life, a brief enchantment, not to be disdained, but not to be considered the all in all. Look round the world, contemplate all those who have married from passion—ten years afterwards, whither has the passion flown? With a few, indeed, where there is community of object and character, new excitements, new aims, and hopes, spring up; and, having first taken root in passion, the passion continues to shoot out in their fresh stems and fibres. But deceive yourself not; there is no such community between you and Mainwaring. What you call his goodness, you will learn hereafter to despise as feeble; and what in reality your mental power, he soon, too soon, will shudder at as unwomanly and hateful.' 'Hold!' cried Lucretia, tremulously. 'Hold! and if he does, I shall owe his hate to you—to your lessons—to your deadly influence!' 'Lucretia, no! the seeds were in you! Can cultivation force from the soil that which it is against the nature of the soil to bear?' 'I will pluck out the weeds! I will transform myself!' 'Child, I defy you!' said the scholar, with a smile, that gave to his face the expression his son had conveyed to it. 'I have warned you, and my task is done.'"

"But she, perceiving his approach, crossed abruptly into one of the alleys that led to the other side of the house; and he was either too indifferent, or too well-bred, to force upon her the companionship which she so evidently shunned. He threw himself at length upon one of the benches in the lawn, and, leaning his head upon his hand, fell into reflections, which, had he spoken, would have shaped themselves somewhat thus into words:—'If I must take that girl as the price of this fair heritage, shall I gain or lose? I grant that she had the finest neck and shoulders I ever saw out of marble; but far from being in love with her, she gives me a feeling like fear and aversion. Add to this, that she has evidently no kinder sentiment for me than I for her; and if she once had a heart, that young gentleman has long since coaxed it away. Pleasant auspices these, for matrimony, to a poor invalid, who wishes at least to decline and to die in peace! Moreover, if I were rich enough to marry as I pleased—if I were what, perhaps, I ought to be, heir to Laughton—why, there is a certain sweet Mary in the world, whose eyes are softer than Lucretia Clavering's: but that is a dream! On the other hand, if I do not win this girl, and my poor kinsman give her all or nearly all his possessions, Vernon Grange goes to the usurers, and the King will find a lodging for myself. What does it matter? I cannot live above two or three years at the most, and can only hope, therefore, that dear stout old Sir Miles may outlive me. At thirty-three, I have worn out fortune and life; little pleasure could Laughton give me; brief pain the Bench. Fore Gad, the philosophy of the thing is on the whole against sour looks and the noose!' Thus deciding in the progress of his reverie, he smiled, and changed his position. The sun had set—the twilight was over—the moon rose in splendour from amidst a thick copse of mingled beech and oak; the beams fell full on the face of the muser, and the face seemed yet paler, and the exhaustion of premature decay yet more evident by that still and melancholy light: all ruins gain dignity by the moon. This was a ruin nobler than that which painters place on their canvass—the ruin, not of stone and brick, but of humanity and spirit, the wreck of man, prematurely old, not stricken by great sorrow, not bowed by great toil, but fretted and mined away by small pleasures and poor excitements—small and poor, but daily, hourly, momently at their gnome-like work. Something of the gravity and the true lesson of the hour and scene, perhaps, forced itself upon a mind little given to sentiment, for Vernon rose languidly, and muttered, 'My poor mother hoped better things from me. It is well, after all, that it is broken off with Mary! Why should there be any one to weep for me? I can the better die smiling, as I have lived.'"

We have thus, for the present, glanced at the majority of the leading characters; next week, we shall proceed with the action of the story.

The Illustrated Musical Almanac, a Visiting Table-book and Drawing-Room Annual, for 1847. Edited, and the songs written by F. W. N. Bayley. (Music size,) Hurst.

This elegant Annual is a perfectly novel combination of Music, Illustration, and Comic humour, in all their attractive varieties. First, we have six Original Songs, with music composed by Wallace, Hatton, Balfe, Crouch, Alexander Lee, and Florimel; next, six new Songs for Music; besides an Almanack, and a Comic Page for each month. We have quoted one of the songs of the first class; the comicalities, all musical, we have not room to transfer; they are full of pun and piquancy.

The Illustrations comprise three whole page compositions, by Kenny Meadows and Phiz; as many large music heads, by Phiz, Weigall, and Warren. The Comic pages are headed and bordered with shoals of engraved facetiæ (nearly one hundred), by James Doyle, H. G. Hine, and A. Crowquill; and there are six Portraits of Eminent Composers, by Hammerton; all good likenesses.

This bare enumeration will suggest to the reader that there is no lack of graphic or musical attractions in this new Almanack. We conclude with a specimen song:—

LOVE AND PRAYER

'Tis day! a sweet breath from the skies
  Fills all the summer air
My heart is warm'd to piety,
  And softened into prayer
Still with my humble word to God,
  My love will blended be,
And all I dedicate to Him
  Seems sanctified by thee.

'Tis nigh[illegible] and stars
  Shed [illegible]
And stil[illegible]
  My spi[illegible]

I pray that my star may be thine,
  [illegible] must dwell apart.
And ask of God to let it gleam
  Its glory on thy heart.

'Tis darker now, the weary lights
  Behind their curtain creep.
And I by slumber's drowsy throne,
  Have hid my eyes in a cap
Still faintly, at the last, I breathed
  My way to sleep in prayer,
God's answer in a vision comes—
  I dream; and thou art there!

Another Bridge Across the Thames.—Application is intended to be made to Parliament next session, for leave to construct a bridge from the church at Lambeth, to the opposite shore at Westminster; the want of which has been much felt by the increasing population on both sides of the river

MUSIC.

THE ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA HOUSE

On Tuesday, the demolition of the interior of Covent Garden Theatre was commenced. It is proposed to extend considerably the space for the audience portion, by taking down the present tiers of boxes and galleries, and by throwing back the façade of the interior several feet, to increase the area of the pit. Two stone staircases are to be built from the level of the corridor round the proposed pit-boxes, up to the highest tier of private boxes. The gallery entrance will remain at the Covent Garden Piazza, totally distinct from the entrances to the pit, stalls, and boxes, which will be formed entirely in the front of the edifice in Bow-street. A tram road for carriages will be constructed under the portico, entering on the southern side, and driving out at the northern or Long Acre extremity, thus gaining an important advantage for the company, who will alight from their carriages at the very doors, instead of being compelled, as heretofore, to descend at the pavement, which must be crossed, the steps of the portico ascended, and some yards more passed over before the visitors reach the interior of the theatre. The entrance in Hart-street, hitherto reserved for the proprietors of the property-boxes, and of the private-boxes on the western side, will be set apart for the future, solely for the use of the Royal Family. Alterations are to be made in the grand staircases to amalgamate with the new and increased facilities for ingress and egress. The accesses and approaches to every portion of the audience accommodation will be made fire-proof; and, by having level floors and separate doors for going in and out, the annoyance of opposing streams will be avoided. Ample space has been provided for retiring, waiting, and refreshment rooms. We may add that the size of the theatre has been completely misunderstood, owing to the original architect having built so small an interior to such large exterior walls; but, when the new plans are completed, Covent Garden will be the largest theatre in the metropolis, in every respect, and by an increase of the comforts of the visitors, as more space has been allowed for the stalls, and the private boxes will be higher and broader than at any other establishment.

Benedict Albano, Esq., civil engineer, who has been engaged in divers great public works in this and other countries, has prepared the plans, which will be executed under his sole direction. These plans have been submitted to the authorities under the Metropolitan Building Act, and to the Commissioners of Pavements as regards the new road under the portico, by the alteration in which the foot passengers will gain some additional feet of pavement; and official approval has been duly signified. Mr. Albano's attention has been directed, especially, to the principles of acoustics, of ventilation, and of lighting the theatre.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

Handel's Oratorio of "Solomon" was performed on Wednesday night, at Exeter Hall, Miss Birch singing the music of the Queen, Mr. Phillips and Miss M. Williams dividing that assigned to Solomon—it was originally, strangely enough, written for a soprano; Mr. Lockey, Zadok, the Priest, and Miss A. Williams the music allotted to the Second Woman in the Judgment scene. Owing to the absurdity of the poem, the work is tiresome in the performance, although relieved by some sublime choruses—such as "From the Censor," "Thus rolling surges," "Then at once thy rage remove," "Praise the Lord," &c. The picturesque chorus terminating the first part, "May no rash intruder," was encored; but its style is more secular than sacred. The leading vocalists exerted themselves with much ability, the airs, however, are so filled with old-fashioned and monotonous [illegible], that they were tiresome vocal exercises to listen to. On the whole, the execution was creditable to the amateurs, despite of the occasional uncertainty and wavering, and the tendency of the conductor to drag the pieces. The "Messiah" will be given on Friday next, with Mdme. Caradori Allan, Miss Hawes, Manvers, and Phillips.

SOCIETY OF BRITISH MUSICIANS.

At the third Concert, Mr. C. E. Horsley was the Director, and Mr. H. Brinley Richards the accompanyist. The novelties in the scheme were a clever MS. Quintet in C Minor for pianoforte (Mr. H. Westrop), two violins (E. W. Thomas and Watson), tenor (Hill), and violoncello (Lucas), composed by the first mentioned Professor; a dry Trio in F (MS.), for pianoforte, and violoncello, composed by Mr. C. E. Stephens, and played by him, Messrs. E. Thomas and Lucas; and a MS. Song, "The Erl King's Kiss," a Schubertian effusion from Benedict, sung by Mr. Ferrari, the words by E. Fitzball, Esq. Mozart's Otetto, in C Minor, adapted from one of his Quintets, was nicely played by Messrs. Nicholson and G. Horton (oboes), Lazarus and Key (clarionets), Jarrett and Hooper (horns), and Keating and Johnstone (bassoons). The greatest treat of the evening was Mendelssohn's Quartet in E flat, Op. 12, for two violins, tenor, and violoncello, admirably rendered by Messrs. E. W. Thomas, Watson, Hill, and Lucas. Mr. Wrighton, a pleasing tenor, sang Beethoven's Song of "Beating Heart;" Miss A. Hill sweetly warbled a Scotch Ballad, by Mr. A. Mitchell, "The Clyde softly flowing;" and Miss H. Groom sang Mr. W. C. Macfarren's Canzonet, "She wept when last we parted." A pretty duo, "The Return," by Mr. H. B. Richards, was sung by the Misses Hill and Groom; and Wallace's charming trio, "Turn on, old Time," concluded the Concert, which, owing to some neglect, began only long after the appointed hour, with a complete abandonment of order in the programme.

SACRED CONCERTS.

The first of the fifth series of Sacred Concerts, given by the Crosby Hall Literary Institution, under Miss Mounsey's able direction, took place on Monday last, and was well attended. Misses Birch and Bassano, Messrs. Francis and Machin, were the principal vocalists, with a select choir of twenty voices; Miss Mounsey accompanying on the organ with taste and tact. The novelty in the scheme was a "Te Deum" of Mendelssohn, a grand and impressive composition, but requiring orchestral adjuncts and a larger body of voices to be heard with proper effect. There was a judicious selection from Mozart, Beethoven, J. S. Bach, Cherubini, Haydn, Handel, Weiss, Graun, Assmayer, and Kücken; and Miss Mounsey played an Andante, by Haydn, and a Fugue, by Albrechtsberger. As these performances begin and end early, and the prices of admission are very moderate, they are deservedly popular amongst the City amateurs, who have another admirable society in the Choral Harmonists. The Second Sacred Concert will be on the 21st instant.

MR. AND MRS T. H. SEVERN'S CONCERT.

On Thursday night, a concert was given at the Hanover-square Rooms, chiefly for the purpose of having a serenata called "The Spirit of the Shell" performed by a full band and chorus. It is composed by Mr. T. H. Severn, who has published several popular ballads, amongst which is the well-known one "We met." There is but one instance of a serenata, we believe, before, and that is the "Acis and Galatea" of Handel. Why so called we know not, as it is essentially a cantata. Mr. Severn has fancy and feeling, but not decided originality. He would, however, write, we feel convinced, an excellent opera, for his style is highly dramatic and impassioned.

In the "Spirit of the Shell"—it is the story of two lovers wandering at night on the sea-shore, who, regardless of the warning of a singing shell, are overtaken by the tide and nearly lost; but, thanks to the prompt intervention of their friends, are raised by ropes to the cliffs above—there is a Chorus of Spirits and one of Villagers, and a Quartet. Two pieces were encored—a glee, "The Love the Parent's Heart that Warmed," sung by Messrs. Lockey, Hawkins, Shoubridge, and Wetherbee, and the finale, the soli effectively sung by Miss Birch and Mr. Lockey. Mr. Severn was much cheered at the close. He deserves credit for his disinterestedness; for to write a Serenata is to be certain that it will not sell, nor can it be played on the stage.

There was a miscellaneous selection in the second part, in which Miss Dolby, Miss Solomon, Miss Cubitt, Mrs. T. H. Severn, Mr. Wetherbee, Mr. Lockey, Mr. Hawkins, Mr. Shoubridge, Mr. Leffler, Mr. Allen, and Mr. John Parry sang, but we did not remain after the Serenata. The room was filled by the most eminent professors and amateurs.

Kennington Glee Club.—This Club meets on alternate Monday evenings, from October to May, but the members are gallant enough to give, from time to time, a Ladies' Night, or dress concert, rather ominously held at the Horns Assembly Rooms. The meeting last Monday was very well attended, and there was an excellent programme, comprising some of the music from "Macbeth," in which Mr. Kench, who possesses a fine bass voice, distinguished himself; madrigals by Wilbye, Weelkes, the Earl of Mornington, Dr. Crotch's Motet, "Methinks I hear;" and songs, glees, concerted pieces, &c., by Sir H. R. Bishop, Wallace, Spohr, Hullah, Hatton, Czapek, Keller, Weber, Bellini, &c. The other singers were Miss Kent, Miss Byers, Miss Gill, and Messrs. Holmes and Hill. The Club was established in 1837. J. Bright, Esq., F.L.S., is President; and Mr. T. J. Boardman, M.B., Musical Director

Wilson's Scottish Entertainments.—After a long and successful tour in the provinces, Scotland, and Ireland, Mr. Wilson has returned to London for a month's campaign at Crosby Hall, beginning last Tuesday, and finishing on the 22nd inst. This popular vocalist will be "at home" on the Tuesday and Friday evenings, at Crosby Hall.

Promenade Concerts.—Mr. Allcroft has been benefited by the closing of Jullien's campaign at Covent Garden Theatre, and the Lyceum has been very well attended; the attractions of the Distin Family, and of those charming sister vocalists the Misses Williams, with Negri's excellent instrumental forces, delighting the numerous amateurs.

Laurent's Casino.—Music and dancing continue to attract crowds to this novel and well conducted establishment.

Drury-lane Theatre.—Balfe's new opera of "The Bondman," adapted by Mr. Bunn from "Le Chevalier de Saint Georges," rendered so popular by the powerful acting of Lafont, will be positively produced on Thursday next, Mr. Harrison, Mr. Rafter, Mr. Weiss, and Miss Romer sustaining the leading parts

Hair-Cutting Gratis.—A Correspondent of the Times says, "I must tell you a ridiculous thing that occurred in a small village of Oxfordshire last week, and which caused a diminution in my congregation of Sunday. A man, wearing a certain badge of authority, passed through the village, and calling at each house, informed the inhabitants that he was a Government barber, sent from London to cut all the poor people's hair gratis, it having been ascertained to be the most effectual way of keeping off the cholera, which had already made its appearance. The fellow succeeded in carrying away with him sufficient hair to make several wigs, and the deluded people were obliged to set to and make warm caps to defend their bare heads from the cold which set in next day."

Portuguese Potatoes.—On Monday several tons of potatoes, ex Royal Tar, from Lisbon, were sold by public auction at Keeling and Hunt's, Pudding-lane, being the first importation, in any quantity, of this vegetable from that kingdom, Railway Deposits.—The railway deposits in the session of 1845 in England amounted to £3,444,366 5s., in Ireland, to £373,812 10s., and in Scotland, to £180,763 15s. For the session of 1846 the deposits into the Court of Chancery in England on account of railways, amounted to £11,396,783 9s. 10d., in Ireland, to £866,367, and in Scotland, to £2,323,371. The deposits for the ensuing session must be made in the course of next month before Jan. 16.

THE THEATRES.

HAYMARKET.

It appears to be a sine quâ non at this pleasant Theatre that, when a light after piece is written, there must be an Irish character in it, to be enacted by Mr. Hudson. We think this is a pity: for Mr. Hudson's ordinary light comedy is so agreeable, and Irish fun generally when a few types have been exhausted—so monotonous, that we regret to see so lively an actor employed in representing phases of character that have long been worn out. But this by the way; for it has but little to do with the success of an amusing dramatic sketch by Mr. Lemon, produced here on Saturday evening, under the title of "The Young Pretender," which also serves as the vehicle for introducing one or two pretty ballads and duets, composed by Mrs. Gilbert à Beckett. The plot is very slight—a mere film of construction, ingeniously made to cover half an hour. The Chevalier Charles Edward (Mr. Braid) is escaping, as the Highland servant of Captain O'Neale (Mr. Hudson). He arrives at an inn where Captain Cocker (Mr. Buckstone) is quartered, with some Royalist troops. By a letter which Captain Cocker receives, he is nearly caught; but O'Neale prevails on his sweetheart, Mary Armadale (Miss P. Horton), to assume the costume of the Pretender; and she carries on time until the real Prince has had the time to escape. The most amusing scene in the piece was the one between O'Neale and Cocker, in which the former bewilders the hapless Skye militia-man with a long rambling account of an impossible division of some chimerical property amongst an endless series of children, cousins, and great-grandmothers, until he is assured of the safety of the Chevalier. The singing devolved upon Mr. Hudson, and Miss P. Horton, who were warmly applauded; and Mrs. W. Clifford, as Margaret Craggie, an auld Scotch landlady—we believe we ought to say "gudewife"—was very effective in the little she had to do. Buckstone's drilling of his soldiers, in the early part of the piece, was very droll. His orders of "Left-face!" "Left-face!!" "Now, follow me down stairs!" put us in mind of the anecdote of the London volunteer, who, drilling his troops in the city, cried out, "Left wheel!" There was no notice taken of the command. "Left wheel!" he cried again. Still no notice. At last, getting incensed, he shouted forth, "Confound you; turn down Barbican!" The house was well filled, and the piece, slight as it was, appeared to give great satisfaction to the audience.

The comedy of "Look Before You Leap" preceded it. We were glad to find that our opinion of its merits on its first representation was ratified by the applause with which it was received throughout.

FRENCH PLAYS.

M. Perlet has, at last, to the delight of the audiences of Mr. Mitchell's ever-attractive theatre, recovered from his indisposition, and been playing during the past week. On Monday he appeared as Jean in the "Ambassadeur," and was most warmly applauded throughout. He was also called for at the end of the piece, and when he came forward the applause was doubled by the appearance of Mdlle. Brohan. "La Jeunesse de Henri V.," and "Les Rivaux d'eux Mêmes" concluded the programme of the evening's entertainments · of these pieces we have before spoken. "Le Bourgeoise Gentilhomme" is underlined, as being in rehearsal, in which M. Perlet will appear.

On Wednesday evening the amusing vandeville of "Le Comedien d'Etampes"—known to the English stage as "He Would be an Actor"—once more brought M. Perlet before the audience. His performance was one of finished elegance—quiet and subdued, but exceedingly effective. Perhaps his best character was that of the English lady so full of prudery and gaucherie. The points of his bad French told capitally, being caught up in an instant by the house. He finished with a very well directed "tag," referring to the kind reception which the French actors had met with from the English public. The house was very full; and M. Perlet was, as usual, called before the curtain amidst loud applause, at the conclusion of the performances.

SADLER'S WELLS.

Admirable as is the working of the company at this theatre, we think it better calculated, in the ensemble, for tragedy than for comedy. Possibly, in the abstract, their performances may be as equally good in one as in the other, but actors are judged by a severer test when pourtraying the every day manners of our own times, than when they are embodying the characters of the more romantic drama. Still, the performance of Sir Bulwer Lytton's comedy of "Money" at Sadler's Wells, on Monday evening, is worthy of all commendation. The cast of the chief characters may be surmised; Mr Phelps playing Evelyn, and Miss Laura Addison Clara Douglass. In addition, Georgina Vesey was performed by Miss Cooper; Sir F. Blount by Mr. Scharfe; and Captain Dudley Smooth by Mr. Marston. Miss Laura Addison's Clara Douglass was another proof of the genius of this young lady, displayed in a somewhat different light to that in which it has hitherto been so universally appreciated. We were afraid that the energy which appeared to be so naturally displayed in the more impassioned scenes of those tragic characters we had seen her enact would be somewhat too prononcé for the part in question, but she succeeded admirably; every point was naturally made, and, in consequence, exceedingly effective; and the entire performance convinced us, more and more, that she is destined, with a little care and additional study, in a good school, to take the highest rank amongst our tragic actresses, as well in the usual routine of their characters as in the parts in dramas, not strictly tragical, usually assigned to them. Mr. Phelps's Evelyn was, as might be supposed, a gentlemanly and careful interpretation of the character: and to speak of the other characters would be but to express an almost conventional repetition of the praises it has so often been our pleasure to award to the different members of this excellently conducted establishment. There is never anything in the performances at Sadler's Wells to offend the most fastidious critic. The mise en scène is admirable; the most punctual time is kept in the stage arrangements; and, from the highest to the lowest characters, there is an evidence of painstaking and intelligence to be observed worthy of the highest commendation. If it be true that "imitation is the sincerest flattery," then the numerous attempts of the minor theatres to "support the legitimate drama," as the managements term it, and, with few exceptions, the almost contemptible failures attendant upon these cant enterprises for we can give them no more lenient term form together the best compliments that can be paid to the judgment and energy of Mr. Phelps and those associated with him in conducting the theatre.

OLYMPIC.

On Monday evening a new drama was performed here, called "The Red Cap," written by Mr. Archer, a member of the corps dramatique of this establishment. From the plot and subject we should expect it to be a translation. The Duke de Beaufort (Mr. Leigh Murray) has been confined at Vincennes by the Cardinal Mazarin (Mr. Butler); and the most interesting situations in the piece arise from the endeavours made by his lady-love, the Duchess de Montbazon (Miss Charles) to effect his escape—by various stratagems. The drama was very well performed by the principal actors, and equally well receivedby the audience; it will, however, bear compression, as the interest now and then "lagged," in theatrical parlance.

PRINCESS'

A lively bluette, we should conceive of French origin, was produced at this theatre on Wednesday evening, called the "The Two Rainbows." To describe its plot is impossible: as it is nothing but a series of rapid equivoque and error from the beginning to the end, which served to keep the audience in a roar of laughter all the time. The piece takes its name from two brothers, who are umbrella makers; one of whom, Peter, (Mr. Compton), has married unknown to the other, James, (Mr. Granby); and the struggles of the former to keep his position a secret, and of his wife to assert it, lead to the fun of the piece, to which Mr S. Cowell also contributes. The acting was most excellent, and the success of the trifle very decided. It will have a merry life, and, we should conceive, not a very short one.

M. JULLIEN'S BAL MASQUE.

Any one who was present at the brilliant scene at Covent Garden, on Monday evening, would have been struck with the change from the masquerades of former days. All was order, and apparently enjoyment amongst the visitors. The decorations of the theatre were most superb: the music, as may be conceived, unequalled: and the costumes more varied and elegant than we have seen them upon any previous occasion. Indeed the appearance of the house, taken altogether, quite equalled anything of the kind we had ever witnessed even at the balls of the Académie Royale, at Paris. Up to a very late hour, when we left, there had not been disturbance of any kind: indeed, throughout the evening, courtesy and good temper prevailed. All clowns, pantaloons, and similar characters were excluded; and by those not in costume, a proper evening toilet was observed. The audience portion of the theatre was crowded to the back of the slips; and, in the salle the throng was so great just before supper, as to render the "cutting out" of the grand galoppe a task of some difficulty; when it was in full play the effect of the hundreds whirling round the house was most extraordinary.

The Appointment of Mr. Rowland Hill.—It appears that Mr. Rowland Hill has not been appointed in the room of Colonel Maberly, but as his secretary, at a salary of £1200 a year. The appointment is a permanent one, but Colonel Maberly still continues to be Secretary to the Post-office. The office now filled by Mr. Rowland Hill is a new one, and has been created for the purpose of enabling him to carry into effect the remaining portions of his plan of Post-office reform. On Monday Mr. Hill entered upon his new appointment, and was congratulated on the occasion by the Right Hon. the Marquis of Clanricarde, the Postmaster-General, and Colonel Maberly; also by T. S Duncombe, Esq., M.P., who paid a special visit on the occasion.

A Woven Mouse.—A few days ago, a weaver, named Peat, in the employ of Messrs. Dover, Younghusband, and Co., woollen-manufacturers, Millbeck, near Keswick, actually wove a live mouse into his cloth; but whether the unfortunate little animal had dropped from the ceiling or had made its way up from the floor is altogether a mystery. The little captive, however, was taken out alive from its woolly net and restored to liberty, without apparently having sustained the slightest injury.

Solomon Outdone.—At New Orleans, says the Picayune, a prisoner was tried on a charge of entering a house in the night time, and committing a robbery. He had made an opening, into which he thrust the upper part of his body; and then he clutched the articles which he coveted. His counsel contended that the prisoner did not "enter the house;" he only partly entered it. The Jury brought in a verdict of guilty against the upper half of his body, and acquitted the remainder (or, as Jonathan would say, the "balance"). The Judge then sentenced the guilty moiety of the man to a year's imprisonment; leaving it to his option to have the innocent half cut off, or take it along with him.

The Late Extraordinary Railway Adventure.—Mr. Markham, the gentleman whose violent attack on a fellow passenger, and extraordinary escape from a railway train, while labouring under an attack of brain fever, recently attracted so much public observation, is now restored to perfect health, and has left town to rejoin his family.

Remarkable Custom. On Sunday evening last, the annual sermon, in commemoration of the great storm of 1703, was preached in Little Wild-street Chapel, by the Rev. C. Woollacott, from Mark, iv., 41. In describing the damage done by the great storm, he stated that in London alone more than 800 houses were laid in ruins, and 2000 stacks of chimneys thrown down. In the country, upwards of 400 windmills were either blown down or took fire by the violence with which their sails were driven round by the wind. In the New Forest, 4000 trees were blown down, and more than 19,000 in the same state were counted in the county of Kent. On the sea, the ravages of this frightful storm were yet more distressing 15 ships of the Royal navy, and more than 300 merchant vessels were lost, with upwards of 6000 British seamen. The Eddystone Lighthouse, with its ingenious architect, Mr. Winstanley, was totally destroyed. The Bishop of Bath and Wells and his lady, were killed by the falling of their palace. The sister of the Bishop of London, and many others, lost their lives. This annual custom has been observed for upwards of a century past.

More Destitution.—An inquest was held on Tuesday evening, at the Barley Mow, Mount-street, Grosvenor-square, before Mr. Bedford, on the body of Richard Thomas Lyons, a writing engraver, without any settled residence. William Hancock, crossing-sweeper in Hanover-square, said that on Saturday last he was with the deceased in the tap-room of the Duke of York, Blenheim-street, Bond street The deceased appeared in a destitute and starving condition, and when some painters came into the room to have their dinner, he eyed their food so covetously that some of them took pity on him, and gave him a portion of their meal. He soon afterwards left, but had not been gone many minutes, before witness heard that he had fallen down in the street, and on going outside he saw him lying on the pavement, A stretcher was procured to take him to the workhouse, but upon his arrival there he was dead. From the evidence of other witnesses, it appeared that the deceased had long been out of work, and was in a state of great destitution. Mr. Bloxam, surgeon, attributed death to congestion of the brain, probably caused by the full state of the stomach. On opening the body he found several pieces of meat the size of an egg. Verdict—"Natural Death from apoplexy."

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

THE MARCHIONESS DOWAGER OF WESTMINSTER.

Eleanor, Marchioness of Westminster, who died on the 29th ult. of an internal complaint, from which she had suffered for some time, was only daughter and heiress of the late Sir Thomas Egerton, Bart., of Egerton and Oulton, who was elevated to the peerage in 1784, as Baron Grey de Wilton, and subsequently, in 1801, obtained a new patent creating him Viscount Grey de Wilton and Earl of Wilton, with special remainder to the second, and to all the younger sons successively of his daughter. That lady married in 1794 Robert, Viscount Belgrave (who succeeded his father as Earl Grosvenor in 1802, and was made Marquis of Westminster in 1831), and by him has left issue three sons, Richard, present Marquis; Thomas, Earl of Wilton; and Robert. Her ladyship's age was seventy six. Under the late Peer's will she received an annuity of £6500, in addition to her marriage settlement.

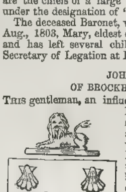
SIR GEORGE MACPHERSON GRANT, BART., OF BALLINDALLOCH AND INVERESHIE.

This worthy Baronet died at Ballindalloch Castle, his seat in Elginshire, on the 24th ult. He formerly represented, for a considerable period, the County of Sutherland in Parliament, and obtained his patent of Baronetcy in 1838.

Sir George was elder son of Captain John Macpherson, and inherited as heir of provision to his father's maternal uncle, General James Grant, the estate of Ballindalloch, whereupon he assumed the surname of Grant. The family he paternally represented, the Macphersons of Invereshie, are the chiefs of a large tribe, which for ages has been distinguished under the designation of "Slioch Gillies."

The deceased Baronet, who was born 25th Feb., 1781, married 26th Aug., 1803, Mary, eldest daughter of Thomas Carnegy, Esq., of Craigs, and has left several children, the eldest of whom, John, some time Secretary of Legation at Lisbon, succeeds to the title.

JOHN BARNEBY, ESQ., M.P.,
OF BROCKHAMPTON, COUNTY HEREFORD.



This gentleman, an influential landed proprietor in the West of England, acted as Chairman of the Quarter Sessions for Herefordshire, and sat in Parliament as Knight of the Shire for Worcester. Previously, in 1835, he had been elected for Droitwich. Mr. Barneby was eldest son of the late John Barneby, Esq., of Brockhampton, by Elizabeth, his wife, daughter and heiress of Robert Bulkeley, Esq., of Bulkeley, in Cheshire, and grandson of Bartholomew Richard Sutley, Esq., of Lawton, who assumed the surname of Barneby, as representative of his maternal ancestors, the first of whom on record is Thomas Barneby, Esq., of Ludlow, Treasurer to Edward IV. at the battle of Towton.

At the period of his decease, which occurred at his town residence in Portman-square, on the 30th ult., Mr. Barneby had just completed his 47th year. He married, 24th July, 1838, Susan, eldest daughter of Henry Elwes, Esq., of Colesborne, county Gloucester, and has left issue. His younger brother, Edmund, on succeeding to a considerable fortune, changed his name, and is the present Mr. Higginson, of Saltmarshe, the sale of whose magnificent gallery of paintings excited so much interest a few months since.

THE GRAND DUCHESS MARIA.

The Grand Duchess Maria Michaelowna was the niece of the present Emperor of Russia, and the eldest daughter of the Grand Duke Michael, by his wife Charlotte, now Helen Paulowna, daughter of Prince Paul of Wurtemberg. The Grand Duchess Maria was born the 9th March, 1825: this amiable young Princess, to the inexpressible grief of her illustrious parents, who were with her in her last moments, died at Vienna about three weeks ago; she was interred there on the 21st ultimo.

DREADFUL FIRE AND LOSS OF LIFE.

Early on Wednesday morning, a fire of a fearful character broke out at 31, Calcraft-terrace, New-cut, Lambeth, known as the Exhibition of Nature and Art, the property of Mr. Fergusson. Whilst the proprietor and one or two other parties were sitting in the front kitchen partaking of a glass of rum and water, they were suddenly alarmed at hearing a loud crackling noise proceeding from the exhibition-room. On getting to the top of the staircase they found that the exhibition was wrapped in flames. An instant cry of "Fire" was raised by Mr. Fergusson, in order to arouse the other inmates of the place, but whilst he was endeavouring to do so, the flames made such fearful progress that it was with difficulty any one could escape. As it was, the persons in the lower floor were severely singed in getting out. The engines were soon on the spot; but the figures being composed principally of wax, the flames rose with great rapidity, and the building became fired from the ground-floor to the roof before a drop of water was thrown. By strenuous exertions on the part of the firemen, however, the flames were got down by half-past one, but not until the wax figures, the serpents, and monkeys, were destroyed. The cries of the latter animals on the flames reaching them were agonising.

The whole of the furniture in the upper floors is likewise consumed, and a female dwarf, named Robertson, was burnt to death. Mr. Fergusson estimates the loss of his exhibition alone at upwards of £1000.

As soon as circumstances would permit, the firemen made an examination of the premises, and under a pile of charred timber they found the body of the female dwarf, who formed a portion of the exhibition. Her lower extremities were much burned, and her features considerably disfigured. She had retired to rest in an upper apartment. Her age was 18, height 26 inches, and her weight was only 28lbs. The servant, who also resided in the house, escaped uninjured. At the inquest upon the poor dwarf, the Jury returned a verdict that the deceased died from the effects of burning, caused by the house having accidentally taken fire.

Sudden Death at a Railway Station.—On Tuesday morning, a gentleman named Francis, a solicitor, of Monument-yard, London, left Hastings, with his daughter, to go to London; but, on their arrival at the Brighton terminus, Mr. Francis, who was between sixty and seventy years of age, was taken suddenly ill, and, before medical assistance could be procured, he was a corpse.

Accidents in Hunting.—Lord Gardiner met with an accident while hunting, two or three days since, and dislocated his collar-bone. The Earl of Granville also had a fall yesterday week, in the early part of a run with the Royal buckhounds in the Vale of Aylesbury, and is reported to have dislocated his ancle.

Fatal Accident at Merton.—A painful sensation has been occasioned in the villages of Mitcham, Tooting, and Merton, by the death of Mr. William Newman, of Mitcham, the well-known medical herb grower. On Tuesday morning, about eight o'clock, some men in the employ of Mr. B. Drouett, of Lower Tooting, were at work in a field near the single gate at Merton, when they heard the smothered report of a gun. About eleven o'clock, business calling them to the further end of the field, they perceived the body of Mr. Newman lying across the ditch, with a recently-discharged fowling-piece lying by his side. The roof of the right side of his skull was blown completely off just above the ear, and the brain lay in the ditch a few inches apart from the head. The men conveyed the deceased to the Victory Inn, Merton-lane. It appeared that the deceased had left home early in the morning to shoot over his fields, and, from the position in which the body was found, there is no doubt that, whilst he was leaping the ditch, which is six feet wide, his foot slipped, and, as he fell, the trigger caught the hedge. The deceased was sixty-two years of age, and has left a numerous family well provided for. An inquest was held on Wednesday upon the body, by Mr. Carter, and a verdict of "Accidental Death" returned.

THE QUEEN'S STAG HOUNDS.—THE MEET, AYLESBURY VALE.—DRAWN BY DUNCAN.

THE ROYAL HOUNDS IN THE VALE OF AYLESBURY.

There is not in the wide world a valley so sweet
As that vale—when Diana's boon votaries meet,
Oh! can there on earth be enjoyment above
Good fellowship linked with the sport that we love! After Moore.

"In the month of November, when Englishmen hang and drown themselves" . . . . . Thus a French writer of the last century commences one of his volumes. Well; such practices probably prevailed in the good old times, when black frosts of three weeks at a spell were the fashion, and the Londoners used to cook their beeves upon the Thames. But nous avons changé tout cela. All Saints no longer comes in accompanied by the Coroner. Grim people no longer whet the dagger and mix the bowl to celebrate "All Hallow E'en." Song birds carrol the advent of the once truculent month, and Guy Fawkeses hang their raw heads and bloody bones, abashed at the sunshine.

See, on old Hyem's chin, and icy crown,
An odorous chaplet of sweet Summer buds.

For the last fifteen or sixteen years the Royal Hounds have hunted during every season in the Vale of Aylesbury; generally at the fall and the spring of each. The farmers, indeed, tell you that from its extreme richness—in fact, from being so rank of verdure, it can ill bear being ridden over after Christmas—but that opinion must be received cum grano salis. Whatever injury, however, the rural districts may sustain, certes the town of Aylesbury profits largely by these visits. It was in the year 1835, that the writer of this notice first took the field with the Royal Stag Hounds, then under the direction of the late Earl of Erroll, in that renowned region of Buckinghamshire. He found, on his arrival—the 16th of November—upwards of one thousand horses in the town, and such a galaxy of sportsmen as never gladdened the streets of Melton or Northampton.

GOING TO THE MEET.

At that period Mr. De Burgh's Stag Hounds were wont to hunt the alternate days; and, since then, Baron Rothschild's; but our especial business just now is with "the Royal Property." On the 23rd, then, of last November, "of glorious memory," the Winter Meet took place. It drew together vast multitudes, and malgré here and there the days were damp, it produced a brilliant tryst. Of all the uninteresting things in the world—of letters—not even excepting ——'s novels, or ——'s poetry—is the description of a run with hounds. Nobody likes to read it; he who was not present don't care who was, or a pinch of snuff about the sport or the country; and he who took part in it is either disgusted if his name be omitted altogether, or never satisfied with his treatment, however laudatorily he may be spoken of. For this reason we purpose dealing in generalities. We desire to offer some characteristics of the place and the people; to put together, in fact, so much text as may serve to wait on the very clever sketches made on the spot by Mr. Duncan, an artist who has completely comprehended and entered into the spirit of the scene. To this intent we will select one especial occasion, say the opening meet, which took place at the White Hart, the head quarters of the noble master, Lord Granville, and was subsequently adjourned to some four miles from the town. where the stag—Light Young Harlequin, no misnomer—was enlarged, in the presence of a brilliant field, and afforded as brilliant a burst as ever flying Quornite dreamt of when he reveried. What a cavalcade (sui generis, which means essentially English) accompanied the gallant array to the spot where the cavaliers were to dêbut their devoir! Not alone were their squadrons of brave men but bevies of fair women, and humanity, in every guise, from "little paddy" as lean and unslippered as "a pig's paratee," to old greasy, the ex-tallow chandler of Candlewick, looking as if he had been weaned upon turtle soup, striving to keep up the circulation in his pony trap, an emblem in his dead extremities and sepulchral tones, as an unsanctified wag observed of "Pere la Chaise."

In Stag Hunting, there is something exceedingly aristocratic. Your fox-hunter goes out all vague hope, and with the positive necessity for exertion in seeking his quarry—like your common fellow, in search of his daily bread—and, sometimes, both arrive at the same result—disappointment. But your stag-hunter sits down to table, with his turbot and lobster-sauce smoking under his nose: his platter is filled before he unfolds his napkin. Thus, so soon as Dives drew near the spot whereon the venison had been placed—or, in humbler phrase, where the deer, as aforesaid, was uncarted—the cry of quadrupeds rose loud and shrill, as did that of the bipeds, who shouted, "they're off!"—and so they were; full many of them biting the dirt, and scaring the crowd with ignoble horsemanship. . . . . Will the courteous reader bear with an episode? In the early morning, faut de mieux, we strolled abroad intent on lions, and forced our way to the County Gaol, one of those prisons alluded to by Goldsmith, in his exquisite story of the "Old Soldier." On our way to the meet, we were joined by a gentleman of the neighbourhood, to whom we spoke of our visit to the Prison, and other public buildings of the town, and had left our catalogue unfinished when the Chase commenced—as above. Now, verily, the pace was awful, and so was the fall into a deep lane, which occurred very early in the run. A man who charged it in advance of us, came down with a crash fit to powder a mill-stone: he was not killed "all out," though it is difficult to say what saved him: perhaps it was Providence—perhaps he fell upon his head. But "For'ard!" was the cry, and the gulf was to be cross'd. We were in the act of essaying the imminent deadly breach, when we espied, hard upon our heels, the companion of our ride to the meet. He was in the act to speak; he did speak (apropos, probably, to our visit of the morning) and in sepulchral voice gave utterance to the query—"Pray, Sir, have you been to our Infirmary yet?" We looked him a gaunt rejoinder, shut our eyes, and all was over!

ENJOYING THE SPORT.

ON THE HORNS OF A DILEMMA.

To such gatherings as those with the Queen's Hounds on their holiday occasions, of course there is as much of the quaint as the orthodox. Men in strange faces may be seen trying to negociate a post and rail—like him of Mr. Duncan's depicting—obviously no "fancy's sketch," for, as Byron has it, it is "too like." Yokels of the thoroughbred Hodge kind, now becoming rather rare, perch upon gates; clowns of the first water climb trees, and dangle upon stiles. Bucks is still a rural land, despite locomotion and the Corn Bill. . . . . The country, more particularly that gone over in the instance we have in hand, is emphatically a splendid one. About Quainton, Denham, and Marston, the fences indeed require you to keep your eyes open, but if you've a heart under your ribs, and it don't throb with rapture at sight of Lady Mead, verily, thou hast not a soul above buttons. It's after a run under such circumstances, that one understands philosophy, theoretically as well as practically. Having taken our deer at Blackthorn, we—that is the inditer of these presents—were taking our way homewards, when our quondam companion overtook us. As a judgment on him for his unseasonable question, he had lost his hat, and was jogging along with his pocket-handkerchief tied round his head and under his chin—being prone, as he informed us to tooth-ache, and indifferent about appearances.

A little further on we passed a disciple of the Virgin Queen, who had parted with one of the tails of his coat. We politely alluded to his loss. "Oh, it's not lost, Sir," said this philosopher; "I've got it in the pocket of the other skirt." Could Socrates have done more?

Such are the passages they encounter who eschew homekeeping lives. Our sketch is a mere outline of one—not the least agreeable that has fallen to our lot. It was all over national—from the courtly bearing of the noble master of the revels and his especial "minions" to the blunt hilarity of the clodhopper who "whistled as he went"—to see the fun, "for want of thought." And now once more—and ever, courteous reader—we say, in especial word of our prologue, the emphatic phase of our epilogue, "Vale!"

NATIONAL SPORTS.

STAG-HUNTING IN SURREY.

. . . . my heart is not here,
. . . . a chasing the deer —Fragment from Scott.

We resume our lucubrations on woodcraft, and take them up where we left them off—in the matter of hunting the hart and hind. It had been our intention to commence with a sketch of the Royal establishment, in that case made and provided; but second thoughts suggested that such a course would be an invidious one. There used to be an old caricature of "The Swell and the Surrey," and ill-natured people might call our presentment a second edition of it: therefore we reverse the order, placing the Corydons first and the Corinthians last. Stag-hunting is another guess affair from what it was in the good old times. Then there are said to have been sixty-nine Royal forests in England; while that called the New Forest, in Hampshire, was formed by putting two and twenty parish churches hors de combat, and knocking thirty miles of country into one. Diana preserve us! Now-a-days we take things easier, availing ourselves of such advantages as the hour furnishes us with; which, as regards that division of the chase to which this notice more particularly applies, are not inconsiderable. For instance, those noble highways, put out of commission by the invention of railways and steam locomotion, offer themselves to the exclusive service of the stag-hunter, and meet, it must be confessed, very considerable countenance in the vicinity of the metropolis. But we anticipate: to our thesis.

This day week it was announced that the Surrey Stag Hounds would meet at Norbiton—some couple of miles on the London side of Kingston-upon-Thames, but wherefore we will not take on us to declare, seeing that they uncarted their venison upon Ditton Marsh, a tolerable distance from the county town in an opposite direction. It was a glorious autumnal morning; and, in the words of Shakspeare—

> The hunt is up: the moon is bright and grey,
> The fields are fragrant, and the woods are green;
> Uncouple here, and let us make a bay.

But previously they made a draw, by means of a remarkably stout gentleman, who canvassed for half sovereigns with an industry truly commendable. The pack consisted of fifteen couples of miscellaneous hounds; but though certainly "rum ones to look at, good ones to go." The field was a very good one—that is to say, speaking of quantity; not less than a hundred and fifty, very likely, were there, of one sort or another—chiefly of "another." They literally came from all quarters: a brace, to our own knowledge, from New Zealand. One can't say much of the turn out as an ensemble: it will not be discourteous to observe that high breeding was not the characteristic of—the horses. Men of mark, however, honoured the meet—both squires and citizens of substance, and sporting cavaliers of renown, in more branches of the art than one. It was past noon before the deer was enlarged; and so soon as the hounds were laid on, some passages of emphatic riding took place. The chase led to what used to be the Semaphore, before the electric telegraph put its nose out of joint; and it was wonderful to note how some particularly queer nags, as regarded legs and condition, and the like, did their office. They jumped gates, so they did, and took to the mud with the unction of scavengers. The country, indeed, was none of the best; but what can you expect of a region within sight from the top of the Monument? We are not going to catalogue the moving accidents, nor to relate how one ambitious youth bit the dirt at the very first fence; nor how, when his absconding courser was caught by a yokel, the "chaw" interrogated us with, "I say, do you know where's the gent that belongs to this horse?" All this were invidious, and beside our purpose, which is to sketch the sporting idiosyncrasy of the Surrey. Truth compels us to state that it is of a somewhat common caste; but then it answers its object—and does the Quorn or the Pytchley more? It is an agreeable dyspeptic, and therefore of immense importance to men constantly exposed to the dangers of Guildhall and the Mansion-house. Should the Surrey ever set up a professional coat of arms, the device might be a haunch of venison in full chase over Banstead Downs, with this motto—

> The first physicians by debauch were made.
> Excess began, and Sloth sustains the trade.

A TAIL-PIECE.

By chase our long-lived fathers earned their food;
Toil strung their nerves and purified their blood
Better to hunt in fields for health unbought,
Than fee the doctor for a nauseous draught!

TATTERSALL'S.

Monday.—The betting this afternoon was in keeping with the assemblage, which was small in number, with a small proportion of backers. The few blows struck in the course of the day had no other effect on the prices than to drive Planet back to 25 to 1; we predict that he will see a better day, malgré all that is said about his legs. Latest prices:

Leamington Steeple Chases.—On account of the state of the ground from the frost, the steeple chases are postponed until Tuesday, the 15th of December.

The Season.—On the 26th ult., at a few miles from Shrewsbury, there was an apple tree which had borne fruit three times this year, and had then forty fine apples upon it.

COUNTRY NEWS.

Representation of Manchester.—Mr. Bright has consented to become a candidate for Manchester, Mr. Cobden having declined to do so. A requisition has been presented to the Earl of Lincoln.

The Cobden National Tribute Fund.—The usual weekly meeting of the members of the Manchester Committee for the promotion of this undertaking was held in the League Rooms, Manchester, on Tuesday evening. Mr. Pattisson, the Secretary, reported that the fund had this week been increased by the amount of £243 1s. 9d., making a total, up to the present date, of £77,716 6s. 5d.

Opening of the Bury Line.—On Monday, the first goods train left the Ipswich Station for Bury, with about fifty or sixty tons. Another train left at ten o'clock, consisting of seven trucks. The first train left Bury again at two o'clock, and arrived in the evening at Ipswich. In order to satisfy the public as to the stability of the "boggy" portion of the line near Stowmarket, it is as well to say that a train laden with 200 tons weight of goods and two engines passed over it without affecting its solidity in the slightest degree. The trains conveyed a large quantity of coals.

The Electric Telegraph.—The electric telegraph is now open along the Hull and Selby line, and from thence to the Milford Junction, and to Normanton, Leeds, and York. From Normanton the communication is carried on to Rugby and the intermediate stations, but here a break occurs, which causes the news from London to be three or four hours later than it would be were this link also filled up.

The Liverpool Cotton Market.—A letter from Liverpool, dated Wednesday, says—"Our to-day's cotton market has been a perfectly wild one; between twenty-five and thirty thousand bales have been sold at an advance of nearly a farthing per pound. This extraordinary state of things is, in a great degree, to be attributed to the very enormous-freights charged from America to this. Every kind of vessel is eagerly laid hold of for bread stuffs, and the consequence is that the cotton is left without means of transit."

Agitation for a Ten-hours' Bill, at Leeds.—Last Monday evening, a numerous meeting of the inhabitants of the borough of Leeds, convened by the Mayor, in compliance with a numerously-signed requisition, comprising the names of several members of the Town Council, and members of the medical profession, was held in the Music Hall, the largest room in the town, "to consider the propriety of petitioning Parliament for a legislative enactment to limit the hours of labour for women and young persons employed in factories, to ten hours per day for five days in the week, and eight hours on the Saturday." The Rev. Dr. Hook, vicar of Leeds, took the chair. After much animated speaking, resolutions in accordance with the requisition were unanimously adopted. Mr. Ferrand made some very strong observations against Lord Denman, in reference to what fell from that learned Judge, on the occasion when the rule for a criminal information against Mr. Ferrand was made absolute.

The Weather in the Country.—The provincial papers and private letters speak of the commencement of severe weather. The country around Liverpool is covered with snow, and the frost is so severe that the skaters have been enabled to enjoy their sport. On Sunday night there was a heavy fall of snow at Leeds, which [illegible] gently, and covered the ground to the depth of six inches. The weather for several days preceding was [illegible] but a [illegible] set in on Friday night (last week), and continued until Saturday afternoon, when it gave way, and was succeeded by the first fall of snow this season. The [illegible] and Blagdon Hills surrounding Taunton, were on Saturday night covered with snow. The frosts since Saturday night have been more inclement than any within the last two years. Last Saturday night, the snow commenced falling at Manchester and continued to come down heavily up to a late hour in the evening, a strong frosty air prevailing at the time. On the Liverpool branch of the London and North-Western, the last train from Liverpool on Sunday night was an hour behind time, but all the Manchester trains were regular.

The Poisoning Case in Suffolk.—The inquest upon the body of John Foster, who recently died under suspicious circumstances at Sudbury, Suffolk, is concluded. The evidence produced on the first day of the inquest (the 24th ult.) led to directions being given for a post-mortem examination of the body, and the proceedings were adjourned to allow time for the completion of the analysis. When the inquiry was resumed, witnesses were examined who deposed to the deceased having returned from work on the evening of the 17th ult. apparently in perfect health; but, after partaking of supper, which had been prepared by his wife, to whom he had been only three weeks married, he was seized with violent sickness, and remained in great suffering till the following morning, when he died. The medical witnesses stated that they had detected arsenic in the intestines, and other appearances of the body led to the conclusion that death had been occasioned by some virulent poison. The Jury ultimately returned a verdict of "Wilful murder" against the wife, Catherine Foster, who was committed to the county gaol at Bury St. Edmund's, for trial at the ensuing sessions.

Fatal Accident on the Eastern Counties Railway.—An inquest was held at the New Inn, Roydon, on Friday (last week) on the body of Elizabeth Coleman, aged eleven years, who was killed upon the above line. The deceased was, it appeared, endeavouring to cross the line at a point near the Roydon station, where the Lock road crosses the line on a level, when she was struck by the buffer of a Cambridge train and killed upon the spot. The Jury returned a verdict of "Accidental death."

THE MARKETS.

Corn Exchange (Friday).—The arrivals of English wheat for our market during the present week have been very extensive, yet the show of samples here to-day was not to say large. Most descriptions met a steady sale, at Monday's quotations. In free foreign wheat a good business was doing, at late rates; but corn under lock commanded very little attention. We had a large arrival of barley, owing to which the trade was dull, and prices had a downward tendency. The malt trade was slow, without alteration in value. The supply of [illegible] ge, while the sale was slow, at late rates. Other articles as on Monday.

Arrivals [illegible]: Wheat, 12,610; barley, 14,320; malt, 7240; oats, 5740. Flour, 5710 sacks. [illegible] Foreign. Wheat, 8580; barley, 15,370; oats, 22,890 quarters. [illegible]

[illegible] tilling, 38s [illegible] 68s to 70s, [illegible] feed oats, 25s to 30s, potato ditto, 30s to 32s; You[illegible] white, 25s to 30s; tick beans, new, 4[illegible] maple, 44s to 46s; white, 46s to 48s; boilers, 4[illegible] Foreign.—Free [illegible] Suffolk, 46s to 48s; Stockton and Yorkshire [illegible] In Bond.—wheat, —s to —s; Dantzig, red, 58s to 6[illegible] —s to —s; oats, new, —s to —s; ditto, feed, —s to —s; [illegible] per [illegible] Flour, American, 34s to 36s; Baltic, —s to —s per barrel.

The Seed Market.—Linseed and rapeseed, as well as cakes, move off steadily, at full prices. In all other kinds of seeds—the supplies of which are not to say large—exceedingly little is doing.

Linseed, English, sowing, 50s to 60s; Baltic, crushing, 44s 0d to 46s; Mediterranean and Odessa, 45s to 48s. Hempseed, 35s to 38s per quarter. Coriander, 10s to 13s per cwt. Brown [illegible] white ditto, 8s to 10s. Tares, 5s 6d to 6s per bushel. English Rapeseed, new, £23 to £25 per last of ten quarters. Linseed cakes, English, £13 to £13 10s, ditto, foreign, [illegible] £5 0s to £8 0s per ton. Canary, 55s to 62s per quarter. English clover-seed, red, —s to —s, extra, —s to —s; white, —s to —s; extra, up to —s. Foreign, red, —s to —s; extra, —s; white, —s to —s; extra, —s per cwt.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread in the metropolis are from 9d to 9½d; of household ditto, 7½d to 8½d per 4lb loaf.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 63s 9d; barley, 46s 8d; oats, 27s 6d; rye, 46s 0d; beans, 45s [illegible]

The Six Weeks' [illegible]—Wheat, 60s 10d; barley, 42s 4d; oats, 26s 7d; rye, 41s 9d; beans, 46s 3d; peas, 49s 7d.

Duties on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 4s 0d; barley, 2s 0d; oats, 1s 6d; rye, 2s 0d; beans, 2s 0d; peas, 2s 0d.

Tea.—There is rather more business doing in the common kinds of Congou, at full prices. In other descriptions comparatively little is passing.

Sugar.—Fine colory parcels of West India sugar are in excellent request, at full prices. In the middling and inferior kinds—as well as in Bengal and Mauritius parcels—comparatively little is doing. Refined goods are firm, at full prices.

Coffee.—In this article, very few sales have taken place, at late rates.

Rice.—Bengal is steady, but all other kinds are a slow sale.

Provisions.—Although the supply of Irish butter continues tolerably extensive, the demand is steady, and prices are well supported. The best qualities of foreign butter move off readily, at from 98s to 103s per cwt; but the middling and inferior kinds command very little attention, though we cannot call them lower. There is more doing in English butter, at full currencies. Fresh is steady, at from 12s. to 13s. per dozen lbs. A slight advance has taken place in the value of the best bacon, with a firm inquiry. Prime sizeable Waterford, 53s to 56s per cwt. There is more doing in lard, but at no more money. The best Irish hams are quite as dear; but the inferior qualities are a trifle lower. English cheese is declining in value, owing to the large stocks on hand.

Tallow.—There is [illegible] more doing, at full prices. P.Y.C., on the spot, is 48s to 48s 3d per cwt. Town tallow is selling at 49s 6d to 50s net cash.

Oils.—We have had very little doing in any kind, at late rates.

Coals (Friday).—Adair's, 19s; Lambton, 20s 3d; Stewart's, 20s 6d; Hartley, 1[illegible], and Adelaide, [illegible]9s 6d per ton.

Hay and Straw.—Meadow hay, £3 5s to £4; clover ditto, £3 5s to £5; and straw, £1 10s to £1 14s per load.

Hops (Friday).—Fine parcels of hops are in good request, at full prices. In all other kinds, next to nothing is doing. The following are the present rates:—Sussex pockets, 74s to 88s. Weald of Kent ditto, 80s to 90s; Mid and East Kent ditto, 86s to 126s per cwt.

Potatoes.—Although the supplies of potatoes are not large, the demand for them is in a very sluggish state, at prices varying from 120s to 180s per ton.

Smithfield (Friday).—Although the supply of beasts here to-day was seasonably large, and of improved quality, the beef trade was steady, at fully Monday's quotations. From abroad, we received 300 beasts, 880 sheep, and 20 calves. With sheep, we were scantily supplied; yet the sale for that description of stock was in a sluggish state, at barely stationary prices. In calves, a steady business was doing, at late rates, while pigs were quite as dear, with a fair inquiry. Milch cows were very dull, at from £16 to £18 each, including their small calf.

Per 8lb. to sink the offals.—Coarse and inferior beasts, 2s 8d to 2s 10d; second quality ditto, 3s 0d to 3s 4d, prime large oxen, 3s 6d to 3s 10d; prime Scots, &c., 4s 0d to 4s 4d; coarse and inferior sheep, 3s 10d to 4s 0d, second quality ditto, 4s 2d to 4s 6d; prime coarse-woolled ditto, 4s 8d to 4s 10d; prime South Down ditto, 5s 0d to 5s 4d; large coarse calves, 3s 8d to 4s 2d; prime small ditto, 4s 4d to 4s 8d, large hogs, 3s 8d to 4s 4d, neat small porkers, 4s 6d to 4s 8d. Suckling calves, 18s to 30s; and quarter old store pigs, 16s to 19s each. Beasts, 952; cows, 130; sheep, 2760; calves, 197; pigs, 290.

Newgate and Leadenhall (Friday).—We had a very steady trade to-day at full prices.

Per 8lb. by the carcase.—Inferior beef, 2s 6d to 2s 8d; middling ditto, 2s 10d to 3s 0d, prime large ditto, 3s 2d to 3s 4d; prime small ditto, 3s 6d to 3s 8d; large pork, 3s 4d to 4s 0d; inferior mutton, 3s 4d to 3s 8d; middling ditto, 3s 10d to 4s 2d; prime ditto, 4s 4d to 4s 6d; veal, 3s 4d to 4s 6d; small pork, 4s 2d to 4s 8d.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

There was considerable animation in the English Market at the commencement of the week, Consols advancing on Monday about ¼ per cent on the opening price of of 95⅛ ¼. This improvement, and the cause of its continuing firmly supported until Thursday, was principally caused by the purchases of the Government Broker, and Broker for the Court of Chancery. These descriptions of "compelled" investments operating upon a market rather short of stock (the principal jobbers being sellers, and, therefore, not inclined to part with stock until settling day), necessarily enhanced quotations. Towards the close of the week, however, the price of Consols gradually receded, closing ultimately at 95½ to ⅝ for Account, and 95⅜ to ½ for Money. Reduced have for some few days past quoted a price relatively lower than Consols, another proof that it is only the state of the market, and not any reliance upon future probabilities, which has influenced the rise. Among the keen observers of the Market this discrepancy did not escape discovery, and some extensive operations by the sale of Consols and purchase of Reduced, speedily adjusted prices. Exchequer Bills continue heavy at almost nominal prices, it not being possible to effect any large sale at the present quotations. Bank Stock is good at a slight advance, and India is about 258. The following list shows the closing prices:—Three per Cent. Reduced Annuities, 94; Three per Cent. Consols Annuities, 95½; New Three-and-a-Quarter per Cent. Annuities, 96½: Annuities, 30 years, 9 11-16; Ditto 30 years, Jan. 5, 1860, 10 3-16; India Stock, 258½; Consols for Opening, 95⅝; Exchequer Bills, £1000 1½d., 7 pm.

The Foreign Market has been, and continues more buoyant than for some time past, an improvement in the value of all the speculative Stocks having occurred. Spanish Five per Cents. on Monday quoted 26½ for Money, and 26⅝ for Account; the closing quotation is 26¾ for Account. The Three per Cents. have not participated in the rise, closing at 37½. This difference arises from the speculators entertaining hopes that the overdue Coupons on the Five per Cent Stock will be converted in some shape, and not allowed any longer to accumulate. Portuguese Four per Cents. have advanced from Monday's price of 37½ to 39½. There is scarcely any doubt that the dividend due in January will be paid, but a deduction of the Decima, or Ten per Cent. Portuguese Income Tax will be insisted on. But for this imposition, there is little doubt that a greater advance would have taken place in the Stock. Mexican is better; the difficulties likely to be experienced by the Americans, on their advance towards the capital, from the judicious defence adopted by Santa Anna, have inspired some hope among the bondholders. With regard to the dispute about the conversion, there is little doubt that it will be ultimately sanctioned, although, perhaps, the interest will be reduced to a rate better adapted to the resources of the country, and consequent ability to be met regularly, than the present. The last business done was at 22½ to ⅝. Brazilian Bonds are 86. Dutch Two-and-a-half per Cents., 60. Four per Cent. Certificates, 92⅞.

Shares have not only been more buoyant, but good purchases have improved prices. All the political alarms having for the present subsided, the great cause of railway depression is removed. Doubtless, any disturbance of the peace of Europe would immediately stop all railway schemes. With regard to meeting the future calls on the numerous lines about to be commenced, much difference of opinion [illegible] be, therefore, at present, a legitimate reason for the [illegible]. At the close of the week the market was good, at the [illegible] pm.; Birmingham and Gloucester, 128; [illegible] ford Junction, 9⅝; Caledonian, 23⅝; Ditto Half Shares, 1½; Cornwall, 1½; Ditto Half Shares, ⅝; Direct Northern, 2½; Eastern Counties, 23¾; Ditto New, 7⅝ pm. x d; Ditto York Extension; 3⅞; Eastern Union Quarter Shares, 13; East Lancashire, New, 9[illegible]; East Lincolnshire, 2¼; Edinburgh and Northern, 15½; Edinburgh and Perth, 1¾; Ely and Huntingdon, 12⅞; Great Southern and Western (Ireland), 28½; Great North of England, 235½; Ditto New, 60¾; Great Western Half Shares, 77; Ditto Quarter Shares, 19; Ditto Fifths, 31; Ditto New, 7⅝; Leeds and Thirsk, 16½; New, 5½; Liverpool, Manchester, and Newcastle Junction, 2½; London, Brighton, and South Coast, 59½; London and Greenwich, 9½; London and North Western, 194½; Ditto Quarters, 23½; Ditto Ditto New Shares, 15⅝; Ditto Fifths, 19½; London and South Western, 63½ xn.; Ditto New, 27⅞ xn.; Ditto Tenths, 5½; Ditto Guaranteed, 5⅜; London and York Extension, 2½; Lynn and Dereham, 15⅝; Manchester and Leeds, 108½; Ditto Quarters, 6½; Ditto Fifths, 11; Ditto Sixteenths, 8½; Ditto Extension, 1⅝ pm.; Manchester and Birmingham, 75; Ditto Quarters (A), 12½; Ditto Quarters (B), 12½; Ditto Quarters (C), 8; Midland, 130; Ditto New, 33; Ditto New, 6⅝; Newcastle and Berwick, 34; Norfolk, 130; North British, 36½; Ditto Half Shares, 15½; Ditto Quarters, 3½; Ditto Extension, 1⅝; Northern and Eastern, Scrip (issued 5 dis.), 71½; Ditto New, 28; North Staffordshire, 9; Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton, 13; Scottish Central, 20; Scottish Midland, 13⅝; Shrewsbury and Birmingham, 5⅛; Shrewsbury, Wolverhampton, and South Staffordshire Junction, 3⅝; South Devon, 33; South Eastern and Dover, 38½; Ditto No. 3, 16¾; Ditto No. 4, 3½; West Riding Union, 2½ pm.; York and Newcastle, 37⅞; Ditto New, 12¾; Ditto Preference, 7½; York and North Midland Half Shares, 45; Ditto Selby, 79; Ditto Preference, 11⅞; Boulogne and Amiens, 13¾; Dutch Rhenish, 5½; Namur and Liege, 3⅝; Northern of France Constituted, 10⅝; Orleans and Vierzon, 12½; Orleans and Bordeaux, 7½; Paris and Lyons Constituted, 5; Paris and Strasburg Constituted, 4½; Sambre and Meuse, 4½.

Saturday Morning.—There was no alteration in prices yesterday, Consols remaining at the quotations above. The Foreign Market remained inactive, at the previous day's prices. Shares were well supported; in some instances at a slight advance.

The proposed objects of the Metropolitan and Suburban Cemeteries Society is as follows:—To provide sites for burials, east, west, north, and south of the Metropolis, to effect considerable reduction in the rate of charges, to adopt a new principle of payment, a single charge being substituted for the customary fees, to provide for the decent and respectful burial of the poorer population, by a system of arrangement perfectly novel, including building for the temporary reception as well as for the transit of bodies. Negotiations are now pending for the purchase of several exceedingly eligible sites, and one portion of 150 acres has been already secured.

The estimates show a large annual dividend when the Society shall be in full operation, until which period 4 per cent. interest will be paid on the deposits and calls.

The Committee of Management are now ready to receive applications for shares, which may be made to Messrs. Bourdillon and Son, solicitors, 30, Great Winchester-street; J. H. THE PANKLIBANON IRON WORKS AND GREAT WESTERN EMPORIUM for STOVE GRATES, kitchenranges, fenders, and fire-irons, general furnishing ironmongery in tinned copper, iron and block-tin cooking vessels, best Sheffield plate, and table cutlery, Japanned paper and iron tea trays, tea urns, ornamental iron and wirework for verandahs, lawns, &c.; flower stands; brass and iron bedsteads, patent table lamps for candle or oil. Every article is warranted and marked at the lowest prices, in plain figures, for cash.—Adjoining the Royal Bazaar, 58, Baker-street, Portman square.

FURNISHING IRONMONGERY.—R. and J. SLACK, 336, Strand, solicit an inspection of their extensive stock of Fenders, Fire-irons, Tea-trays, Table Cutlery, Nickel Silver Wares, &c. Every article of warranted quality, and marked in plain figures at prices that will enable purchasers to save 30 per cent. As the limits of an advertisement will not allow them to give an idea of their prices, they solicit purchasers to send for their Book, containing 200 engravings, gratis, or sent post-free. Established 1818.

ROYAL NURSERY.—"DELCROIX'S MACASSAR OIL," imported under the sanction of the "Lords of the Treasury," for the use of her Majesty and the Royal Nursery, is protected by two elegantly-executed correct likenesses, in embossed medallions, of her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert. It produces beautifully flowing curls, and, by the transcendant lustre it imparts, renders the hair truly enchanting. [illegible], where personal advantages are considered important, should be without it. All orders should be sent to Messrs. Delcroix, 158, New Bond-street; as hairdressers (not being appointed agents), for the sake of gain, vend the most spurious trash as the genuine.

SHIRTS.—WILLIAM WHITELOCK, 166, STRAND, (established twenty-two years), solicits the attention of Gentlemen to the Shirts he supplies for 6s. 6d. each, including washing. They are made in the Corazza and other new styles, from Marsland's Patent Long-Cloth, with fine linen fronts, [illegible] and are superior to those usually sold at 8s. [illegible] also all fine Linen ditto, 10s. 6d., usual price, 14s. 6d. Gentlemen waited upon in any part of London, or one sent as sample into the Country Post Free, upon receipt of the amount and 1s. added as part payment of postage. The measure requisite is the neck, chest, and wrist tight.

GRAVES' WATERPROOF COBLENTZ.—This WINTER OVER COAT has been pronounced, by all who have seen and worn it, to be decidedly the most gentlemanly and most comfortable of any yet produced. The unprecedented patronage which R. G. received last winter, induces him again to offer it to the notice of the Public, relying on its merits for a continuance of that unusually liberal support he then received. The same regard for superiority of Workmanship, Materials, and Moderate Charges, will be again observed. 313, High Holborn.

TROWSERS! TROWSERS!! TROWSERS!!!—A good fit in this garment can seldom be obtained.—R. GRAVES, Fashionable Trowsers Maker and Tailor, 313, High Holborn, after many years' experience and study, is enabled to assert, without fear of contradiction, that he can fit gentlemen with this garment better than any other person in London. The characteristic of his fitting is a gentlemanly style, with perfect ease for stooping, sitting, walking, or riding. A well-assorted stock of the newest designs to select from. R. GRAVES, 313, High Holborn.

MESSRS. NICOLL, Registered PALETOT Makers, 6th and 7th Vic., cap. 65, and TAILORS to their Royal Highnesses Prince Albert, Prince George of Cambridge, his Grace the Duke of Wellington, &c., respectfully beg to announce that the same moderate prices are still maintained, and that the Fashionable Winter Over-coat, the Paletot, is made of Llama Cloth, of a substance as suitable for the coming season as that which has been so highly patronised for both its useful qualities and gentlemanly appearance during the late summer months. To be had only, in London, at 114, Regent-street, and 22, Cornhill; and of the recognised agents in the country.

BERDOE'S WATERPROOF OVER-COATS FOR THE WINTER. An extensive and superior assortment of first-rate Outside Garments, adapted to every purpose, and guaranteed to exclude any rain whatever; also of Berdoe's new and universally admired [illegible]LLIUM, may now be inspected both at his West End and City Establishments. The established reputation for efficiency and respectability of W. B.'s well-known Garments, obtained by ten years' extensive trial, renders (it is presumed) commendation now [illegible]. At both establishments the business will continue to be conducted upon the [illegible] of supplying, at equitable and satisfactory charges, such articles only as [illegible] sure permanent satisfaction and future confidence. W. BERDOE, Tailor and Over-coat Maker, 69, Cornhill, north side, and 96, New Bond-street, near Oxford-street, (recently opened.)

THE SIKH WRAPPER.—Some explanation is now necessary as a guide to those Ladies who have not seen this new and beautiful SHAWL. It was [illegible] the intention of the Inventor to have named it again in an advertisement, in consequence of the demand keeping pace with the production; but as several houses are selling something else under the same name, the following particulars will protect all those who may take the trouble [illegible]. The Sikh Wrapper is a long Cashmere Shawl, secured by recent Act of Parliament, INVENTED and SOLD ONLY by GEORGE SMITH, of Ludgate-hill; it is four yards long—two yards wide—a fringe all round—the border six inches deep, with an India pattern on a black ground—the centre is composed of the four standard India colours, scarlet, black, [illegible], and green—the whole of which, including the fringe, is woven in one piece. The [illegible]urs are so placed that the Shawl can be folded into twenty-four different effects, viz.: four square shawls showing one colour only; six showing two colours; two showing three colours, two showing all four colours; four long shawls showing two colours, two showing three colours, two showing all four colours; one scarf showing two colours; and one showing all four colours. Shawl, Silk Dress, Cloak, and Fur Warehouse, 32, Ludgate-hill, the late premises of Rundell and Bridge.

PATENT ELASTIC BANDS.—Warranted not to be affected by the cold or heat of any season or climate. These Rings or Bands are used instead of tape or string, for holding papers and parcels of every description. One of these Rings is instantly placed round a packet of papers, a roll of maps, prints, music, &c., holding the same firmly and securely, saving the time and trouble of tying, yet allowing of very great addition or reduction, without any loss of compactness.

They are well adapted for Garters, also for the Waist and different parts of the body, Surgical Bandages, and for a variety of Surgical and Manufacturing purposes.

In addition to the above, there is a great variety of uses, too numerous to mention, for which these Bands may be applied. They may be had of two thicknesses, and are sold in Boxes of six dozen each, of assorted sizes, price [illegible] per box and upwards.

Bands may be had to order of various widths and thicknesses

 Sold by all Stationers, &c. Wholesale by PERRY and Co., Red Lion square, London, and also by CHARLES MACINTOSH and Co., Manufacturers, Manchester and Birmingham.

SELF MEASUREMENT—GREAT ACCOMMODATION.— The following Directions will ensure an exact Fit, and will be found a most convenient [illegible]. The Committee of this Institution respectfully direct the attention of the charitable and humane to the following facts. During the last year, assistance has, under the blessing of Divine Providence, been afforded to five hundred and forty patients; these, added to the amount of former years, make a total, admitted since the establishment of the Charity, of three thousand seven hundred and seventy six. At the present period, above one hundred Patients are on the books of the Charity, nearly sixty of whom are waiting to be received into the house, their cases requiring constant attention, and the aid of operative surgery. Under these distressing circumstances, AN APPEAL is urgently made to a benevolent Public for assistance to enlarge the Infirmary, so as to afford that relief which is so pressingly required.

OPENING OF THE SOUTH-EASTERN RAILWAY TO MARGATE.—THE DIRECTORS PASSING THE MARINE PARADE.

OPENING OF THE MARGATE AND RAMSGATE RAILWAY.

This line, a branch of the South Eastern Railway, was opened on Tuesday, when Mr. Macgregor (Chairman), Lord Torrington (Deputy-Chairman), and several of the Directors of the South Eastern Line, with their friends, proceeded from the Bricklayers' Arms Station in a special train to attend at the celebration of the event. The train stopped some time at Ashford, to afford the passengers an opportunity of examining the extensive works which the Company have commenced at that place, comprising dépôts for their engines and carriages, with about five hundred cottages for their servants, which are to be fitted up with every modern convenience. The train then proceeded through Canterbury and Ramsgate to Margate by the new line, which is only about four miles long, and involving few engineering difficulties.

At Margate, the event was celebrated as a general holiday, almost every shop in the town being closed. The Directors, on their arrival, were received by Mr. Deputy Cobb and some of the principal inhabitants, who acted as stewards of the day. A procession of carriages, containing the Directors, &c., was formed at the railway station, which, headed by a band of music and flags, moved on to the York Hotel. The streets and windows and balconies of the houses on the line of route were filled with ladies, who welcomed the procession by waving their handkerchiefs, and other tokens of satisfaction. A triumphal arch, formed of evergreens, was also erected, and this at night was tastefully illuminated.

At five o'clock, the Directors and their friends were entertained by the inhabitants at the Assembly Rooms, where about two hundred persons sat down to a sumptuous dinner. Mr. Deputy Cobb filled the chair, and was supported by Mr. M'Gregor, Lord Torrington, Mr. Bodkin, M.P., the Right Hon. S. R. Lushington, Rev. W. E. Hoskins, &c.

Mr. M'Gregor, in returning thanks for the toast of the "South-Eastern Direction," said the Company had spent a quarter of a million of money in Parliamentary contests, in which they were endeavouring to obtain direct lines for Margate and other places. Parliament had already intrusted them with the construction of a line from London to Rochester—a portion of which would be in the contractor's hands on the 12th instant. The Directors were now seeking for powers to continue the line from Rochester to Chilham, which would not only shorten the distance between London and Margate by 20 miles, but would also bring the inhabitants of the latter town in communication with a population of 200,000 souls at the other end of the county. The company's branch line from Minster to Deal would be opened in February next; in about twelve months they would have a line to Rye; and in about eighteen months a continuous communication from Margate to Hastings. After the proceedings of the dinner were concluded, a special train left Margate at a quarter to ten o'clock, which arrived in London at ten minutes past one o'clock this morning. The day was exceedingly favourable, and the arrangements made by the stewards at Margate for the reception of their guests, both in the procession and at the dinner, were of he most complete and spirited character.

EXPEDITION OF GENERAL FLORES.
"THE GLENELG."

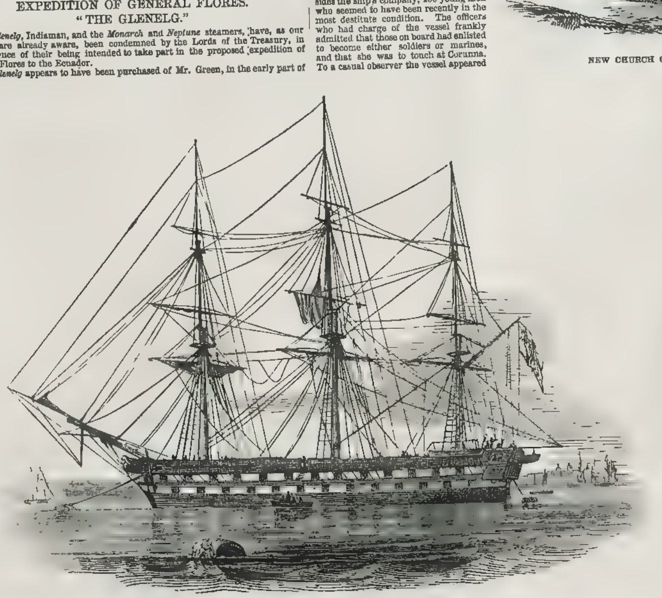
The Glenelg, Indiaman, and the Monarch and Neptune steamers, have, as our readers are already aware, been condemned by the Lords of the Treasury, in consequence of their being intended to take part in the proposed expedition of General Flores to the Ecuador.

The Glenelg appears to have been purchased of Mr. Green, in the early part of June. The vessel was then lying-up in the East India Docks. The purchase-money was promptly paid; and this vessel and the two steamers above-named purchased of the General Steam Navigation Company, were consigned to a Captain Charretie, who formerly was a Marine Captain in the East India Company's service. Their complete repair was immediately proceeded with, the utmost expedition being observed in getting them ready for sea. They were represented to be for foreign service, and it was stated that the Glenelg would be employed as an emigrant ship. The unusual description of work for the merchant's service mentioned in the shipwrights' contracts excited for some time much attention, but similar work having been done to other vessels in the dock, which were really for foreign Powers, and sanctioned by the English Government, the suspicions created by the fittings of the Glenelg and the steamers passed away. In September last, however, suspicions arose as to the legality of their destination, which warranted the interference of Government.

The fitting out of the vessels in the East India Docks proceeded with much activity, and they were appointed to leave last Thursday week. From some unexplained circumstance the steamer did not leave on that day; the Glenelg, however, did, and, after proceeding down the river, took up the usual moorings off Gravesend. At this juncture, it appears, the Government had directed the detention of the vessel, and in the course of the evening Mr. Forsayth, the principal jerquer of the Customs, accompanied by a staff of officers, boarded her and seized her under the Equipment and Enlistment Act, the 59th George III., c. 69, for being unlawfully equipped, without the sanction of her Majesty, for the purpose of commencing hostilities against a foreign power. There were on board, besides the ship's company, 250 young men who seemed to have been recently in the most destitute condition. The officers who had charge of the vessel frankly admitted that those on board had enlisted to become either soldiers or marines, and that she was to touch at Corunna. To a casual observer the vessel appeared to have been fitted out as an ordinary emigrant ship, but closer inspection showed that the arrangements were very rudely put together. She is a very large vessel, being 1,200 tons burden. She has three decks, and certainly in her present state may be more properly termed a transport ship than one in the emigrant trade. She is said to contain a cargo of 700 tons of coals, and consequently draws considerable water. No ammunition was found by the Government officers, but of course it is difficult to state what she may really hold until her large cargo is cleared out.

The Lords of the Treasury have received a petition from Captain Charretie (who was eventually to be appointed as the Admiral of the Fleet), soliciting their restitution, asserting that they were his own property, that he had fitted them out as a matter of speculation, that he intended to take them to the coast of Spain and there to dispose of them to the best advantage to himself. The result of the application has not transpired.

On Saturday morning, the Glenelg arrived at Blackwall, in tow of three steamers, having been brought from Gravesend for greater security, by order of the Board of Customs. Mr. Ferguson, the well-known river-pilot, was intrusted with the management of the ship in her passage up the river; and Mr. Forsayth and other officers of the Customs, as well as Inspector Evans, and another officer of the Thames Police, were, we understand, on board.

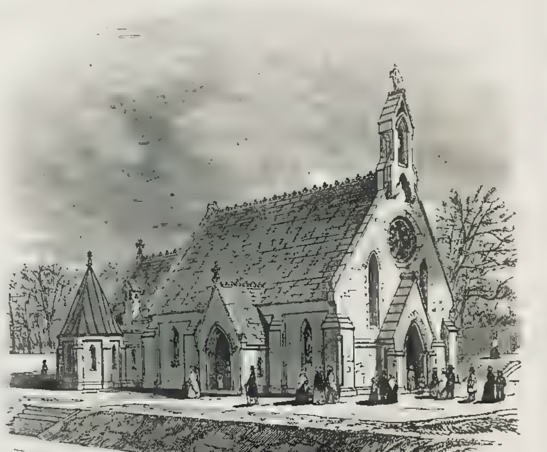


THE CONDEMNED "GLENELG" INDIAMAN.

CONSECRATION OF ST. MARY'S CHURCH, SOUTH MILFORD.

On Wednesday week, the beautiful new Church erected at South Milford, near Ferrybridge, was consecrated by the Lord Bishop of Ripon, as the representative of his Grace the Archbishop of York. South Milford is in the parish of Sherburn, but being a distance of a mile and a half from the parish church, its inhabitants have long been greatly inconvenienced. It was in consequence determined to found a new district; and the Misses Gascoigne undertook the erection of a Church, aided by a grant from the Incorporated Society. The site is eligibly selected; a large portion of the land was given by the Master and Fellows of University College, Oxford, and the residue by B. Crossland, Esq., of Milford.

The Lord Bishop of Ripon upon arriving was received by the clergy, when the service of consecration was proceeded in. The usual petition for the consecration was read, in answer to which the Bishop declared his readiness to consecrate the Church. His Lordship then commenced at the west door reading the 24th Psalm, "The earth is the Lord's," &c., the attending clergy pronouncing the responses, as the procession moved up to the centre of the Church, to the altar rails, within which the Bishop and the Ven. Stephen Creyke, Archdeacon, took their seats, the Bishop on the north side of the table, and the Archdeacon on the south. The Bishop then proceeded with the consecration service, in the form used in the diocese of Ripon. After this, the Rev. James Matthews, vicar of Sherburn, commenced the usual morning service; the Rev. Mr. Gainsford, the future incumbent, read the lessons; and the Ven. the Archdeacon assisted the Lord Bishop in the communion service. The sermon was preached by the vicar of Sherburn, and was an able and eloquent discourse. Afterwards a collection was made in aid of the projected new school building in connection with the Church, and a sum of £32 was thus realised. The clergy and many of the laity afterwards received the Holy Sacrament.



NEW CHURCH OF ST. MARY THE VIRGIN, SOUTH MILFORD, YORKSHIRE.

Among the clergy present were the Rev. Dr. Carter, vicar of Saxton, the Rev. C. Wheeler, vicar of Ledsham, Rev. R. W. Kemplay, of Fairburn, the Rev. T. S. Hewitt, curate of Ledsham; the Rev. W. Hewson, of York, &c. The choir from Garforth Church were in attendance. The services were conducted with the greatest decorum, and afterwards the burial ground adjoining the Church was also consecrated.

The attendance was very numerous, considering the very untoward state of the weather. After the services, several of the clergy and gentry attending the ceremony retired to the residence of B. Crossland, Esq., where they partook of a very sumptuous luncheon, provided by that gentleman, whose former liberality in this respect, on the occasion of laying the foundation stone of this Church, is not forgotten. At the Vicarage, at Sherburn, a very excellent repast was also provided.

This new Church, of which we annex an Engraving, is built in the early English style of the thirteenth century—at which period ecclesiastical architecture was distinguished for its simplicity and purity.

The entire length of the Church is ninety feet. It comprises a nave and chancel, with a north porch, and an octagonal vestry on the north side of the chancel. At the west-end of the nave is a gable turret. The building is of ashlar dressed Huddleston-stone, the roofs being covered with Westmoreland slate and an ornamental ridge tile. The edifice, both in its exterior and interior, presents a very beautiful effect.

The nave is 52 feet long by 27 feet wide, and the interior height is 37 feet. The roof is high-pitched, and shows the ribs and framing, which are stained. The floor is paved with flags, and the seats, which afford accommodation for about three hundred persons, are open. The pulpit is of carved oak, erected on the north side of the chancel-arch, the communication with it being direct from the vestry, without showing any staircase in the Church. The reading-desk is on the south side. The font is of Huddleston stone, of a circular form, with a carved trefoil ornament. It stands at the west end of the Church, near to the north porch. The nave is lighted by seven lancet windows in the side walls, and two at the west end, surmounted by a rose window, also a vesica window over the chancel arch. These, as also the windows in the chancel, are glazed with cathedral glass, and, consequently, the interior of the sacred edifice has that chastened and solemn aspect which it is always so important to preserve. The doors are of oak, with iron work wrought in correct style.

The chancel is in length about 29 feet, in width 18 feet, and in height 27 feet. The roof is high-pitched, and open, the timbers being all shown. The floor is paved with encaustic tiles, and on either side is a pew—that on the south being for the use of the Misses Gascoigne, and the one on the north for the family of the Incumbent. Within the altar-rails are two massive carved oak-chairs. In the east-wall, is an arcade worked in stone, and surmounted by three lancet-windows, and a Trinity-window at the extreme point of the gable. There are also three windows in the side-walls of the chancel.

Under the vestry is a chamber, in which hot-water apparatus has been fixed, for warming the Church.

The Church has been built from designs by Mr. Fowler Jones, of York, architect. The builder was Mr. Benjamin Bulmer, of Thorparch. The edifice has been greatly admired, and we hear that the cost will not exceed £1500.

We perceive that it is proposed to restore the Mother-church of Sherburn, by subscription; and we shall be glad if announcement have the effect of aiding the good work.

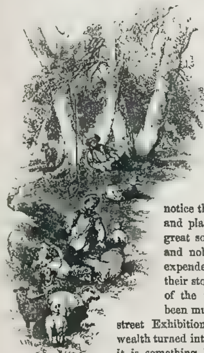
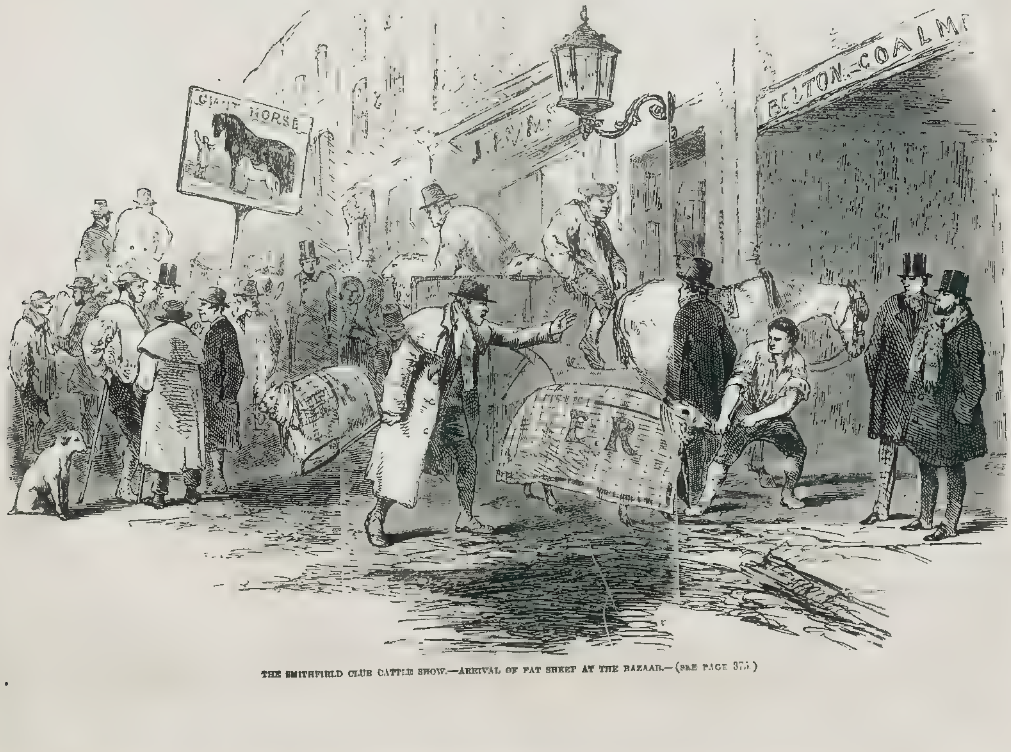
THE CATTLE SHOW.



WE live in a world of contrasts, not the least of which is that presented at this time between Baker-street and the county of Tipperary. In one place, there is a deficiency of food; in the other, a superabundance of it: here, we have the fat kine of Pharaoh's dream; there, the leanness of actual famine. It is not to denounce or scold that we notice the difference between place and place, or to extract from it a great social wrong. If the Royal and noble competitors had never expended an ounce of oil-cake on their stock, the relative conditions of the two countries would have been much the same. The Baker-street Exhibition is the product of great wealth turned into an experimental channel; it is something beyond the power of ordinary men with ordinary means to produce; it is a collection of agricultural luxuries—a something more than is strictly necessary—a showing of what can be done rather than of what it is a general thing to do. The same wealth that sails yachts and runs race-horses is applied to developing oxen, sheep, and pigs, to the utmost degree of obesity of which they are capable. There may be an advantage in knowing of what the animal structure is susceptible; but it is obvious that much of the accumulated bulk is an excess of flesh produced at greater cost than the rate of the market could realise. If nothing came to Smithfield under the Baker-street standard of weight and girth, it is evident that London would be destitute of ribs and steaks, just as omnibus proprietors could not afford to convey the public by blood horses at a penny a mile. For common practical purposes, we must in all cases be content with something less than the very best it is possible by great cost and effort to obtain. Lincolnshire itself, though there is there "much land, and fertile," could not make a paying business of experiments in fat, which would make one ox as dear as five. So farmers confine themselves to what is moderate and profitable; the occupation of feeding for prizes seems to be falling exclusively into the hands of Dukes and Earls; the farmer is willing to let the honour alone, there being such things as poor-rates and rents. The Nobleman can afford a fancy; and whether it is the purchase of a Titian, or the production of a prize bullock, it is more a matter of taste and inclination than anything else; it is another way of spending money—that is all. We look on the Smithfield Club Cattle Show as remarkable, astonishing even, in its way; but if it were to be extensively imitated, there would be consternation in Newgate Market. London could never wait for the termination of the long process that ends in such quadrupedal phenomena. Covent Garden often sees horticultural marvels; legumes strangely out of season, and fruit of gigantic measurements; but the mass of society decline green peas when they are at a guinea the pint, are content with gooseberries that can be put into mouths of the usual size, and, in short, buy their vegetable supplies just as nature and the market-gardeners produce them. There is, no doubt, some advantage to be derived from the exceptions; it would be a calamity if there were no wealth that could be spared for anything beyond the mere necessaries: we are no advocates of sumptuary laws of any kind: we wish all the world could dress in silks and diamonds, and feed on prize Turtle (if there should ever be such a thing), washed down with Burgundy. If people have the means, and choose to pay for the éclat of eating strawberries when strawberries are impossible things, they have a perfect right to do so. They employ those who grow them, and feed others in gratifying themselves. Wealth, in every form of expenditure, is the spring of labour; when the rich cease to be rich, it has generally been found that the poor do not get what the wealthy lose. The whole bulk of a nation sinks or falls together; the Spanish nobility were once the richest in Europe; they are now the most decayed; the mass of the Spanish people are lower in the scale of nations than they were in the seventeenth century.

That this has not much to do with the Baker-street Cattle Show, must be granted; but it has with the expenditure, and application of wealth, on which there is much erroneous philosophy afloat; satirists wax wroth at the "contrasts" of society; they are indignant at the thought that there lie millions of gold in the vaults of the Bank of England, and that there should be hunger and nakedness in St. Giles's. But the remedy is less easy to suggest; it is not in a mere distribution of that wealth, for, if it were done, a short time would see the old process going on again. So, if the present well-filled cattle-stalls were empty, and no single Peer had condescended to let his talk be of bullocks, the peasant would not be by a meal or a shilling the better off; nay, by so much as his particular labour has been wanted in the expanding process, he has been benefited. The Cattle are fatter than necessary, and have doubtless cost more than need be; but the labourer has sustained no injury from it; he has ministered to a caprice, perhaps; but, at all events, it is a very harmless one.

In fact, it is not as a commercial matter that these extraordinary displays can be considered; if Lords graze and feed cattle, they are not wholly graziers and butchers; if it were a mere question of



THE SMITHFIELD CLUB CATTLE SHOW.—ARRIVAL OF FAT SHEEP AT THE BAZAAR.—(SEE PAGE 37[illegible]) profit and loss, the practice would cease to-morrow. But there are social advantages connected with it which ought to go for something in the account. It gives an object and a pursuit; it connects them with the soil by other relations than that of mere rent receivers; it establishes intercourse between rank and rank, and creates with the occupations something of the spirit of the citizen. The Seigneurs of France and the Grandees of Spain would have scorned to be connected, even in imagination, with any of the pursuits of the civilian—and what is their history? They consumed their revenues in the intrigues and dissipations of profligate Courts, and, in one country, were swept away by a convulsion their rapacity and carelessness occasioned, in the other, they have decayed, become effete and contemptible, destitute of bodily strength or mental energy. Having no politics to occupy them, the foreign nobilities have been deteriorated by pleasure and pride. Here we have plenty of politics; but as that, too, may be pursued to excess, it is as well that the Peerage should temper state asperities by the pursuits of the field and the farm, even though fat beeves should entail a loss, and the results of months of cost and labour go at last, in a great proportion, to the chandler's melting pot.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

PARISIANA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Paris, Wednesday.

Whilst Lord Palmerston's visit to Don Carlos, and the other approaching visit of the French pretender to England, plants new wrinkles on the King's brow, in Vienna matters are still worse. The Count de Flahaut had in the same week to announce the marriage of the Duke de Bordeaux with an Arch-Duchess, and the Cracow affair; and in opposition to all previous custom, he only learnt both by the Gazette, when they had been many days foregone conclusions. There, no reparation, no information are to be obtained. The Prince Metternich is inaccessible; he is, or pretends to be, confined to his bed with fever, whilst Munch Bellinghausen, the President of the German Diet, officiates for him in dealing out negatives, and "looking unutterable things." Those veteran Ministers of the Crown, Collowrat and Figuelmont, no longer use any concealment of their opinions against young France, as well as against old Poland. It was prompted by them that the Archduke Francis procured the signature of the King of Prussia to the dispersion of the last vestiges of Polish liberty; that the Archdukes, his brothers, hasten with congratulations and costly gifts to celebrate the marriage of the Duke of Bordeaux, who now with his bride appears at the table of the Emperor, as one of his domestic and family circle.

The crowded assemblage at the concert on Friday were all asking one another if any diplomatist had arrived, and the satiric smile of the gay and witty M. de Kisselef, the Chargé d'Affaires of Russia, told with terrible effect on the blank faces of the numberless French official Grandees present. They tried to conceal the awkward void by referring to the presence of Lord and Lady Cowley, as a protest of High Church and Tory party in England against this marked disapprobation even of "our son-in-law of Belgium;" but the conviction was general that this party had been given as if it were purposely to show the unpropitious drift of present politics. M. Guizot had, on this occasion, one consolation—one compensation of the heart—and that was the general admiration excited by his daughter, Madlle. Guizot, who here almost made her first début in the world. She is a young person bordering upon seventeen, of elegant form as well as unaffected manners, whose mind is transparent through her whole person. She has the fine eyes of her father, with his look of those days when he was satisfied with the being the first of the academy, with the glory of having given to literature in France a rank and a dignity it never possessed before. Next to this interesting young lady, the most admired was Madame d'Oustinoff, born a Princess Treubetskoy, a cousin of that Prince whose exile to Siberia so long absorbed the chit-chat of Europe, and a sister to another young nobleman who is said to be secretly married to old Taglioni.

The witty Madame de Girardin, when a few days since at a blue-stocking meeting a fierce lady blue was inveighing against Alexandre Dumas for his plagiarisms, observed, "Yes, it is true he robs, but he robs like a conqueror, and what he takes he makes quite his own—he is like Jupiter in the house of Amphytrion; although he is an intruder he always appears as much at home as the master himself, and enjoying his own property." By-the-by, I told you that at the fast-declining Theatre Français, now being submitted to the ordeal of a commission, a lady had just produced the only good moral comedy of manners that had appeared for an age. What this lady has done in comedy the aforesaid Madame de Girardin is about to effect in tragedy. Her "Cleopatra" is now rehearsing, and, as here we have no fear of an eclipse from a comparison with Shakspeare, everybody predicts she will have surpassing success.

In the meantime, the most recent and most successful performance is the new oratorio just brought out at the Opera Comique, by Berlioz, the peripatetic composer, and the musical critic and colleague of Jules Janin at the Débats. It is a work of the greatest ambition, and, barring a certain overwrought mysticism and the absence too often of a dominant melody, it is unquestionably a work of great merit.

FRANCE.

Our Parisian contemporaries, this week, seem somewhat at a loss for political topics, as they recur to Cracow, and comment very earnestly upon the disputed points involved in the supposed views of M. Guizot upon the subject. The Journal des Débats, indeed, for want of more exciting matter, reverts to the Montpensier marriage, about which it has a long and profitless article.

Yesterday week M. Guizot gave a grand entertainment in honour of the Bey of Tunis. It consisted of a vocal and instrumental concert, by two hundred of the pupils of the Conservatoire de Musique, and the number of invited guests were upwards of 2000. The Bey of Tunis arrived at nine o'clock, and the Duke de Nemours a few minutes afterwards. The Duke de Montpensier did not make his appearance till past eleven, having been detained at Vincennes by a banquet which he had given to the officers of the artillery. A vast number of the principal residents in the French metropolis were present, and the affair was as brilliant as possible; but, singular to relate, the whole of the corps diplomatique, with the single exception of M. Martinez de la Rosa, were absent.

The affair is considered in Paris as an event of no little political importance; for it was remarked that since the 100 days, when Napoleon's sudden appearance drove all foreigners from Paris, the salons of the Minister of Foreign Affairs were never so deserted by the representatives of Foreign Powers.

A review took place on Saturday, at eleven o'clock, in the Champ de Mars, in presence of the Duke de Nemours and the Bey of Tunis. About 25,000 men were on the ground, consisting of the troops in the garrison of Paris and its neighbourhood, the artillery being commanded by the Duke de Montpensier, and the whole of the troops by General Tiburce Sebastiani. The troops were drawn up in seven parallel lines, through which the Duke de Nemours and the Bey proceeded, accompanied by a numerous staff. A number of manœuvres were then executed with great precision, and the whole terminated before one o'clock. The Bey expressed himself delighted with the display, and, during the day, had all the different evolutions carefully explained to him. M. Guizot gave, on Saturday night, a fête de famille, in celebration of the birthday of his mother. One of the saloons was fitted up as a theatre, and M. William Guizot, the Minister's son, with some young friends, performed a little piece written for the occasion, called "La Fête de la Grandmaman."

It seems that the financial condition of France begins to excite some alarm—at all events, the subject is very prominent in the public mind at the present time. The Journal des Débats of Sunday has a long and able article upon the subject. While it admits that the position of affairs is somewhat sombre, it contends that there is no real cause for alarm, and that affairs appear to have come to the worst.

The Constitutionnel of Monday, in reply to the article in the Journal des Débats, says: "The present uneasiness in the money-market does not arise from any necessity for purchasing further supplies of foreign corn for home consumption, as there has been already imported 2,637,000 metrical quintals of corn, and 30,956 quintals of flour, being between four and five times the quantity imported during an ordinary year; but because the Government had undertaken too many public works, which obliged the Treasury, within a short period, to withdraw 130 millions which were deposited in the Bank of France, and thus reduced the amount of specie in that establishment to 80 millions; in consequence of which the Bank directors must either diminish their discounts, raise the rate of interest, or procure specie by some extraordinary mode."

The Moniteur publishes a telegraphic despatch, announcing the liberation by Abd-el-Kader of the eleven French prisoners remaining in captivity at his deira, and their arrival in Melilla, the (Spanish) Governor of which received them with much kindness.

The Independent Belge of the 5th instant, contradicts a statement published in the Paris Constitutionnel, to the effect that the King of the Belgians was about to proceed to Paris, and thence to London, to endeavour to effect a reconciliation between the French and English Courts. The Independent adds, that King Leopold has no intention of quitting Brussels for two months to come.

M. de Costa Cabral, ex-Minister of Portugal, arrived on the 3d at Bayonne. The ex-political chief Ugarte has also arrived in that town.

The Moniteur publishes a Royal ordinance, permitting the importation for home consumption of every description of grain and flour arriving from America, whether on board French ships or those of the British kingdom, until further notice. This ordinance is a modification of the treaty of commerce concluded with Great Britain on the 26th of January, 1826, by which the produce of Asia, Africa, or America, can only be imported into France in British bottoms for exportation.

The Débats mentions the death of another relic of the revolution, M. Mahon, Lieutenant Colonel on the retired list, formerly aide-de camp to Marshal Lannes and Marshal Mortier, Knight of the Legion of Honour, and of the Order of St. Louis, who closed his mortal career, at the estate of La Grillonnière, in consequence of his wounds. He entered the army at the time of the revolution, and was named Sub-Lieutenant in the First Battalion of the Loire and Cher. Colonel Mahon was descended from an ancient Irish family.

After all, it seems doubtful whether the Bey of Tunis will visit England. One of the Paris papers states that as he cannot be received as an independent Sovereign, he will not come at all.

The Presse confirms the report of the intended visit of the Duke de Bordeaux to this country. According to Paris papers his Royal Highness has been invited to England by Lord Palmerston, who, at this moment, attracts the attention of the French press to a great extent.

SPAIN.

There has, it appears, been another important, but brief Ministerial crisis at Madrid. The Queen having refused to sanction the resignation of M. Pacheco, the Attorney-General, the Ministers resigned in a body on the evening of the 29th ult. On the following day, M. de Viluma was sent for by the Queen, and entrusted with the formation of a new Cabinet. The noble Marquis first consented to the wishes of her Majesty, and was to have chosen, as colleagues, M. M. Fejada, Generals Cleonard and Diego Ballesteros; but, on consideration, he thought that, in present circumstances, the formation of a new cabinet was above his strength, and he respectfully entreated her Majesty to excuse him. At three in the afternoon her Majesty sent for M. Isturitz, and requested him to retain office with his former colleagues. Her Majesty notified that she had changed her mind, and accepted of the resignation of M. Pacheco. M. Isturitz first refused, but finally acceded to the wishes of her Majesty, but requested time to consult with his colleagues.

The result was that M. Isturitz and his colleagues resumed office.

The resignation of the Ministers was in the hands of the Queen at ten at night; and in two hours after a dreadful conflagration broke out in the offices of the Marine, Grace and Justice, and War Department, which are in the same edifice. The fire was discovered at twelve o'clock, raged all night with fury, and was not got under until nearly eleven o'clock next day. It is said that the archives and documents connected with the public accounts are all, or the most valuable part, consumed.

The coincidence is curious:—the Ministerial offices burned in an hour or two after the Ministry fell. The building destroyed was for some time the residence of the famous Godoy, Prince of Peace.

According to our latest news from Madrid, the fire completely destroyed the portion of the building occupied by the War office. The whole of the archives, correspondence, decrees, orders, papers connected with the public accounts of that department, rich paintings, sumptuous furniture—all are reduced to ashes. The offices of the Minister of Grace and Justice have also suffered, though not to the same extent, as well as those lately occupied by the Finance Department. At one moment it appeared inevitable that the Senate-house, which adjoins the building, would have fallen a prey to the flames. Extraordinary efforts were made to save it by taking off the roof, &c., and on that side the fire was prevented from extending. The fire-engines were, with one or two exceptions, in the worst possible state to meet such an emergency. The rain, which fell abundantly, rendered essential service, which was, however, often counteracted by strong gusts of wind. The crowd was immense, the confusion great, and the bells of all the churches in Madrid tolled with lugubrious sound during the night. The value of the furniture consumed in the War-office alone has been calculated at 30 000 dollars: the writing table of the Minister cost, only a few months ago, [illegible] reals, nearly £300. The valuable inkstands, lamps, &c., of massive silver, which were lately renewed, have all become the food of the destroying element.

It was believed at Madrid, that although the Ministers have been saved from dismissal for the present, their tenure of office is believed to be but slight, as they are divided amongst themselves. It is said that at a Council of Ministers, held on the night of the 1st inst., a violent dispute arose between MM. Mon, Pidal, and Armero, on the one hand, and MM. Isturitz, Caneja, and Sanz, on the other, on the subject of an intrigue which is said to be in progress for raising M. Mon to the Presidency of the Cabinet, with which he was taunted by M. Isturitz.

PORTUGAL.—PROGRESS OF THE INSURRECTION.

We have received by the Cyclops, which has arrived at Spithead, accounts from Lisbon of the 30th November. The Lisbon letters confirm the report of the defeat, with great loss of life, of a body of insurgents to the number of 2000, under the command of the ex-Viscount Sa da Bandeira, by the columns under the command of Baron Casal and Viscount Vinhaes, on the 16th ult., near Chaves, in the province of Minho.

The Duke of Saldanha had made no attempt to dislodge the Conde das Antas from Santarem. General Schwalback having abandoned the siege of Avoro proceeded to Elvas and Estremos, and thence back to Salveterra, opposite Santarem. He crossed the river, and joined Saldanha's forces on the 28th ult.

Conde de Bomfim was, by the last accounts, in Evora, and Baron de Almargem, in Leira, organising popular battalions.

Great sensation was caused in Lisbon by the forced departure of the Duke of Palmella.

A private letter from Lisbon gives a strange version of the mode in which this event was brought about:—"On the 25th of November, at a late hour of the evening, the Queen sent a message to the Duke, commanding his immediate attendance at the Palace. Palmella, recollecting, doubtless, the sleepless night he had passed on the very last occasion of his being summoned to the Royal presence (viz., on the 6th of October), represented to her Majesty's messenger that he was indisposed, but, at the same time, observed that if, notwithstanding, her Majesty peremptorily commanded his attendance, he would at once dress, and proceed to the Palace. The Queen then fixed the following day for the audience. On the 26th, the Duke repaired to the Necessidades, when he was received by Donna Maria, who commanded him to be seated whilst in her presence.

"The Queen, having made some observations, deliberately said, 'It is my wish that you should leave the country;' on which the Duke rose, and, humbly inclining before her Majesty, kissed her hand, whilst he said, 'I never thought the hour would arrive when I should be told by your Majesty, that it was essential towards your well-being that I should quit my native country;' after which he quitted the Royal presence. At five o'clock in the afternoon the Duke repaired on board the Admiral's ship, accompanied by two of his sons-in-law. He remained in the Hibernia, where he was entertained at Sir W. Parker's table, until the following day, when he embarked on board the Madrid packet-boat, which at two o'clock sailed for Cadiz. It is understood that M. de Palmella has gone to Gibraltar, to await the course of events. The accusation against him is for having secretly encouraged the insurgents, and induced Col. Wylde, the British Minister, and Sir W. Parker, to entertain views unfavourable to the present Government.

Many noblemen have preferred leaving the kingdom, or retiring to the British fleet, to taking up arms in defence of the existing Government.

The Government meddling with the currency had caused much anxiety to the mercantile and monied classes. The Government owes 13,000 contos of reis to the two companies that form the new Bank of Portugal.

The Queen's troops still invested Santarem. Das Antas's force was about 3000 strong. Lisbon was quiet, as was Oporto, at which port the Cyclops touched on the 2nd. Both cities had been put in a state of defence. Vice-Admiral Parker's squadron was in the Tagus when the Cyclops left.

THE WEST INDIES AND MEXICO.

The Tay steamer reached Southampton on Tuesday night with the West India mails. This vessel was expected sooner, but was delayed by bad weather.

The dates by this conveyance are Demerara the 2nd, Trinidad and Antigua the 3rd, Barbadoes the 4th, St. Lucia the 5th, St. Kitts the 6th, and Jamaica the 9th ultimo. The weather throughout the whole of the colonies continued favourable for the sugar crops, although in some cases rain had fallen rather profusely. The canes are, however, in fine condition, and if the manufacturing season turn out propitious, there will be a very large increase in the crop of the present year. It was very hot in Jamaica, and some little sickness prevailed.

The Tay brings 15 cases of pine-apples, and a large quantity of small parcels and packages. Considering the advanced season of the year, the pine-apples are somewhat of a novel importation, and as they appear to be in pretty good condition, no doubt the speculation will be a very satisfactory one for the importers, Messrs. Keeling and Hunt.

The news from Mexico is rather important. The report is fully confirmed that Santa Anna has seized 2,000,000 dollars in course of remittance to British merchants; but he excuses the act as preventing its being seized by the Americans.

The blockading squadron was still lying off Anton Lizardo, and no movement had been made in any shape whatever since the last advices. At Vera Cruz, the Mexicans were still exerting themselves, and adopting every means in their power to defend their favourite Castle of St. Juan de Ulloa.

A movement, on the part of the Mexicans, had been made at Tampico. The whole of the forces were preparing to leave when the Tay left, in order to rally round Santa Anna, who was at San Luis, concentrating his army. Every person capable of bearing arms had voluntarily entered the service, and it was supposed that the force under Santa Anna amounted to upwards of 20 000 men. Their destination was Monterey, to meet General Taylor. No further intelligence had been received from the seat of war in the interior. It was intended, on the part of the Mexicans, to evacuate Tampico.

Serious Illness of Prince Metternich.—The Cologne Gazette, of December 7, states, on the authority of a Correspondent "from the Danube," that the above distinguished statesman is dangerously ill, and that he has been confined during several days to his bed. It appears that he is suffering under a species of fever which allows him no rest. The Gazette adds that Count Munch-Bellinghausen, the President of the Germanic Diet, is with the Prince night and day.

Alleged Murder at Hitchin, Herts.—A long investigation has taken place at Hitchin, before the district magistrates, and before the county Coroner, relative to the death of George Tomlin, a young farm-labourer in the service of Lord Dacre, who was shot by a lad of his own age, named James Lawrence, in the service of Mr. Wahey, a farmer, residing in the neighbourhood. It appeared from the evidence taken before the magistrates previous to the death of the lad Tomlin, that the prisoner Lawrence had been out in the fields, armed with a gun, for the purpose of scaring away the birds on land belonging to his master during the forenoon of Sunday, the 22nd ult. On entering Lord Dacre's court-yard, where the deceased was attending to the horses, some words passed, when the prisoner raised the gun to his shoulder, and said, "I'll shoot you." The deceased ran behind a tree for shelter, but was followed by the prisoner, who fired at a few paces distance, lodging the charge under the deceased's shoulder-blade. He was immediately attended by a medical gentleman, who pronounced the wound mortal. The deceased expired on Wednesday afternoon (last week). On Friday Mr. F. T. Osbaldistone, the Coroner, held an inquest on the body, when, in addition to the evidence before the magistrates, the surgeon who attended the deceased stated, that the charge had excoriated the back and penetrated the lungs; the mortification which supervened was the immediate cause of death. At the adjourned inquest, the Jury returned a verdict of "Manslaughter" against Lawrence.

Highway Robbery and Supposed Attempt to Murder.—Two men, named Pearse and Smith, were examined at the Shire Hall, Hertford, last Saturday, and committed for trial on a charge of robbing a hawker, named James Jarvis, about a fortnight ago, near Wheathampstead. The prisoners beat the poor fellow very severely, and no doubt would have murdered him if assistance had not arrived.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

COURT OF CHANCERY.—Friday.

SPOTTISWOODE v. CLARK.

In this case, Mr. Stuart applied to the Lord Chancellor for an order to dissolve an injunction obtained in the Vice-Chancellor's Court, restraining the defendant from selling a work called "Old Moore's Family Pictorial Almanack," on the ground that the title on the wrapper was an imitation, and an infringement of the plaintiff's property in an almanack entitled the "Pictorial Almanack," published by him. The Vice-Chancellor had granted the injunction on an exparte statement; had subsequently confirmed his first decision; and therefore the present application was made to the superior Court.

Mr. Stuart said it was one of those cases in which the right to an injunction depended on the legal title to that which the plaintiff asked to have protected: in this instance, that right was very limited, and very doubtful; and, in the second place, he contended that, if that legal right was complete, his client had not infringed it. There was a taste at the present time for illustrated works: there were Pictorial Shakspeares, Pictorial Bibles, and a number of other publications of the same kind. The plaintiff published a newspaper called the Pictorial Times; and, two years ago, issued a "Pictorial Almanack," published at the office of the newspaper. His allegation was, that his client had imitated the title-page of that almanack, in one issued at a less price, and had obtained an injunction restraining his client from selling it.

The Lord Chancellor: Is the complaint confined to the wrapper?

Mr. Stuart: It is; the injunction was to prevent them selling an almanack bound in a paper wrapper or cover, with the words "Pictorial Almanack" appearing thereon. This seemed a very slight matter for an injunction at all.

The Lord Chancellor: Does the plaintiff's bill claim an exclusive right to publish a Pictorial Almanack.

Mr. Stuart: It did in effect; nothing must imitate it; but it was very doubtful whether there could be an exclusive right in a wrapper of this kind.

The Lord Chancellor here examined and compared the two publications.

Mr. Stuart proceeded; there was no allegation or pretence that there was anything alike in the two works, except the wrapper; and he contended that the plaintiff could have no exclusive right in the word "Pictorial:" it meant an almanack with pictures, and his client's was also an almanack with pictures. In one sense, every man who published any almanack, interfered with whoever might have published another; and upon the whole, it seemed impossible to put the case on any other ground than this—that plaintiff and defendant were both competitors in one market. Astronomical facts and phenomena were important matters in an almanack, and it was natural enough that an engraving of an object like the Time-ball at Greenwich, should have been taken for the title-page; but so far from his client's engraving being a copy of the plaintiff's, it was taken from another almanack published some years ago. The learned counsel then pointed out the essential difference between the two works in their contents and details, and urged that the continuation of the injunction would cause enormous injury to his client, who had expended a large sum of money in the work, while discharging the order would still leave the plaintiff with a sufficient remedy. He submitted that the Court must in justice dissolve the injunction.

The Lord Chancellor: Your client will of course undertake to keep an account, though I never could perceive what good it did.

Mr. Stuart would consent to any terms that would do perfect justice.

Mr. Moore was heard in support of the motion; and Mr. Anderdon opposed it, dwelling on the damage the plaintiff would sustain by the imitation of his work published at a lower price, and cited the cases of the London Conveyance Company to shew that the use of words of the most common and general meaning had been prohibited when it was clear they were used with an intention to deceive.

Mr. Hobback followed on the same side, stating, in the course of his argument, that the plaintiff was the first to publish a pictorial almanack.

The Lord Chancellor (referring to the dates) said he used the word pictorial first, but, in fact, the "Illustrated London Almanack" was published before it.

Mr. Hobback proceeded at great length to contend that an exclusive right might be established to the use of a general word, like the word pictorial.

The Lord Chancellor thought there would be great difficulty in saying what might be the effect of agreeing to that: one man might adopt the word "Pictorial," another the word "Illustrated"; now, as it was admitted that the whole world—that anybody who chose, might publish almanacks with pictures in them, those who started first would soon exhaust all the terms of description. "Pictorial" and "Illustrated" being taken, what could a third person call his book?

Mr. Hobback: He might call it an almanack illustrated with pictures.

The Lord Chancellor: No: Illustrated is already appropriated.

Mr. Hobback urged that terms used by one party must not be copied by others.

The Lord Chancellor: In short, you must not commit a fraud.

Mr. Hobback: Whether or not there is a right to an exclusive use of the term "Pictorial Almanack," he submitted there was clearly a right to restrain a party from using it in connection with other words, that made it appear that the work of the defendant was that of the plaintiff.

The Lord Chancellor said all these cases must depend on the particular circumstances; all the Court could do was to endeavour to lay down some principle by which the public might know under what rule the particular case fell. He had frequently had occasion to express his opinion of this class of cases, and he did not feel the least disposition to depart from it. Unless the case was very clear indeed, it was the duty of the Court only to exercise its jurisdiction where the legal right of property had been ascertained. For that course there were many reasons. In the first place, if the Court acted in ignorance of where the legal right laid, it might commit a great error in exercising its equitable jurisdiction, which it was only justified in exercising where the legal right was certain. Another objection to such an order, was that it compelled the parties to embark in future litigation, when it might be more discreet on their parts to pause, and consider whether they ought to follow the matter up any further. An order of the Court either grants an injunction, and compels the party to bring an action, or it suspends the injunction, with liberty to bring an action, if that is resolved on. In one case, it was possible that there might be no further litigation; in the other, a party was compelled to engage in it, and thus both parties were exposed to useless litigation at the moment they were both eager in pursuit of their supposed rights, and cannot escape from the order without mutual consent. Another great objection to an injunction, in the first instance, was that the Court, by granting it, expressed a strong opinion as to the legal right before that right was sent to be tried: by its decree, the Court substantially expressed a decided opinion as to the existence of the right, before the proper tribunal had decided it. But the gravest of all the objections to the injunction was that, in decreeing it, the Court ran the risk of doing the greatest possible injustice. Consider what the effect of the present injunction must be. Here was a publication which, if it was not permitted to be issued to the public during the next month, would lose the greatest part of its value: it was an almanack for the next year, 1847; an almanack for any year, of course, had its greatest sale at the commencement of that year; if that sale was prohibited by an injunction, till a legal question could be tried by an action in the spring, or perhaps the middle of spring, what would an almanack for that year be worth? The injunction would take the property away, and give it to nobody; whereas, by leaving the sale open till the right should be tried, though the defendant might lose something of profit in the meantime, the plaintiff would not be making it wholly for himself, if the future decision should be against him. In the other case, the defendant would utterly lose what he was entitled to, and the effect of the injunction would be to commit a great injustice. Unless the case was so clear that the Court could have no doubt whatever of the result of an action, it was its duty to abstain from exercising its equitable jurisdiction, till the right was established in due course of law. Nor was this rule confined to the publication of such works as the present; it applied to many other cases. To advert to the particular facts of this case, he should throw out of sight all that had been said as to trade marks and labels. They had nothing to do with this case; a piece of steel or a bottle of blacking could only be known as having certain qualities from certain marks and labels, to which the public wholly trusted in purchasing them. When that mark was used by other parties, it amounted to a fraud, as the article could be judged of by the mark alone. It was entirely different in the present case. In taking up these two works, if anybody was deceived it certainly could not be by the eye: any two things more different in size, colour, description, and engravings, could scarcely be. No one who had seen them could buy the defendant's almanack for the plaintiff's: the whole of the contents and matter were totally and entirely different: it could not deceive anybody. There was certainly a remarkable coincidence in the title, if two persons did sit down separately to bring out a picture almanack. Of that, as a ground for legal liability, he expressed no opinion. But referring only to the circumstances, he was not satisfied that the plaintiff had such a clear legal right against the defendant as to justify the Court in preventing the defendant from selling his almanack, till the plaintiff came before it with the verdict of a jury. The case fell within the rule upon which he had frequently acted, and it was even more favourable for the exercise of that principle than many previous ones. He thought it much safer, and more equitable, to grant an order dissolving the injunction, the defendant undertaking to keep an account, with liberty to the plaintiff to bring an action at law.

Injunction dissolved accordingly.

MORE RAILWAY LITIGATION.

In the case of Wilson v. Howe and another, tried in the Court of Exchequer, on Monday, the important decision was come to that promoters of railway projects are not entitled to recover any of the preliminary expenses from members of the provisional committee.

The Attorney-General and another learned gentleman represented the plaintiff; Mr. Martin, Q.C., and Mr. Keane were counsel for the defendants. This action was brought by the secretary of the Canterbury and Herne Bay Railway Company, to recover £125, for half a year's salary. The defendants were members of the provisional committee. The only point worth mentioning arose upon the cross examination of one of the plaintiff's witnesses, from whose evidence it appeared that the plaintiff and Mr. David Keane, solicitor, were the registered promoters of the line, which was abandoned in the month of October, 1845.

The Lord Chief Baron held that a promoter of a railway project could not sue any of the members of the provisional committee for his own services, or for any of the preliminary expenses of the company.

The Attorney-General stated that he had been counsel in many cases in which promoters had recovered verdicts against provisional committeemen to the extent of several thousands.

The plaintiff was nonsuited, but leave was reserved to move to enter a verdict, or for a new trial, should the Court above be of opinion that a promoter was entitled to recover against provisional committees for services or expenses incidental to the formation of the company.

The case of Waddy v. Dillon and others was tried in the same Court. It was an action by the plaintiff, a well-known parliamentary agent, against the defendants, as members of the provisional committee of the Direct London and Manchester Railway Company, to recover compensation for his services in procuring the consent of influential persons, as Lord Rossmore, Colonel Dawson Damer, Colonel Westenra, M P., and others, to serve on the provisional committee. These services he rendered on the application of a Mr. Lee, one of the proposed company's local agents, expressing a hope at the time he undertook the duty that he would be employed as junior parliamentary agent, not, as he said to Mr Lee, so much for the sake of emolument as of being connected with so important an undertaking. The plaintiff not having been made assistant parliamentary agent now sought to recover compensation for his work and labour in canvassing for provisional committeemen.

Mr. M Chambers and Mr Bagley appeared for the plaintiff; the Attorney-General and Mr Hoggins for the defendant.

When the case had proceeded some length, the Lord Chief Baron said, that if the plaintiff could not prove a retainer on employment other than that by Mr. Lee, or that Mr. Lee had express authority to employ the plaintiff, he should direct a nonsuit.

Mr M Chambers said he could not prove any other retainer, or any express authority from the defendants to Mr. Lee to engage the plaintiff; and thereupon the plaintiff was nonsuited.

PROVISIONAL COMMITTEEMEN.

The case of Alley v. Gain, tried in the QUEEN'S BENCH on Monday, presented some interesting points connected with the alleged liability of provisional committeemen.

Mr. Montague Chambers, Mr. Ball, and Mr. Edwin James, appeared for the plaintiff, and Mr Crowder and Mr. Udall for the defendant.

It was an action to recover compensation for work and labour performed by the plaintiff as a surveyor to a projected railway company, called the Lincolnshire and Eastern Counties Railway. It appeared that the affairs of the projected company were, in the first instance, managed by a solicitor named Beckett, to whom the defendant wrote, desiring to have his name put on the list of the provisional and also of the acting or managing committee. It was put upon the list of the provisional committee, and some prospectuses were published with that name among the rest. It was afterwards, at the defendant's request, struck out of the list, and new prospectuses were published without it. Some of the work for which the plaintiff sought to recover compensation had been done before the defendant's name appeared on the list of provisional committeemen, and some after it had been struck out of that list. After it had been struck out, the notices of motion of the committee had not been sent to him, and he did not appear to have interfered very actively in the affairs of the company even before that period The plaintiff had not been directly employed by him, nor was there any evidence of the plaintiff's employment, even in an indirect manner, by the order or authority of the defendant, except such as might be presumed from the fact of the defendant being a member of the committee under whose orders, as a body, the work had been done.

When these facts had been proved,

Mr. Crowder, on the part of the defendant, submitted that there was, on the authority of the recent case of Wyld v Hopkins, no evidence to go to the Jury.

Lord Denman was clearly of opinion that the character of provisional committeeman meant something, but what it meant was not a question at law; it was to be determined by the Jury on the facts of the case. He had no judicial knowledge of it; but the Jurors, from their knowledge of the business of the world, must be acquainted with it, and must apply their experience to decide upon it. He did not think that the case of "Wyld v. Hopkins" required him to go to that extent. He should, therefore, let this case go to the Jury, who must determine on the evidence whether the defendant had, in fact, made himself liable by his own acts.

Mr Crowder then addressed the Jury for the defendant, and put in, to show that the defendant's name had been struck off, the list published in the prospectus within a very short time after it had first appeared there.

Mr. Chambers replied

Lord Denman said that, in his opinion, as two men who put their names over a door of business as partners held themselves out to the world in that character, and took on themselves its liabilities, so it must be a question for the Jury to determine whether several men who put their names into a prospectus of a company as its provisional committeemen did not hold themselves out to the world in a particular character, and take on themselves the responsibilities of that character. He inclined to think that they did so. But it so, even then, applying that rule to the present case, the defendant could not be liable for any part of the work done before the publication of his name took place. The only other question then was, whether, under the circumstances existing here, he was liable at all. That was a question which the Jury must decide, by determining whether the plaintiff had given him credit for the work, or whether the defendant had so conducted himself as to entitle the plaintiff to treat him as a person on whose credit the work was done. These questions the Jury must answer, upon a consideration of all the facts of the case.

The Jury, after a short consultation, returned a verdict for the defendant.

ALLEGED LIBEL.

In the Court of COMMON PLEAS, on Tuesday, an action was tried, Holdsworth v. Gibson and others. The plaintiff, Dr. Holdsworth, who had been a physician at Plymouth, sought to recover damages from the defendants, who were proprietors of the Plymouth and Devonport Weekly Journal, for an alleged libel, the effect of which had been to eject him from the Western Yacht Club. It was also imputed to the plaintiff that he had cheated at cards at Guernsey, and had been connected with a notorious gambler at Tours The defendants pleaded a justification; and a good deal of evidence was called on their behalf to prove various gambling transactions in which the plaintiff had been engaged After a long trial, the Jury returned a verdict for the defendants on all the pleas of justification, but found two portions of the pleas not proved; and it was agreed that in the event of the Court being of opinion that those were material to the issues, a verdict should be entered for the plaintiff – damages One Farthing.

In the Court of EXCHEQUER, on the same day, an action was tried, O'Brien v. Clement, arising out of the circumstances which originated the cause above noticed, in the Common Pleas. It was brought by Mr. Fitzgerald O'Brien to recover damages for a libel published upon the 15th of February last, in Bell's Life and Sporting Chronicle, of which the defendant is the registered proprietor. The alleged libel charged the plaintiff with having been the associate and confederate of two persons who were expelled from the Royal Western Yacht Club for cheating at cards, and that the plaintiff caused himself to be proposed as a member of the club, but was blackballed. —The Attorney-General, addressing the Jury for the defendant, stated, that if any apology or contradiction of the paragraph had been asked for, the defendant would have made it: no application had been made; and he did not intend to prove the justification, which would entitle the plaintiff's counsel to a reply. The fact was, the defendant made inquiries into the whole matter, and he was not able to sustain his justification. He was, therefore, now prepared to give a public retractation and apology for the charge of confederacy with the parties expelled which had been made against the plaintiff; but, under all the circumstances, it was hoped the Jury would consider nominal damages sufficient.—The Jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff with £30 damages.

O'BRIEN v. BRYANT AND OTHERS. This was a similar action, by the same plaintiff, against the registered proprietors of the Plymouth and Devonport Weekly Journal. In this case, the defendants offered to submit to a verdict for 40s. damages, which would carry costs.—The Lord Chief Baron observed that the plaintiff's honour would in no degree suffer by accepting that offer. -Mr. Sergeant Murphy said that, after his Lordship's intimation, he would not go on with the case.—A verdict was then taken for 40s. damages.

DEATH IN A RAILWAY TRAIN.—On Monday evening, an inquest was held by Mr. Carter, at the Railway Tap, Nine Elms, Battersea, as to the death of Helen Thompson, aged forty-eight years, lately residing at Southampton. The deceased was recently stewardess on board the Royal Tar steamer, which runs from Southampton to Gibraltar, but for the last fortnight she had been suffering from an attack of gout and shortness of breath, for which she had received medical advice. On the previous Thursday, the deceased and her daughter entered a third-class carriage at Southampton for the purpose of proceeeing to London. On reaching Basingstoke the deceased seemed very ill, and her lips turned quite blue. A little water was given her, and she rallied for some time. The train continued until they stopped at the terminus at Nine Elms, Battersea, when she was again taken ill. The police were made acquainted with the case, and soon brought three medical gentlemen who pronounced life extinct. The deceased was on the way to Liverpool for the benefit of her health. The Jury returned a verdict of "Natural death."

LAMENTABLE SUICIDE.—An inquest was held on Tuesday by Mr. C. J Carttar, at the Duke of Kent, Greenwich, to inquire into the circumstances attending the death of Jane Carey, aged fifty-nine, wife of a jeweller. It was given in evidence that deceased left her bed on Monday morning before the rest of the family were up, and destroyed herself by cutting her throat. Her husband's business had been very precarious during the last two years, which caused considerable despondency in deceased. Verdict—"Temporary insanity"

A CHILD MURDERED BY HER FATHER NEAR BRISTOL.—On Monday night, a man named Cann, a butcher, residing in the district of Baptist Mills, near Bristol, murdered his infant daughter, during a quarrel with his wife. Mr. J. B Grindon, Coroner of Bristol, held an inquest on Tuesday upon the body, and received the following evidence:—Police Constable, No 200, said he was alarmed by a noise on Monday night, and going to the place whence the sound proceeded, he saw John Cann knock his wife down with his fist; he then kicked with his foot, upon which the wife screamed "murder, the child is dead." Witness ran towards her, and saw the mother lifting the child from the ground. He took the child up, and told Cann the child was dying. The woman said he had kicked it in the head, and before that he had flung it across the street three times. Cann made no answer. Witness then took him into custody. The infant was sent to the hospital. John Mason, house-surgeon of the hospital, said, that about half-past two o'clock this morning, the deceased infant was brought in It was treated for concussion of the brain, but died soon after five o'clock. He had made a post mortem examination, and found that death had been occasioned by fracture of the skull and concussion of the brain, produced by some violent injuries received —The inquest was adjourned till Wednesday. On that day the inquest was resumed, and the result was a verdict of "Wilful murder against John Cann," who was committed for trial.

EPITOME OF NEWS.—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

The Morning Herald notices the great increase of the works of the locomotive establishment of the Great Western Railway at Swindon. It states that in the course of the next year 51 miles of broad gauge railway will be open; 160 miles in 1848, and 250 miles in 1849. The express train on Saturday last to Swindon, is noticed as a striking proof of the rapid strides that the railway system is making. The engine—the new "Great Western" left the Paddington station at 9h. 46m. 50s., and, notwithstanding the driver had to reduce his speed on two occasions while passing stations, and to run through the Reading station, where some obstruction presented itself, at about 30 miles an hour, the entire distance to Didcot, 53 miles, was performed in fifty-six minutes and twenty seconds. The speed attained in part of the journey was upwards of 66 miles per hour.

As a proof of the longevity of the present generation, it may be stated that the obituary of the Times of Monday recorded the decease of no less than six persons whose united ages are 514 years, making an average of 85 and a fraction of 4 The age of one of these persons was 92 and of another 91.

NOTES FROM AN AMATEUR CONCERT.

THE ELEMENTS OF A CONCERT.

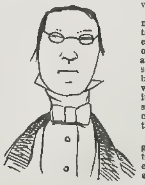
WE were favoured with a ticket for a meeting of the "St. Nicodemus Vocal Club," on the first time that the names of the members appeared in the printed programme, which was, of course, a grand night for them. For, that there must be something exceedingly pleasant in getting one's name into print, is proved by the success which attends the system of "100 Name Cards for 1s. 6*d.*!!" which has obtained so much popularity; not among people who are in the habit of giving cards away, but with those who never saw before how their names would look in type.

The generality of the songs were of the class that is termed "gentdel," without any particular meaning, and so written that you might have read them beginning at the last verse, and ending at the first, without much difference in the effect

Interspersed amongst these came a few comic songs in that popular style, wherein the jokes are left to the hearer's imagination. In order to prove themselves by no means unimaginative, the audience laughed at the end of each verse

The singers evidently fancied themselves most exquisitely humorous; and their imitations of people making real jokes, were truly excellent. They laid such a peculiar emphasis on particular words—looking all the while at the audience, as if they were trying to keep themselves from laughing at their own good things before they came out—that any deaf person would actually have believed them to be making the richest puns, and most piquant allusions. It was only by hearing the words, you could discover such not to be the case. Still, the deception was very clever.

Having thus given a slight notion of the general character of the songs, we will attempt to particularize a few. In the course of the evening, a young gentleman favoured the company with

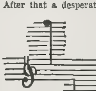


OH, I CANNOT GIVE EXPRESSION.

His portrait will no doubt afford a clue to his reasons. He was encored, though less for his voice than his veracity

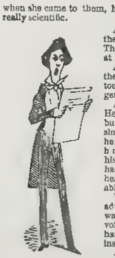
A young lady with a diamond brooch, gold bracelets, and rings enough for a set of bed-curtains, then seated herself at the piano, and sung "Take back the gems you gave." This song was no doubt selected to show that she did not buy her own jewellery, nor value it much when she got it.

After that a desperate looking young lady began a song in concert room Italian, or Italian words with an English pronunciation



This young lady was particularly successful in her——What do clever people call this style of music?

There were many such passages in her song: and when she came to them, her imitation of a child with the hooping cough was really scientific.



A sentimental youth, with a dismal voice, next obliged the audience with "I've lived to bear her marriage bells." The audience seemed to think it would have been better—at least for them—if he hadn't.

Another minstrel, who began "Alice Grey," illustrated the line, "Oh, my heart, my heart is breaking!" very touchingly, for when he came to it, he broke down altogether

Another then came forward, whose portrait we subjoin. He produced no sound save a scarcely audible moaning; but, as in a concert-room, we always applaud a bad singer—if he is only diffident, it encourages him; and if he is conceited, it spurs him on to make a greater fool of himself we applauded him [illegible] This was lucky, as his mamma sat next to us, and told us "that his efforts had hitherto been strictly private" (no one could have heard him a yard off), and that "his voice was remarkably sweet in a small circle."

We thought that the only chance of hearing him to advantage in a small circle would be to get into an empty water-butt with him; so we replied that we thought his voice remarkably delicate. This was true; for he could'nt have injured the drum of a mite's ear, if he had put the insect into a speaking trumpet, and bawled his loudest.

At last the concert came to an end. The vocalists condescendingly came down to their friends, and mixed with the audience, just to show that they did'nt feel at all proud; and they pretended to be chatting unconcernedly, while throwing anxious glances round, to see whether anybody noticed them, each of them evidently thinking that He had sung The song of the evening, but nevertheless, striving to look as if he didn't know it.

DINING IN A CLUB.

The most cheering accounts of this new Civic Institution have reached us indeed, it has created such excitement in the City, that the old cry is revived of "Prentices! Prentices! Clubs Clubs!"

A notion has been started of buying the identical Bow bells, to be recast into smaller ones for the use of the Club. The original stone is to be brought from Holloway for the chairman's seat in the committee room; and a cat has been ordered, to parade the establishment generally, and ever keep the legend before the subscribers.

From the interest taken in its welfare, it is presumed that every young man in the City will soon be seen

A POSY.

There is a smart little gilt-edged book published, called "Flowers and their Emblems," in which sentimental young people are taught how to make a bouquet into a perfect poem. All this is very charming; and, as long as the Convolvulus Major is allowed to represent "Dangerous Insinuation," and the Peruvian Heliotrope, "Je vous aimé," very delightful; but, if some strong minded person chose to insist that the Convolulus meant "Over the left," and the Heliotrope, "I wish you may get it," it would be really difficult to disprove the assertion. Hence, these Floral Emblems do not much interest us, unless they could be all put in the subjoined fashion, representing

THE INCORPORATION OF CRACOW PROCLAIMED AT THE SENATE HOUSE BY THE GOVERNOR.

INCORPORATION OF CRACOW WITH AUSTRIA.

Our Illustration shows the formal procedure for the suppression of the Republic of Cracow. The details were first communicated in a letter from Breslau, dated Nov. 17:—

"A proclamation, printed in Polish and German, dated November the 16th, and signed by General Castiglione, has just reached us, whereby the treaty concluded on the 3rd of May, 1815, between the three Powers, respecting the free city of Cracow, is declared to be 'abrogated;' and it is also decreed that 'Cracow, together with its territory, is to be given back to Austria, and to be incorporated in the Austrian monarchy. The said city and territory to be held by his Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Austria as it was held by his Imperial Majesty before the year 1809.' General Castiglione, the Governor of Cracow, published this proclamation from the balcony of the Senate-house, and the Austrian eagle was hoisted under salvoes of cannon.

"Respecting the future existence of the city of Cracow itself, the Austrian Government has provided as well as possible. Cracow is to be the capital of the new created Government of West Galicia, while Lemburg remains as capital of the kingdom of Galicia, the seat of Government of East Galicia. The circles of Bochnia, Rzeszoia, and Joslaw will belong to West Galicia. In this new capital of West Galicia there will be a civil and military governor, a commander of the place, &c."

The latest intelligence respecting "the incorporation" is contained in a letter from Berlin, of the 2nd, stating that the Protest of Lord Palmerston against the incorporation of Cracow into the Austrian Monarchy, sent to the Cabinets o Vienna and St Petersburgh, is drawn up in very moderate terms, and is not of such a nature as to lead to fear a rupture. The inquiry is now made, what will France do, forced to protest by herself in this matter? The best results are anticipated from the diplomatic intervention of Russia in favour of the trade carried on between Silesia and Cracow.

COVENT GARDEN THEATRE.

It will be seen by reference to our Journal of last week that the reconstruction of the Auditory of Covent Garden Theatre, for the performances of the new "Italian Opera" Company, were commenced immediately after the close of M. Jullien's term. The main object is to enlarge the horse-shoe Auditory, and augment the number of Boxes; and, at the same time, to increase the area of the Pit. On referring to the ground-plan, in Dibdin's "Illustrations of the London Theatres," published by Mr. Britton, in 1826, it will be seen that the Auditory does not occupy a sixth part of the entire plan · this, if we remember rightly, was partly owing to the increased number of private boxes, with their elegant ante-rooms, which encroachments upon the public boxes led to the memorable "O. P. row." However, considering the large, unappropriated, or useless space in the Theatre, there will be ample room for the new enterprise.

It is hard to follow changes in theatrical history; but Covent Garden, we think, has undergone fewer transmutations than either of our Metropolitan Theatres. It was, from the first, a beautiful Theatre; though the roof must yield the palm to the vast circle of Drury Lane.

Our Illustration shows the interior of Covent Garden during the demolition, or rather the taking-down, of the Auditory: it is a sorry scene, as, indeed, an empty theatre is at any time. But here a host of workmen are disturbing the dust of seven and thirty years. The fronts of the boxes have nearly disappeared; and with them those finely-executed national emblems—the rose, shamrock, and thistle—fit ornaments for a Temple of the British Drama, once devoted to the ennobling art of a Kemble and a Siddons, now deserted by popular favour, and no longer available for the object with which it was originally constructed!

Of the comparative numbers held by Covent-Garden and Drury-Lane Theatres, the following will be found correct. In Covent-Garden Theatre, there are, or rather were, seats for 2800 persons, exclusive of those in private boxes; but, on the visit of George IV., in 1823, 4255 persons paid for seats, exclusive of those in private boxes. Drury-Lane—"the wilderness," as Mrs. Siddons termed it—had seats for 3600 persons, though 5000 persons were occasionally wedged into the building. After Mr. Elliston had reduced the auditory, at an expense of £21,000, it held 3060 persons; but subsequent alterations must have reduced the number of seats.

The depth of Covent Garden, from the front of the stage to the back of the pit, is 52 ft. 9 in.; of the San Carlo, at Naples, 79 ft. 4½ in.; of the Scala, at Milan, 77 ft. 5 in.; and of the Great Theatre, at Parma, the largest in Europe, 152 ft. 7½ in.

The different predilections which induce many ingenious gentlemen and others, to enroll themselves among the ranks of associated hobby riders, have each its various idiosyncrasy—and each is pursued with a similar avidity to that which moved even the phlegmatic Dutchman during the well-known tulip mania in Holland.

SPANGLED-BACK.—(NO 2.)

Rabbits, bantams, pigeons, "little dogs and all," have their especial votaries in numerous sections of the general body denominated the "Fancy," whose proficients do not fail to discover in objects that, to the uninitiated, would appear of little import, a significance which practically refutes the time-honoured proverb, "familiarity breeds contempt."

The celebrated Linnæus could find matter for the contemplation of a lifetime in the hand's breadth of soil which a clown would tread unconsciously beneath his hobnailed shoe.

There are few things so minute or insignificant, but that a diligent observation of their peculiarities may serve to reveal a degree of comparative interest which appertains to them as indispensable links in the great chain of creation.

We are taught that the wisest of men was acquainted with all things, "from the cedar of Lebanon even to the hyssop on the wall," and we are admonished by his example not to despise or overlook the small works of nature.

Moreover, it is good for a man to ride his hobby; few are so perfect, or so dull, as not to possess some superfluous activity over and above the animus necessary for the affairs, professional or commercial, which constitute the common business of life, and it is well that such an element should effervesce upon some object at once instructive and without offence.

Among the members of the Fancy, the societies for improving the breed of fancy Canary Birds, maintain an eminent position. These societies are denominated the Friendly, the Royals, the Amateurs, and the Hand in Hand.

It is to be regretted that such societies and their predecessors have not preserved any connected record of their transactions, together with some account of their observations on the progressive changes which their exertions have effected upon the appearance of the bird. It would appear that such societies have existed for upwards of a century, but, in the absence of any memorial of the earlier days of the Fancy, tradition fails to make us acquainted with any particulars of its origin and progress until within about fifty years of the present time.

The first introduction of the Canary-finch into Europe appears to have occurred in the fourteenth century, or soon after the discovery of the Canary Islands, when it is said to have been conveyed to the mother-country by the Spanish colonists. However, we have no precise account of such an introduction until two centuries later. Bechstein, a German author, states that, at the beginning of the nineteenth century, a vessel containing a number of these birds, destined for Leghorn, was wrecked on the coast of Italy, opposite to the island of Elba, where, on being set at liberty, they took refuge. The climate being favourable; the birds increased, and soon became a favourite with the bird-fanciers of Italy. But, from the circumstance of none but male birds having been thus conveyed, it is to be concluded that the breed immediately became mixed, and the genuine characteristics of the original species blended with those of other tribes to which they had some affinity. Among these the Siskin is said by Buffon to be the only bird of which the male and female propagate equally with those of the male or female Canaries. Turner, who published a botanical work in 1560, indicates Spain as the source from whence England was then supplied with the Canary, and likewise with the food proper for its nourishment. He says, speaking of Phalaris,* "The first tyme that euer I saw thys herbe was in the Citie of Come, where, as the chefe Physiciane of the Citie, no less gentle than well learned, shewed vnto me, and my felow master Johan Walker. Afterwarde, I saw it in England taken for mil, for they that brought Canari burdes out of Spayn brought of the sede of Phalaris also, to fede them with."

From various causes, it is difficult to identify the Fancy Canary with the stock from which it originally sprung, but there appears some ground for the opinion that the variety called the Lizard may be looked upon as nearest of kin. The plumage of the Lizard (See Cut No. 1) is more uniform in hue than that of the regular Prize Canary, being of a greenish bronze throughout, excepting the upper part of the head, which is covered by a patch of clear yellow. The back, which is marked with spangles in uniform stripes, corresponding with the trapezius, is an indication of the primitive state, the unsophisticated produce of nature being precise and geometrical.

The Canary known about twenty years ago as the "Spangled-back" (See Cut No. 2), will show the same process as that which appears in the Lizard, but much broken up, an evident sign of degeneration, and which, to have been held up as a beauty, seems to present an error on the part of the Fancy at that time.

Another notable consideration appears in the fact that the prize birds, previous to the first moulting, appear in a plumage nearly similar to that of the lizard, the only difference being that the young birds are of a brownish hue, while the green coat of the lizard is set off by a gloss of fine grey, similar to the effect of light upon an antique bronze. The legs of the prize bird, which were formerly black, are likewise represented by those of the lizard, these still continuing dark. This variety, which is not recognised by the Fancy as a regular prize bird, is a favourite among the weavers of Nottingham, who are considered to produce some of the best specimens. It derives its name from the resemblance it bears to the colour and markings of the green lizard. From the above evidences, and the similarity which seems to exist between this bird and the description of the greenfinch of the Canary Islands, it is very probable that, among the many varieties produced by cultivation, or by pairing with other tribes, that in this bird we may recognise the nearest approximation to the original species.

The Canary-finch is found in a wild state in the island of Madeira, where its song is admired.

In Italy it is paired with the citril-finch; in Germany, with the linnet, the greenfinch, the siskin, and the goldfinch. The grey, the yellow, the blackish, and the chesnut, or cinnamon Canary, are the principal varieties, and from their combination have been produced other varieties, according to Buffon, to the amount of twenty-nine; but this estimate is probably much under the fact.

The variety called the Cinnamon Canary is among the most rare; it is produced by the Norwich weavers.

The kinds chiefly recognised by the Fancy, are the mealy-bird and the jonquil, and upon these all the resources of the breeders' judgment and experience have been exerted. The common standard of a prize bird appears in the regulations of the "Friendly" as follows:—"No bird shall be considered a fair show bird that has a feather or feathers without black, in stalk or web, in the flight or tail feathers; or that has less than eighteen flying feathers in each wing, and twelve in the tail.

Next to the perfection of the wings and tail—these being clearly defined by their black feathers forming a clear "saddle," or absolute separation of colour from the wing coverts—the qualities which entitle show birds to notice are as follows:—

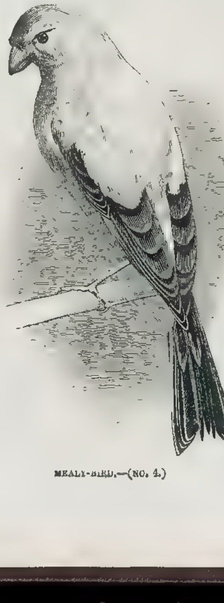
The Jonquil (Cut No. 3), as its name denotes, is required to be of a pure deep yellow, entirely free from any green tinge; the colour is deeper on the cap, over the eyes, and on the scapulars.

In the mealy-bird (Cut No. 4) the golden plumage of back, breast, and head, appears frosted over, or powdered, through the small feathers producing a whitish edge. In both of these varieties the purity of development is the criterion of excellence, and the first prize is adjudged to the bird whose colour is most perfect. In these birds a superiority of form (the result of high breeding) will be discovered, but such a quality is not recognised by the judges.

After the second moult, the Canary is no longer a show bird, the dark feathers in the wings and tail then disappearing entirely.

The nest feathers are, as has already been stated, similar to the appearance of the lizard. The first moulting, which occurs in the autumn of the first year, removes the short feathers only; these are replaced by the pure plumage, which appears first in two clear yellow bands over the pectoral process, and then spreads over the whole of the upper part of the bird, leaving the quill feathers in their original black state. The Canary is then in its most perfect state as a fancy bird, and it loses this distinction immediately after.

Among other points of nice attention which are required during the moult, it is necessary to observe if any of the quill feathers should happen to be prematurely shed (beaten out), in which case they would be reproduced colourless, or 'foul;" to provide against this, it is the practice of breeders to extract the growing feather when in the blood, or while it performs a part in the circulation. This being done, the uniformity of black feathers continues uninterrupted.



MEALY-BIRD.—(NO. 4.)

In breeding the fancy birds great proficiency is shown in judicious pairing. A mealy-bird and a jonquil being put together, the produce will not prove a mixture of the qualities of the parent birds, but the character of the one or the other will appear distinct, and the produce of the nest will probably show specimens of each kind, mealy and jonquil. It is a curious fact that the mealy-bird may be distinguished at six days old, by the invariable appearance of five feathers on the crest of the ilium, which are not developed by the jonquil in any case.

The pious and excellent Dr. Watts has borne testimony to the harmony of the early condition of little birds. "Birds in their little nests agree," but it is well for the sake of veracity in this instance, that the worthy doctor stopped there; for no sooner have the young of the Canary scrambled from the procreant cradle than they will fight like young harpies.

The above union, i. e. that of the mealy and the jonquil, is considered favourable to the production of pure birds; but if two strong birds are associated, the result will be an overcharge of colour in the offspring.

Another unfavourable consequence appertaining to the union of two jonquils appears, when the practice is continued, in a deterioration of the web of the feathers, which become frizzled and insufficient to cover the body, and the proper complement of tail and wing feathers will be wanting. A curious example of this kind appeared in a bird of our acquaintance. This specimen had failed to develop more than one single feather, the remainder of its body appearing like the scanty plumage of a Friesland hen. It was the habit of this odd bird to toy with the solitary feather which constituted its caudal appendage by drawing it through its beak, until it became quite curled up by such manipulation. The above propensity to make both ends meet is not an uncommon vice among better fledged birds; and it is the practice of attentive breeders to prevent it, by hanging a piece of string from the top of the cage, in order to divert the notice of his restless charge.

The hen Canary produces on an average four nests annually. The number of thirty-eight birds have been bred from two pair of birds during this year, and the produce of one cock and two hens has been known to amount to as many as forty; but these are extraordinary instances. However, the many casualties to which the young birds are liable operates as an effective check to their increase, and the breeder is considered to do well who produces half a dozen male birds of each sort in the year.

The amount of prizes has varied at different times, and in different societies; it is governed by the number of the members. The prizes, which are ten in number, are appropriated to the five best birds in degree of each kind, viz., mealy and jonquil. The two principal Shows are held in the last week in November and the first in December: the former, the Royals, at the Gray's Inn Coffee-house; and the latter, the Friendly, at the British Coffee-house, Cockspur-street: at both of which places a numerous company, not ungraced by the presence of fair amateurs, assemble, to admire the tenants of the show cages.

And, as all associations would be incomplete without a concluding dinner, the members, with their friends and visitors, are wont to assemble round a well-garnished table at five o'clock precisely. It is the custom of the Chairman, after dinner, when the decanters have been placed before him, to call upon the first prize bird for a song; which summons not being responded to by the feathered biped, some little pause ensues. This interruption is generally terminated by an apology from the owner for the silence of his bird, and the voluntary offer, on his part, to perform as proxy. Many good songs, and good things too, follow; and the annual labours and triumph of the Canary Fancy conclude under the animating influence of good cheer, and amid the conciliating interchange of mutual sentiments.

[The specimens of the mealy-bird and the jonquil, in the above cuts, were drawn from first prize birds, both the property of the same breeder.]

THE THEATRES.

We must not look for any very great novelty in the theatrical world until Christmas. All the departments behind the scenes are in full activity, preparing for the pantomimes, which will form the chief entertainment: indeed, we believe the Haymarket is the only house that will put forward a burlesque. There is something curious in this change of managerial opinions. Last winter it was supposed that nothing would attract but extravaganzas, and that the old style of harlequinades had altogether had their day. This year we find the latter again in the ascendant, the burlesques having been fairly run to death. There have been plenty of topics during the last six months to joke upon, mechanically or otherwise. Pantomimes will, however, never become very popular until the story and intrigue of the opening is made in some measure to run through the entire piece.

HAYMARKET.

On Monday evening an actress new to the British boards appeared at this theatre, as Kate O'Brien, in the comedietta of "Perfection." She was called in the bills, "Miss Reynolds, from the American theatres;" but we heard in the theatre that she was English by birth. However, this is of little consequence; we have only to record the success of her début, which was complete and mos satisfactory. Miss Reynolds promises to be a great acquisition to our boards. We speak of the theatres generally, as, in the Haymarket, Miss P. Horton would have played the character equally well; but Miss Reynolds is eminently calculated to perform any character in a line of all others most difficult to fill—that which, we think, on the French stage, would be termed the premiere soubrette—a line which, from the specimen Mademoiselle Brohan has afforded us, we take to be a little superior to the "singing chambermaid" of our English dramatic distinctions. The new actress is a perfect mistress of her art; she has a ice speaking voice, and an exceedingly lady-like deportment, whilst her singing is unexceptionable. In the ballads "I'll be no submissive wife," and "The Gondolette," she was loudly and generally encored; and all through the piece the most flattering demonstrations of the approval of the audience greeted her. At the conclusion, she was unanimously called for, and received the customary tributes with very graceful acknowledgments. We have seldom witnessed a more satisfactory appearance. The other characters were well played by Messrs. Tilbury, Holl, and Clark, and Mrs. Humby. The scene between the two latter performers was acted to the life; but, where have we a lady's maid like that which Mrs. Humby can pourtray? And it would be difficult to find a smarter representative of "a gentleman's own servant" than clever little Mr. Clark. We presume that he has a proper salary; otherwise, we think, any "fast" man-about town would settle any liberal annuity upon him, were it only to ride, either behind him or his cab.

On Wednesday evening, on the occasion of Mr. Archer's benefit—when the house was crowded—a curious circumstance occurred. A new farce, called "Story Telling," was amongst the attractions of the evening; and it had proceeded but a few minutes, when Mr. Farren, who was playing in it, came forward, and said that, through indisposition, he was incapable of doing justice to the author, and therefore begged the audience to allow the curtain to fall; with which they good-temperedly complied; and, after a short lapse of time, the drama of "Suzanne" was proceeded with.

Sale of an Alleged Autograph of Shakspeare.—On Monday, a sale by auction of a curious collection of old plays, &c., took place at Messrs. Puttick and Simpson's rooms, and amongst them some manuscript notes and a signature, presumed to be the autograph of William Shakspeare. These were inserted in an odd volume of "Hollinshed's Chronicles," first edition, 1577, imperfect. The auctioneer stated that he would not guarantee the signature to be genuine, but that it, as well as the manuscript notes, were presumed to be in the autograph of the "immortal bard" There was but one offer for the volume, viz., £5, at which sum it was knocked down to a gentleman named Holding.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON ALMANACK—SECOND EDITION OF 40,000.
This Day, Price 1s., gilt edges,

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON ALMANACK,
AND PICTURESQUE CALENDAR FOR 1847

This ALMANACK is submitted to the Public by the Proprietors, with confidence of its superiority over its predecessors. The Work was commenced in 1845 with a view of furnishing a Repository of Useful Knowledge of permanent value for constant reference, in Astronomy, Astronomical Occurrences, and the Natural History of the Year

The ASTRONOMICAL DEPARTMENT has been placed entirely under the superintendence of JAMES GLAISHER, Esq, F R.A S., and of the Royal Observatory at Greenwich.

On the third page of each month is a series of tableaux of Memorable Events, carrying out in a true spirit what is usually and properly introduced into our Almanack, not for occasional reference only, but to cherish respect for these landmarks of British History

The fourth page of each month is devoted to Natural History. The whole of this portion is from the very able pen of Mrs. LOUDON, and the interesting series of Illustrations to this department has been drawn and engraved by Miss LOUDON, under the immediate superintendence of Mrs. LOUDON

The Calendar Illustrations are from the masterly pencil of WILLIAM HARVEY, and engraved in the first style of Art, by LINTON, illustrative of the National Sports.

Published at the Office of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, 198, Strand.

The intent of impaling is to show that the bearer is married to a woman of a particular family; but when, by her death, the alliance is at an end, he ceases to use the ensigns of her family Some instances occur of a widower continuing to impale the arms of his deceased wife, from a regard to her memory; but this practice accords not with the laws of heraldry. THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 12, 1846.

We are much in the habit of considering ourselves a common-sense and eminently practical people; and the trading and commercial community is particularly proud of its talents for "business," business habits, and so forth. In some matters we do not always support the character we claim quite so perfectly as might be wished: in our public works, for instance, when we do anything at all, which is but seldom, we spend more money, and get worse served, than any other nation. This, as a fact, is not very creditable to us as "men of business;" and none but such a "practical people" as ourselves, are found giving themselves up, soul and pocket, to the indiscretion or ignorance of some clique or committee, who job a statue for an artist, or a public building for an architect, and, at an enormous outlay, erect at last some abomination that makes us the laughing-stock of Europe. Neither the National Gallery, nor the Square where it stands, its squirts, basins, and pillar, do us credit even as men of business, as mere affairs of money's-worth in stone and mortar, to say nothing of higher matters of taste and art. The Pavilion at Brighton, and Buckingham Palace, stand as proofs of the very unbusiness-like manner in which a practical people allows its money to be spent: two such unsightly Royal residences cannot be pointed out on the whole Continent; yet they cost sums that would almost have built a Louvre. It may be said the people had little to do with them; but in what the public does with its own hands is the shrewdness and practical matter-of-fact ability we claim for ourselves better supported? Where does every swindling and bankrupt State come to when it wants to "negotiate a loan"—a phrase which really means that fraud on the largest scale, which on a small one is known at the Old Bailey as "obtaining money on false pretences? To whom do mushroom Republics and rotten Monarchies look when their exchequers are empty, and they have neither the will nor the power to replenish them honestly? To England. A Minister of Finance, who has no finances to administer, indites a prospectus of a loan at some impossible rate of interest, and, straightway, "common-sense," practical Englishmen, discontented with Threadneedle-street, sell out their hundreds and thousands, and pour them into the treasuries of Governments whose place on the map they could scarcely point out if they were asked to do so. So far from bringing a prudent, practical caution to bear on the business of life, we believe firmly that, as a mass, the people of England will risk more on less inquiry than any other nation in the world.

Descending from the community to that of which communities are made—individuals we find something of the same spirit prevailing extensively. The records of our police-offices prove, that nowhere is money or money's worth more easily parted with to knavery that has skill enough to assume the air and manner that pass for "gentlemanly." What a good prospectus is to an insolvent state, when it "comes so smug upon the mart," a "fashionable exterior" is to the individual swindler. With this one essential, the success of this class of adventurers is something marvellous. Practical business-like England is the very Elysium of sharpers; with great self-complacency, we set down the Germans as dreamers, the French as volatile, and the Italians as frivolous. But, neither in Germany, France, nor Italy, is there that worship, and blind subservience to rank and wealth, which make the mere assumption of their externals a safe passport to trust and credit. The tradesman, who would think twice before he parted with his goods for a cheque signed Snobkins, accepts one signed Wyndham or Wellesley, or some such cognomen, with the utmost alacrity. If the knave is a tolerable actor, can master a few addresses from the "Court Guide," and, above all, if he can talk of a Lord or two as if he knew them, he is almost gifted with impunity. In a recent case, the sharper whose names we have borrowed above in illustration, disarmed suspicion by these means, in two classes of men the most upon their guard—innkeepers and bankers. A "fashionable exterior" did it all. Here is another case; a watchmaker in Cheapside stated, at the Mansion-House, the other day, that "A well-dressed middle-aged man, accompanied by a woman of dashing appearance, called at his shop on Monday, and selected a gold watch and appendages, the price of which was £24 5s. The gentleman tendered in payment a cheque for that amount upon Dixon and Co., bankers, in Chancery lane."

Every point is well calculated; the man is "well dressed," the lady is of "dashing appearance," and the cheque was signed "Warrington Crowther," a good "mouth-filling" name, it will be observed. In this case, however, the attempt was foiled; the watch and appendages were retained till the banker should report as to the "effects;" but the Lord Mayor bestowed so much eulogy on the tradesman, that one would imagine he had done something wonderful, instead of having exercised the commonest degree of prudence; he was evidently an exception to the general rule, for the Lord Mayor said he "had acted with a discretion which seemed to be wholly unintelligible to the many tradesmen who had, since the commencement of his Mayoralty, called upon him to make complaints of the dishonest dealings of some of their customers. They had asked for advice after they had been robbed."

Competition may have something to do with this: the anxiety to "do business" is so great that it tends to repress any desire to demand "references" of the "person of very gentlemanly manners," for fear he should depart indignant, and favour a rival with his patronage. But it will not account for the almost reckless credit that is given, the credulity with which any plausible story is received, and the want of precaution in managing the mere details of business. On these the sharper counts securely; the harvest bends to his sickle—the sheep offer themselves to be shorn. On the same day, and directly after the above case was disposed of, "two respectable shopkeepers" appeared and complained to the Lord Mayor that they had been plundered of goods by a trick so old that it is an absolute wonder how any man living, where newspapers are read, could possibly be duped by it. A man "ordered goods, and stated that they should be paid for upon delivery. When the porter called he was sent back for more articles, and was to be paid the whole amount upon his return to the purchaser, who of course took care to be out of the way upon all future visits upon the subject."

The artifice is venerable with antiquity, and yet it still serves! We again quote the testimony of the Chief Magistrate:—

> The Lord Mayor observed that the tradesmen of the City, with all their experience, exposed themselves in a most marvellous manner to the felonious manœuvres of the multitude of adventurers of London. The instructions given to the porter in such a case as that which had been just represented, ought to have been peremptory. The necessary caution had not been used, and the fraud had resolved itself into a mere debt.

We do not deserve the high character we claim for ourselves as a "practical" and "business-like" people; we vote money to Government for intelligible purposes, and it is absurdly wasted; we are asked to lend money by millions to every petty State that has enough life left in it to get up a riot, and call it a revolution; and we lend the millions, and are paid by what we might have foreseen—insolvency; or what we should have expected—repudiation. These things we do collectively; individually we allow fraud, imposition, and pretence a wider and richer field to range in than they have in any other part of the world. When shall we become really practical, and, like Master Dumbleton, the mercer, who declined Falstaff's order for his satins, inasmuch as "he liked not the security," turn round on public money jobbers, foreign loan mongers, and individual swindlers, and say—we will be cheated no more; give some security for what you promise! They would each have ready the spendthrift's answer, "I had as lief he had put ratsbane in my porridge, as stopped my mouth with Security!"

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

The late Royal Visit to Arundel Castle.—Previously to leaving Arundel Castle her Majesty expressed herself delighted with her reception, observing that it was one of the most delightful visits she had ever made. We understand that the Duchess and the Ladies Howard received tokens of the Royal esteem; and a handsome gratuity was left for the establishment, which was so complete in its arrangements as to surround the Royal visitors with the same domestic quiet and comfort which they enjoy in their own household.

The Court at Osborne House.—In our late impression last week, we announced the return of her Majesty and Prince Albert to Osborne House from Arundel Castle. Her Majesty and the Prince, with the Royal Family, are expected to remain at Osborne House till the 20th instant. Earl Grey is at Osborne House, on a visit to the Queen.

The Duke of Cambridge.—We are sorry to hear that the Duke of Cambridge has been obliged, from indisposition, to defer his intended visit to Petworth House.

The Duke of Wellington.—The Duke of Wellington has left Apsley House for Strathfieldsaye. The noble and gallant Duke will receive a numerous and distinguished circle during the approaching festive season.

The Duke of Devonshire.—The Duke of Devonshire, after a brief sojourn at Florence, has returned to Rome, and, towards the close of the month, intends to depart for Naples.

Sir Robert Peel.—Sir Robert and Lady Peel have been receiving a succession of guests at Drayton Manor, Staffordshire. Mr. Robert Peel has left the British Legation at Berne to make a tour in Italy.

English Fashionables at Rome.—Among the arrivals in Rome in the week ending November 14, were Lord Howard, Lord Arundel, Mr. F. and Lady Catherine Bruen, Lord Eliot, the Hon. W. G. Osborne, Viscount and Viscountess Brackley, &c.

Rumoured Aristocratic Marriage.—It is reported that proposals of marriage, on the part of the Earl of Stamford and Warrington, have been accepted, with the approbation of her illustrious parents, by a daughter of the Duke and Duchess of Sutherland.

Aristocratic Marriage.—The long-projected marriage between the Earl of Waldegrave and Mrs. Milward, of Hastings, was celebrated on Tuesday morning, at All Souls' Church, Langham-place. The Right Rev. the Lord Bishop of Chichester officiated

Death of Lady Caroline Drummond. This benevolent lady expired on the 4th instant, at her residence in Fitzroy street, Fitzroy-square, at the advanced age of eighty, after a lengthened illness.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

THE AGITATION FOR THE REDUCTION OF THE DUTY ON TEA.

A deputation, having for its object the reduction of the tea duties, waited on Lord John Russell and Mr. Charles Wood, on Saturday, having been introduced by William Entwisle, Esq, Member for South Lancashire.

Mr. William Earle, in presenting the memorial from the town of Liverpool, agreed to at the late public meeting, praying for a material reduction of the duty on tea, assured his Lordship that he had never witnessed a more influential or unanimous meeting in Liverpool than the one at which that memorial had been adopted, and he believed it expressed the feeling of nearly every inhabitant of that town.

The other deputations were from Edinburgh, Glasgow, Leeds, Blackburn, Manchester, Dublin, and Norwich, and consisted severally of the following gentlemen: Town of Leeds: Haman Stansfield, Esq.; James W. Scarlett, Esq Town of Blackburn: Montague Fielden, Esq.; — Pilkington, Esq City of Edinburgh: W. Law, Esq. City of Glasgow: Glasgow East India and China Association, Glasgow Merchants' House, and Glasgow Chamber of Commerce; John Scott, Esq; Andrew Jamieson, Esq.; R. Eglinton, Esq Royal Liverpool Association for the Reduction of the Duty on Tea: Christopher Ranson, Esq; William Rathbone, Esq.; James Steains, Esq. Liverpool East India and China Association: William Potter, Esq.; Henry Winch, Esq; Edward Brodribb, Esq. Liverpool Shipowners' Association: John Lockett, Esq.; Thomas Bold, Esq. Manchester Commercial Association: Robert Gardner, Esq.; Leopold Reiss, Esq; James Steuart. Merchants and Manufacturers of Norwich: J W. Robberds, Esq.; — Willett, Esq. Dublin Chamber of Commerce: C Halliday, Esq.

Several gentlemen having urged upon the Government the necessity of reducing the duty upon tea.

Lord John Russell assured the deputation that Government were fully impressed with the importance of the subject He had listened with great attention to all that had been urged by the several speakers as affecting the commercial, manufacturing, and shipping interests, and also as regarded the claims of China to a more liberal treatment. It was, as all knew, a revenue question, and an important one; but he would promise the early consideration of the Government to the arguments that had been advanced upon this point. More he could not say, nor could it be expected of him

Mr. Entwisle then thanked his Lordship for the patient hearing he had given to the subject, and the deputation withdrew, highly pleased with the courteous reception they had met with.

The Members for the City of London.—The Liberal candidates for the representation of the City of London at the next general election will, it is now understood, be Lord John Russell, Mr. Patteson, Sir G. Larpent, and Mr. Rothschild Representation of Westminster.—A requisition, signed by 136 electors of Westminster, has been presented to C. Cochrane, Esq., of Devonshire-place, to allow himself to be placed in nomination as a candidate to represent Westminster in Parliament. Mr. Cochrane gave the assent required.

The Royal Exchange.—On Tuesday the remaining portion of the asphalte, that formed the pavement of the Royal Exchange, was removed, to be replaced by a very hard material termed "Turkey stone," that formed the paving of the Exchange destroyed by fire in 1838, a quantity of which has been some time laid down, but this being insufficient to cover the entire area, the works have remained in an unfinished state for some months, till a fresh supply could be obtained from Turkey.

The Early Closing of Shops.—The members and friends of the Metropolitan Early Closing Association, established to effect an abridgment of the hours of business in all trades, held a public soirée on Monday evening at the Queen's Concert Room, Hanover-square, in furtherance of the objects they have in view. Mr. B. Bond Cabbell, M.P, presided; and the meeting, which was very numerously attended, was addressed by other influential gentlemen. In the course of the evening resolutions, framed in accordance with the views of the promoters of the movement, were proposed and carried unanimously.

Another Reduction in the Price of Bread.—On Wednesday morning nearly all the bakers in the locality of Seven Dials and St. Giles's reduced the price of their bread from sevenpence to sixpence the four-pound loaf

Mortality of London.—The returns for the past week show an increase in the number of deaths of upwards of 100 as compared with the previous week. The number is 1050, being 82 above the weekly average deduced from the returns of the last five years, and 50 above that of the last five autumns. For some time past the amount of mortality in London had been considerably below the average, but the first setting in of severe weather generally adds considerably to its amount.

POSTSCRIPT.

EXTRAORDINARY FRAUD IN A CHURCH

Robert Warrington Crowther, the individual to whom we have alluded in our leading article, was, on Thursday, charged, at the Westminster Police-office, with the following curious fraud. The prisoner, who is a well dressed man, about 3 years of age, described himself as a solicitor, residing at 35, Sloane-square

Henry Vaughan, clerk at Trinity Church, Sloane-street, said that, at half-past eleven on the previous morning, he was proceeding towards his residence, when he was informed that there were some persons in the church waiting to be married. He immediately went there, and found the prisoner and two handsomely-attired females seated in the vestry-room. The prisoner was at that time preparing a certificate at the table; and, on witness informing the party that a male friend would be necessary upon the occasion, the ladies said they expected one in a few minutes. The clergyman shortly afterwards arrived, when the prisoner produced a license, and was married to one of the ladies. The fees for the ceremony amounted to £1 14s., and prisoner gave him in payment the following order:—

"Messrs. Dixons and Co, Chancery-lane, London.
"Pay to Mr. Neale or bearer the sum of five pounds.
"Dec. 6, 1846. "R. Warrington Crowther."

Witness gave the prisoner £3 6s. in change; but having, in the course of the afternoon, gone to Dixon and Co.'s, he was informed that there was no account there in that name; that similar orders had been presented there; and that they were most anxious to apprehend the person who was uttering them. Witness, finding by a report in the papers of a case in which a corresponding order or cheque had been offered in Cheapside, immediately consulted the authorities connected with the church, and the result was the apprehension of the prisoner.

Mr. W. Walker, clerk at Messrs. Dixon's, proved that they had no account in the name signed to the order.

Prisoner, who had, on entering the dock, refused to stand up until ordered to do so by the magistrate, and who lolled about perfectly unconcerned, being asked what he had to say to the charge, observed, "I don't understand the thing."

Mr. Connell, chronometer and watch-maker, of Cheapside, who made the application to the Lord Mayor on Tuesday, recognised the prisoner as the person who had given him the cheque.

Mr. Burrell remanded the prisoner for a week, as there were other charges against him.

Death of Admiral Lord Amelius Beauclerk, G C B., G C H.—This nobleman died on Thursday at his seat, Winchfield House, Hants, at the advanced age of 75. He was a son of Aubrey, fifth Duke of St. Albans, and, consequently, uncle to the present head of that noble family. In 1841 he was appointed Admiral of the Red.

Representation of Manchester.—On Wednesday night, a very numerous meeting of the requisitionists to Lord Lincoln was held at Manchester, Mr Alderman Neild in the chair. The chairman and Mr. John Peel explained at length the reasons which had induced them to support the invitation to Lord Lincoln in preference to Mr. Bright Mr Peel concluded by reading a letter he had received from Lord Lincoln, dated from Drayton Manor, expressing his willingness to become a candidate for Manchester. Mr. J A Turner moved the formation of a committee. The committee was seconded by Mr. Malcolm Ross, and carried with loud cheers. Thanks were then voted to the chairman; and, after three cheers were given for Lord Lincoln, the meeting separated.

State of Ireland.—Our latest accounts from Ireland mention some melancholy instances of destitution, in addition to those noticed in page 379. It is stated that there were no less than nine deaths from starvation or destitution in the County Mayo during the last week. The Irish papers give details of these cases.

The Government Offices in Whitehall.—Yesterday morning, bricklayers commenced to lay down the foundation of the new front of the Treasury and Home Offices, which is to form the north-east wing of the elegant façade, in the florid Gothic style, in the course of construction in Whitehall, according to the plans and under the superintendence of Mr. Barry, the architect of the new Houses of Parliament. The foundation is commenced at from ten to twelve feet below the level of the street, and is on the site on which the mansion of Cardinal Wolsey formerly stood. The old foundation part, which is allowed to remain, is of great strength and thickness, and the new one is of similar dimensions and character. The building is not expected to be completed before the middle of summer; and when this has been accomplished, alterations in the same style of architecture are to be commenced in Downing-street, in continuation of the south-west wing

LATEST FOREIGN NEWS.

FRANCE.

Our latest Paris papers state that throughout France there is great agitation upon the subject of Cracow, and that the French people generally are highly indignant at the despotic step adopted by the three great Northern Powers. In Paris some agitation is manifested at the supposed prospect of famine. There was a report on 'Change, on Wednesday, at Paris, that the French Government had received news of the death of Prince Metternich.

COUNTRY NEWS.

Representation of Manchester.—It is stated that Lord Lincoln has accepted the invitation to propose himself for Manchester. In the meantime, Mr. Bright is actively canvassing the electors.

East Worcestershire Election.—Mr. Hodgetts Foley has acceded to the requisition presented to him to become a candidate for the Eastern Division of Worcestershire, in the room of Mr. J Barneby, deceased. Mr. Foley is a moderate Whig, and would, it is believed, had he been in Parliament, have supported the Free-Trade measures of Sir Robert Peel.

Liverpool Cotton Market The excitement in the Liverpool cotton market continues unabated, 30,000 bales having been sold on Wednesday, at an advance of ½d. per lb upon the previous day's quotations. Nearly one-half the business is on speculation.

Sudden Death of Colonel Wade, the Assistant Poor-Law Commissioner.—The sudden decease of this gentleman took place on Thursday (last week), at the Haverfordwest Union Workhouse. It appears that Colonel Wade, in company with Henry Leach, Esq, the Chairman of the Board of Guardians of Carmarthen Union, paid an official visit to the workhouse on the previous day, when, in about a quarter of an hour after his arrival, he was seized with illness while inspecting one of the bed-rooms. Under the advice of a surgeon, he was immediately removed to a bed-room, and every means which medical skill could suggest were used to restore him, but all in vain. He lingered until Thursday morning, about seven o'clock, when he breathed his last. An inquest on the body was held the same day, before George Parry, Esq, Coroner, when Mr. Rowe, the surgeon, gave it as his opinion that death was occasioned by the rupture of a blood-vessel in the brain. The Jury returned a verdict of "Natural Death."

Incendiary Fire in Berkshire.—On Monday evening, at about six o'clock, a fire was discovered on the farming premises of Mr. Greenwood, near Wallingford, Berkshire, and in a very short time three extensive wheat ricks, and some other property of less value, were totally destroyed. There is no doubt the calamity was the act of an incendiary. Mr. Greenwood, we understand, is insured.

SCOTLAND.

The Destitute Highlanders.—The suffering population in the Highlands and Islands of Scotland is estimated, by an Edinburgh paper, at 100,000

Proposed Aristocratic Marriages.—Among the matrimonial alliances in high life to take place soon in Scotland, the following are understood as settled: The Earl of Mansfield to Miss Baillie, sister of the Marchioness of Breadalbane and Lady Haddo; Mr. Henry Grant, brother of the Hon. Mrs. William Keith, to the Lady Isabella Keith, daughter of the late and sister of the present Earl of Kintore, and Sir William Gordon Cumming, Bart., to Miss M'Intosh, of Geddes. The first wife of this honourable Baronet, and who died three years ago, was one of the daughters of Lady Charlotte Bury, and niece of the Duke of Argyll.

The Elgin Burghs Sir Andrew Leith Hay is to be opposed, in the representation of the Elgin district of burghs at the next election, by Mr. George Skene Duff, second son of Sir Alexander Duff.

Murder of a Gamekeeper.—On Wednesday (last week), one of the under-gamekeepers of Killermont, named Jamieson, was fired at by poachers, and so severely wounded below the knee that he died the same night.

THE SMITHFIELD CLUB CATTLE SHOW.

They may boast as they will of our shows Horticultural,
Beautiful things in their odorous way,
Talk of our glorious pictorial—sculptural,
Heroes on canvass or granite so gray.
Let their eloquence flow over Madame Tussaud,
Or Egyptian Hall savage fresh from the Prairie,
But the whole of the lot cannot equal, I wot,
The Prize Cattle Show—that's the picture for me

A picture also [illegible] be spoiled in the eating,
But such is the fate of all things upon earth
Our foes like our beefsteaks, "grow better by beating,"
And the land of best beef is the land of true worth.
A rumpsteak and ale was Elizabeth's dejeuner à-la-fourchette, and who [illegible] us as shot
She valued by half even Essex's calf
More than toro of Spain and its proud chivalrie.

Man is his dinner, as I am a sinner,
"L'état c'est moi" said Louis Quatorze.
Cassius was there, and may cynics be thinner
Who carp against fat—the diaphanous bores
A stake and a chop à-la-Mary, we'd give them
Who sneer down improvement in any degree;
Let us laugh and grow fat; the best method to grieve them
For a baron of beef is the baron for me.

The best and the greatest amongst us endeavour
To raise to perfection the field and the fold,
'Twas thus in old Rome, and so shall it be ever,
Where men have a country, and freedom a hold
Then honour to all who of cottage and castle,
Promote agriculture, the hearty and free
May Christmas surround them with right merrie wassail,
And oh! the roast beef of Old England for me.

The annual show of cattle usually presented at this season by the Smithfield Cattle Club, at the Horse Bazaar, in Baker-street, and which forms such an enticement for dear country cousins, this year presents undiminished, or rather increased attractions. We attended the "private view" on Tuesday evening, and now present to our readers a sketch of the leading features of the "Show."

The show of this season is the most extensive yet exhibited, and, with respect to some of the classes, the best. Other breeds of animals, again, are inferior. The first class did not keep up its reputation, but the second and sixth—the former of which principally consisted of comparatively small English, and the latter of Scotch, Welsh, and Irish cattle—have been pronounced by the judges to be admirable.

We have, on several occasions, described the coup d'œil of this show, and we need now add but little to what we have formerly said. Imagine a brilliantly-lighted railway terminus turned into a splendid byre, and tenanted by two double lines of fat cattle, tossing their formidably-horned heads impatiently about, or listlessly chewing the cud, or comfortably nested in the warm straw bedding, in which the animals lean enough to stand on their legs are plunged to the knees. Imagine, then, groups of smock-frocked raw-boned shepherds, sauntering about their respective charges, mixing messes of meal and water, cutting up deserts of turnips, feeling the depth of fat on this heifer's ribs, or the quantity of offal on that ox's carcass, and boasting the merit of their respective beasts in every rural dialect of Britain. On one side runs a gallery, through the balustrades of which peep the formidable mechanism of those dreadfully unintelligible agricultural machines, which generally seem to consist of beams and platforms, painted intensely red and blue, and garnished with terrific rows of iron fangs. Jolly-looking farmers, with top-boots and grey great-coats—not looking a bit starved by the Repeal of the Corn-Laws—go swaggering about, their talk of swedes and mangoldwurtzels—men who seem to have inserted their legs in leathern telescope cases, with buttons at the side for the look of the thing, keep poking up pigs, which in their turn keep up one torrent of smothered grunting—oxen low, and south downs bleat in chorus; and, always barring the blaze of gas, the lavish expenditure of whitewash, and the light cast-iron roof, the whole aspect of the place is intensely bucolic.

We confess to not being able to enter into anything like a critical exposition of the points of the prize animals. All we can say is that most of them were miraculously obese—that some were smoother, more uniformly fat—that some had rougher coats, and others softer ones; but, as a whole, their pretensions appeared very similar, the line of fattened cows and calves having a decidedly monotonous appearance.

The shaggy little gentlemen from Wales, Ireland, and the Highlands, had certainly the most character in them. No one could mistake them for John Bulls They evidently did not take to fat kindly. Their spirit kept them down, and there was a twinkle in their eyes, an expression not only about the head, but lurking in every fold of the grizzled hides, in every jerk of the muscular, wiry legs, which told us as clearly as words could do it, "We're mountaineers—we're come from the heather and the rock, and we have a huge contempt for our fat friends, who have vegetated in Lowland and Saxon clover; they may be respectable in their way, but they are slow, very slow."

Commend us, however, to the pigs in the way of getting fat. These interesting creatures have certainly a genius for eating and drinking. The sheep were fat enough and square enough. In fact, many of them were such mere boxes of wool, that there seemed to be no possible reason why their heads should not be situated where their tails were. But the pigs—the pigs beat all the other quadrupeds hollow! Such snoring—such grunting such noozling down, with meeting snouts—such guzzling of meal and water, always with one leg in the trough—such shapeless, bloated, blind masses of living lard, with no heads at all to speak of, we certainly have not seen for some time, and have no great wish to see again Prince Albert was the exhibitor of certain of these prize grunters, and the Earl of Radnor was the happy proprietor of others.

Bidding an unsorrowful adieu to the pigs, we strolled through the implement gallery. No doubt, the machines, arranged in formidable line of battle along its entire length, were wonderfully ingenious; but, as we really do not understand them, we shall merely record the fact that a not inconsiderable proportion appeared to us to belong to a species of cross breed between pumps and coffee-mills.

Those especially interested in the business of the Club, and the award of the judges, will find the information which they require in the list of prizes which we subjoin:—

OXEN OR STEERS.

Class I.—Oxen or Steers, of any breed, under 5 years old, without restrictions as to feeding, yet the kind or kinds of food must be certified.

The exhibition was opened to the public at an early hour on Wednesday morning; and, if the number of visitors who passed through the gates during the day may be considered any criterion, appears to have lost none of its popularity. The Duke of Richmond, president of the club, arrived at the Bazaar about 10 o'clock, and, together with several of the stewards who were in attendance, went round the yard minutely examining the various classes. General Wemyss, who has the honour to officiate as farm steward to the Prince Consort, was also an early visitor. The demand for stock during the day was very dull, and few sales effected. Towards the evening, however, the trade brightened, and purchases were made more freely.

The following were among the principal lots sold: The Earl of Warwick's Hereford ox, bred by Mr John Thomas, of Cholstry, near Leominster, was purchased for £70, by Mr. Minton, purveyor to her Majesty and the Duchess of Kent, at Windsor. The Marquis of Exeter's Durham ox, bred by his Lordship, was bought by Mr Goodwin, of Godstone. His Royal Highness Prince Albert's Hereford ox (Class II), bred by Mr. Thomas Roberts, was purchased for £55, by Mr. Budge, of Lambeth-walk. His Royal Highness Prince Albert's Hereford ox (Class III), also bred by Mr. Roberts, was sold to Messrs. Sharp and Hale, of High-street, Marylebone. Sir Charles Wake's Hereford ox, bred by Mr. J. S Edwards, of Stanton Lacy, near Ludlow, was sold to Mr. Mann, of Croydon. Lord Southampton's Hereford ox (Class IV.), bred by Mr. William Child, was sold to Mr. Alder, of Esher. Mr. W. Goodale's Hereford steer, was purchased by Mr. Guerrier, of Islington. The Earl of Leicester's North Devon ox (Class V), bred by his Lordship, was bought by Mr. Armfield, purveyor to her Majesty, of Brook-street, Bond-street. His Royal Highness Prince Albert's Highland scot (Class VI), bred by Mr Campbell, commended by the judges, was purchased by Mr. Bannister, of Windsor.

Of the sheep and pigs very few were sold on Wednesday. The Earl of Radnor's stock of the latter was chiefly bought by Mr Garland, of Tottenham-court-road, and a pen of the Prince Consort's porkers was secured by Mr Wallace.

On Thursday the attendance notwithstanding the unpropitious state of the weather, was, if possible, more numerous than on the previous day. The Highland Durham Heifer, in the extra stock, the property of the Prince Consort, was sold to Mr. King, of Brighton, the Royal purveyor; and appeared to be an object of much curiosity. Several other purchases were made previous to the close. Mr. Trinder's Short Horned Heifer which gained the £20 prize in class I., was sold to Mr. Collingwood, of Abingdon, and the Prince Consort's Highland Scot and Durham Heifer, in class VII., was purchased by Mr Bannister, of Windsor. Lord Portman and several other distinguished members of the Club were in attendance during the day.

Yesterday (Friday) morning the members of the Smithfield Club held their Anniversary meeting at the Bazaar, in Baker-street. The attendance of members was more than usually numerous. The Duke of Richmond, President of the Club, occupied the chair. The only matter worthy of reference was a notice of motion for a re-consideration of the prize sheet, with a view to carry out some important alterations both in the classification of the animals, and the mode of feeding them Upon this motion some discussion arose, but the proposition was ultimately acceded to. The ordinary financial statement was submitted and approved of; after which, votes of thanks were passed to the noble Chairman, and to Mr. Gibbs, the Secretary; both of whom acknowledged the compliment.

His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge arrived at the Bazaar just as the proceedings at the above meeting had terminated, for the purpose of inspecting the Exhibition. The Duke of Richmond, accompanied by the Hon Mr Wilson, Mr Pusey, M P., and other members of the committee, met his Royal Highness at the entrance to the yard, and accompanied him round the several classes. His Royal Highness appeared to agree in the general impression as to the excellence of the present Exhibition, and especially complimented his Grace the Duke of Richmond on his sheep. After remaining in the exhibition nearly an hour, His Royal Highness left apparently much gratified with the visit. His Royal Highness Prince George of Cambridge, accompanied by Sir William Massey Stanley, visited the Exhibition during the afternoon The Earl Delawarr, the Hon Sackville West, Viscount Torrington, and several other noblemen were also present yesterday. The sales of stock were very dull.

Among the interesting objects at the Bazaar, was a pair of majestic ox-horns, with silver mountings, chains, &c; and placed upon a stand, in the centre of which is a silver figure bearing a socket for a light. Upon each horn is an inscription describing it to be that of a Hereford ox, bred by the Duke of Bedford, and exhibited at the Smithfield Cattle Club last year, when it obtained the third prize of £10, Second Class. Upon one horn is engraved, also, the Bedford arms, and upon the other the Royal arms, and some appropriate stanzas on each. The mounting, engraving, &c., has been beautifully executed by Mr. Wood, who, it will be recollected, a short time since, engraved a fine Nautilus Shell, which was submitted to her Majesty.

BOUQUET DE GIBIER, OR SPORTING NOSEGAY.

A CADEAU FOR CHRISTMAS.

This very seasonable novelty originated with M. Soyer, "the Gastronomic Regenerator," of the Reform Club; and, like everything which emanates from his inventive brain, is distinguished by its taste and utility. This is, indeed, a picturesque mode of keeping game, so as to make them ornamental until they become useful—at table. The lovers of "still life" pictures cannot but admire this "Bouquet;" and it is not unworthy of our painters' attention. The several articles of game, &c., are secured between branches of laurel and other evergreens, set off with dried and coloured flowers, "everlastings," &c. The handsome specimen we have engraved bears the following, arranged in the order here denoted:

2 GOLDEN PLOVERS.
LEVERET.
WILD DUCK. PHEASANT.
WILD
GROUSE. WIDGEON.
FRENCH ENGLISH
PARTRIDGE. PARTRIDGE.
WOODCOCK. TEAL.
2 SNIPES.
2 LARKS.

The brilliancy of the plovers and of the pheasant; and the brightness of the wild duck; backed by the sombre green; and the whole variegated and relived with multi-coloured flowers; is really very effective.

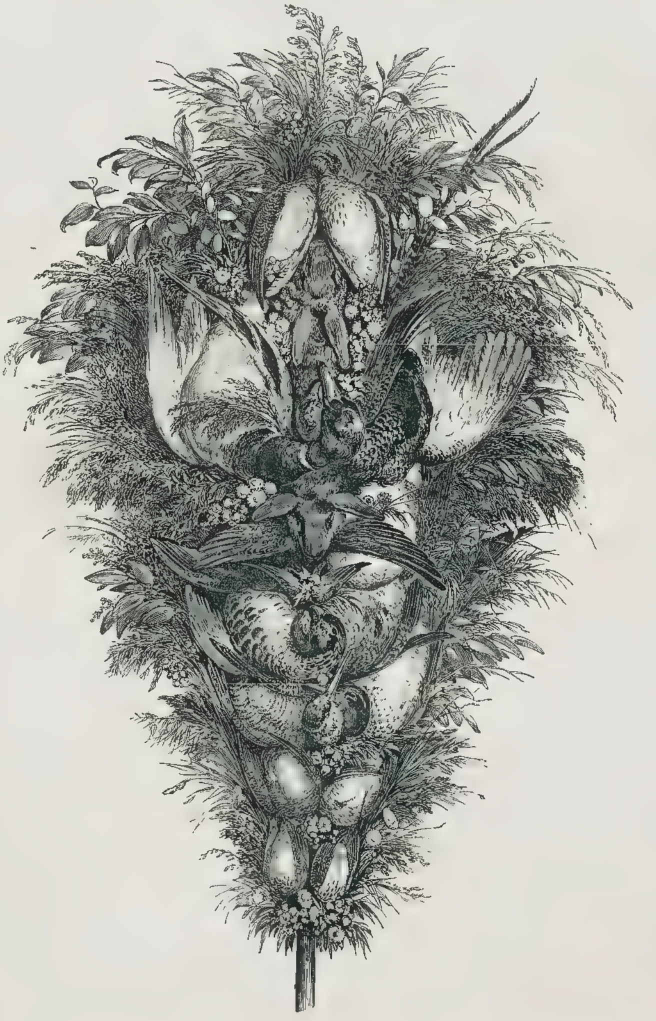
Not many days since, M. Soyer presented one of his Bouquets de Gibier to Viscount Melbourne, at Brocket Hall; when his Lordship admired the novelty exceedingly, as did also, the noble party on a visit at Brocket.

Another bouquet has been presented by M. Soyer to a lady of high fashion and beauty, if we may judge from the triplet which accompanied the offering:—

Madam,
Flora having forsaken her flowers,
I quickly embraced the sport of swift Diana
To dedicate and present this bouquet to Venus.

Count d'Orsay, the arbiter elegantiarum of our day, on the Bouquet being submitted to him, admired the artistical design, and suggested that Landseer would appreciate its novelty, adding:—"What a beautiful trophy it would make for a side-board or a dining-room!"

The Bouquet, we angur, will be popular in the approaching Christmas season; and, though there is a musty old proverb about "looking at a gift-horse," the above novelty will, surely, throw the old-fashioned baskets into the shade, by presenting much that is agreeable to the eye, with the proximate association of another sense of enjoyment.



BOUQUET OF GAME.

OPENING OF THE BURY AND IPSWICH RAILWAY.

By this new line of Railway, the two capitals of the county of Suffolk have been united; an event of such local importance and interest as to be celebrated with great enthusiasm, on Monday last. Such festivals, by the way, have an absorbing attraction; for, it is impossible to witness such a scene—the commemoration of so great a stride in inventive skill and high convenience without believing that countless benefits must be dated from this period; and, to borrow an after-dinner-speech phrase, that it presents "an important era in civilization."

The preparations for the event of Monday last were well arranged. At seventeen minutes before one o'clock, a train consisting of twenty carriages, including two elegant saloons, containing the Directors, Acting Engineer and Contractor, Secretary, and other officers of the Company, with between 300 and 400 persons, left the station at Ipswich, drawn by two engines, and proceeded on their way to Bury. The journey was made without the slightest adverse circumstance, and the reception of the train along the line was most enthusiastic.

At Bury, the Corporation had provided for a suitable reception of the welcome guests. The Mayor and Council had invited the inhabitants to join them in procession; and between one and two o'clock nearly all the body, with the maces and insignia of office, followed by a large number of the principal townsmen, proceeded, with a band of music, and flags flying, to the Station, and took their places on the temporary platform erected on the Ipswich side of the viaduct. (See the Engraving.) About half-past two, the signal whistle was heard, when a loud shout was raised by the thousands who, in spite of the unfavourable state of the weather, had assembled; and the strangers were most cordially cheered on alighting.

Earl Jermyn, member for the borough, was one of the first to meet the Chairman and Directors, who were accompanied by Mr. Bennet, M.P. for this division of the county, the Mayor of Ipswich (G. G Sampson, Esq), and the Recorder of Bury, with many of the principal people of Ipswich and the intervening places. The procession of the united towns passed up the Northgate street to the Angel Inn, where, after mutual congratulations, they separated to prepare for the entertainment provided by the Directors' liberality.

At half-past four, nearly 300 persons sat down to a sumptuous dinner at the Concert-room, with the choicest wines. The room was hung with banners—that behind the chair being inscribed "Success to Agriculture and Commerce—Ipswich and Bury Railway;" and that opposite, "Success to Cobbold and the Directors of the Ipswich and Bury Railway." The Royal arms, and those of the borough and the borough members, were displayed in other parts of the room. An excellent band in the gallery played appropriate airs during the evening, with vocal accompaniments à la Jullien.

The chair was taken by John Chevalier Cobbold, Esq., the Chairman of the Board of Directors supported on his right by the Mayor of Bury and the Recorder and on his left by Phillip Bennet, junior, Esq , M.P., and the Mayor of Ipswich. Colonel Barlow, the Deputy Chairman of the Board of Directors, officiated as Vice-President.

After dinner, the Chairman proposed the health of her Majesty, adding that the Queen was the greatest patroness of railways that ever lived; and he next remarked that his Royal Highness Prince Albert had followed the good example set him by our most gracious Queen in becoming a great railway traveller.

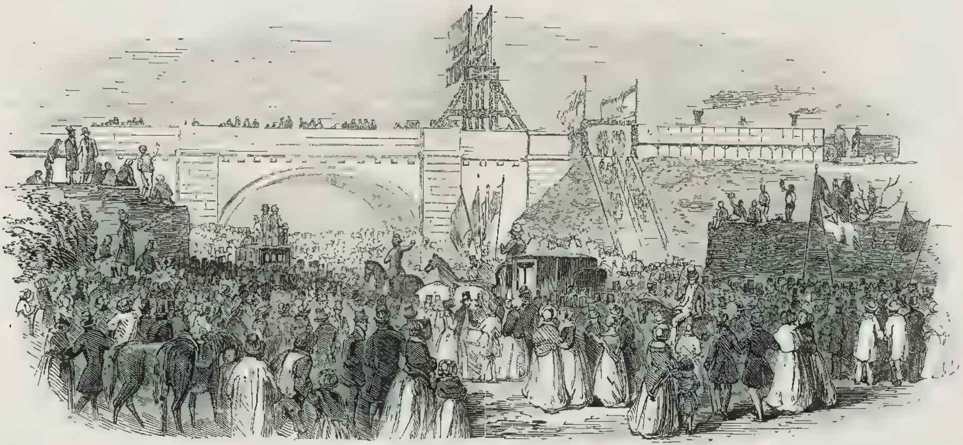
We have not space to enumerate the toasts, and can only notice a few points of the speeches. The Rev. T. Anderson, in replying to the toast of "The Lord Lieutenant and Magistracy of Suffolk," acknowledged that when this railroad was first projected, he for one anticipated it would be a fruitful source of crime; but he had been agreeably disappointed; and he must say that he did not think a similar number of men had ever been gathered together who had done less mischief than the operatives on this line. (Loud cheers.) He thought this fact was highly creditable both to them and also to their superiors.—(Cheers.)

Mr. Gurdon, the Recorder of Bury, in thanking the company for drinking "The Mayor, Aldermen, and Burgesses of that ancient borough," said: He was informed that, on that day week, when their railway was first opened for the carriage of merchandize, the waggons came laden with treasures—treasures from the coal-mines of the North. (Loud cheers.) He was told also that on that same day the price of that commodity fell in this town some ten or fifteen per cent. (Loud cheering)

The health of the worthy Chairman was drunk with enthusiasm, and after a variety of other toasts had been duly honoured, at a little after nine the Chairman and visitors retired, and about a quarter before ten they re-entered their carriages, amidst a display of fire-works from the musicians' carriage, and the band playing; and all reached home in safety before midnight.

In the course of the evening, Mr. Bruff, the resident engineer, stated that although the distance in point of mileage was but small, the difficulties of the line had been great. They had heard of a tunnel they would never get through, and of a bog they would never surmount; yet here they were at Bury within little short of a year. (Loud cheers.) In that time they had moved nearly two millions of cubic yards of earth, had built more than 100 bridges and culverts, many of formidable dimensions.

The line appears to have been opened for goods somewhat earlier than was expected; the line is expected to be opened for passengers on the 28th instant.



OPENING OF THE BURY AND IPSWICH RAILWAY.—THE BURY STATION.

THE ROYAL VISIT TO ARUNDEL CASTLE.

On Thursday afternoon, subsequent to the return of the Royal party from Petworth, they proceeded to a part of the grounds adjoining Arundel Castle, called the Small Park, where her Majesty and Prince Albert each planted a young oak tree, with all the ceremonial customary on such occasions. Two ornamental spades had been provided for the purpose, by the noble owner of the Castle; the embellished implements being designed by Mr. G. Morant, of New Bond-street, and manufactured by Messrs. Rodgers and Son, her Majesty's cutlers, of Sheffield. The blade of each spade is of highly polished steel; the handle is of fine old English walnut-tree, inlaid with holly, in the form of the Royal Crown, with branches of the oak and olive trees upon the front; and, on the reverse, "V.R." Both spades are of the same design, and are beautiful specimens of British manufacture.

The following characteristic anecdote of one of the illustrious visitors has been communicated to us on good authority

On Friday evening, at dinner, the Duke of Wellington was observed to be deeply absorbed in thought; when, in a sort of half tone, apparently soliloquising, his Grace was heard to remark: "I wonder how Waller managed to get into the town?" The veteran hero was overheard by the Rev. Mr. Hart, the Vicar of Arundel, who replied, "Round by Swanbourne Lake, your Grace." The Duke recovering himself, evidently surprised, replied hastily, "Thank you, thank you;" but then relapsed, evidently "fighting the battle o'er again" in his own mind. (The Duke referred to the sudden retaking of Arundel by Sir William Waller, from Lord Hopton, in the Civil War between Charles I. and his Parliament.)

Among the incidents of the Visit, we may mention the publication of a pair of correct lithographic views of the town and castle of Arundel, by Messrs. Mitchell.

MUSIC.

There have been divers Concerts during the week, but not one has presented any novelties requiring especial notice. At the Mechanics' Institution has been given the annual Concert, and another has taken place at the City Lecture Theatre in Milton-stree . Mr Wilson, at Crosby Hall, on Tuesday and Friday, has attracted the lovers of pure Scotch melody. The attendances at Allcroft's Promenade Concerts, at the Lyceum, have been deservedly great. They terminate on Tuesday night with the Director's benefit, who will deliver a Farewell Address. He has been spirited in his engagements, having secured the services of the Misses Williams, the clever Turner family, and the unrivalled Sax Horn players, the Distins, who had the honour to play before her Majesty at Arundel Castle, who was pleased to express her delight at their abilities. On Thursday night, there was a Concert at the Hanover-square Rooms, conducted by Mr. H B Richards, at which the leading native singers were engaged. Last night (Friday), Handel's "Messiah" was performed by the Sacred Harmonic Society, at Exeter Hall, with Madame Caradori Allan, Miss M B. Hawes, Mr. Manvers, and Mr Phillips, as principal vocalists. At Drury-lane Theatre, Balfe's Opera of "The Bondman," with Mr. Bunn's libretto, founded on the French drama of the "Chevalier de St. Georges," was to have been produced, but we must defer our notice until the ensuing week Miss Romer, Miss Rebecca Isaacs, Mrs. Hughes, Messrs. Harrison, Rafter, Weiss, Harley, S. Jones, &c., were included in the caste.

This evening (Saturday) will be the first meeting for the season of the Glee Club, established in 1787, held at the Crown and Anchor, Sir F. Booth, President. On Monday, Mr. J. Howe and Mr. F. Cuisset will give a concert at Crosby Hall; and the fourth Concert of the Society of British Musicians will take place at Erat's Rooms, in Berners-street. The Ethiopian Serenaders return for the season to St James's Theatre, on the off nights of the French plays; the first concert will be on Tuesday next. Loder's opera of "The Night Dancers" continues its triumphant career at the Princess' Theatre. Mdlle. Nau is to appear in January, and Mr. Maddox has accepted operas from two other English composers. Madame Bishop's engagement with Mr. Bunn terminates on the 23rd. On the 29th she sings at the Beaumont Institution, and on the 30th she leaves for Cheltenham and Gloucester, for four concerts. From that period up to April next Madame Bishop has not a day disengaged, having signed with various country professors, musical societies, and theatrical managers. Arrangements have been made for Madame Bishop to sing in entire operas, such as "The Maid of Artois," "Anna Bolena," "La Sonnambula," "Lucia," &c., at the Birmingham, Manchester, Liverpool, Dublin, and Edinburgh theatres, besides singing at concerts at Oxford, Cambridge, Brighton, Leamington, &c.

We learn from Paris that Berlioz's dramatic ode symphony, "La Damnation de Faust," has been produced with great success at the Opera Comique, at a Morning Concert, on Sunday last The declaimed recitatives were found heavy, but the choruses, particularly a religious one, and a Hungarian March, excited rapturous applause. The "Danse des Sylphes," a lovely air for the tenor, sung by Roger, and a trio between Mdlle. Duflot-Maillard, Herman Leon, and Roger, were also much admired. The work lasted three hours. There was a full rehearsal of Rossini's pasticcio, "Robert Bruce," on Monday last, at the Académie Royale de Musique, in Paris, and it was supposed that it would have been produced last night (Friday); but, as the part assigned to Ponchard, jun., had been given to M. Paulin, another delay was anticipated. Gardoni's affair is before the legal tribunals, M. Leon Pillet, in addition to the £2000 fine, demanding additional damages for the breach of contract. Mademoiselle Plunkett had quitted Paris for three months leave of absence at the Turin Theatre. On Monday night last, a benefit was given at the Theatre Italien, on behalf of the sufferers by the Loire inundation, Grisi and Mario singing in Rossini's "Stabat," and David's "Desert" symphony being executed. On Wednesday, at the Queen's desire, Donizetti's "Elisio" was given before the Court, with Madame Persiani, Mario, and Ronconi. It is reported in the Paris papers that Liszt has married a young Hungarian lady. The new opera by Mr Charles Eckhert, "William of Orange," was quite successful at Berlin, where Madame Viardot Garcia had created a great sensation in Norma, and a niece of the famous Madame Fodor, Signora Fodor, had made a successful début in Lucia. A scene of great disorder took place at Toulouse lately, in consequence of the refusal of an Alsacian soldier to allow himself to be disarmed by the mob, in the riot scene in "Masaniello." He resisted the attempt of the rioters most lustily, not understanding the explanations given to him, that there was no military disgrace in a theatrical defeat It was with great difficulty that he was removed from the stage. At the late musical Festival in Vienna, when Mendelssohn's "Paul" was performed, the forces were thus divided:–Sopranos, 220; altos, 160; tenors, 160; basses, 160. Band: First violins, 60; second ditto, 60; violas, 48; violoncelli, 41; double basses, 25; flutes, 12; hautboys, 12; clarionets, 12; bassoons, 12; contra fagotti, 2: horns, 12; trumpets, 8; trombones, ophicleides, &c., 12; drums, 4 pairs, solo singers, 4; directors of chorus, 2; conductor, 1. Total, 1,027. Mdlle. Mayer was the soprano; Mdlle Betty Burg, from Leipzig, the contralto; Lutz the tenor, and Staudigl the basso. A Concert was lately given in Vienna, the performers at which were entirely Englishmen, namely, Mr. Streather, the harpist, a pupil of Parish Alvars; a Mr. T Gregg, a basso, a pupil of Staudigl; and Mr Pratten, the flute player. M. Mortier de Fontaine, a Parisian pianist, had also given a Concert in Vienna. Mdme. Schuman, better known as Clara Wieck, the greatest of German pianistes, was daily expected in the Austrian capital; as also Litolff, the English pianist, who created such a sensation in Berlin last year; and Charles Mayer, the pianist, from St. Petersburgh. Beethoven's No 9 Choral Symphony was to open the first Viennese Philharmonic Concert. Yanza, Durst, Heisfler, and Schlesinger had begun their Quartet Concerts. The Mayseder quartet party played at Prince Czartoryski's. "Guttenberg," the new German opera, by Ferdinand Fuchs, the quartet writer, had been successfully produced at the An der Wien Theatre, thanks to the fine singing of Staudigl.

Her Majesty's New Year's Gifts to the Poor of Windsor. The overseers of Windsor have received a communication from the Hon. and Rev. C. L. Courtenay, domestic chaplain to the Queen, that her Majesty graciously intends to place in the hands of the parochial authorities of Windsor, the sum of £250, to be distributed amongst the needy and distressed parishioners, on New Year's Day, in meat, bread, coals and blankets.

Another Testimonial to Mr. Cobden.—Another testimonial is intended to be presented to Mr Cobden, in acknowledgment of his eminent services in the cause of Free-Trade. This tribute of respect will emanate from the numerous and respectable body of commercial travellers, representing most of the leading mercantile houses in London, Manchester, Liverpool, Birmingham, Bristol, Leeds, Nottingham, &c. The subscriptions, though not large, are expected to amount to a sum large enough to purchase a piece of plate worthy of Mr. Cobden's acceptance, and of being handed down as an heir-loom in his family.

LITERATURE.

Lucretia; or, the Children of Night. By the Author of "Rienzi," etc. 3 vols. Saunders and Otley.

We must now turn to the heroine of this powerfully written story, who, at the age of seven, startled her uncle, Sir Miles, by a temper so vehement, so self-willed and imperious, so obstinately bent upon attaining its object, so indifferently contemptuous of warning, reproof, coaxing, or punishment, that her governess gave her up in despair. The management of this unmanageable child interested Sir Miles, she won his affection, and there was much in her external gifts which justified the predilection of the haughty man:

"As a child she was beautiful, and, perhaps, from her very imperfections of temper, her beauty had that air of distinction which the love of command is apt to confer. If Sir Miles was with his friends when Lucretia swept into the room, he was pleased to hear them call her their little 'princess,' and pleased yet more at a certain dignified tranquillity with which she received their caresses or their toys, and which he regarded as the sign of a superior mind: nor was it long, indeed, before what we call a superior mind developed itself in the young Lucretia. All children are quick till they are set methodically to study: but Lucretia's quickness defied even that numbing ordeal, by which half of us are rendered dunces. Rapidity and precision in all the tasks set to her—in the comprehension of all the explanations given to her questions, evinced singular powers of readiness and reasoning. As she grew older, she became more reserved and thoughtful. Seeing but few children of her own age, and mixing intimately with none, her mind was debarred from the usual objects which distract the vivacity, the restless and wondrous observation of childhood"

From the time of Olivier Dalibard's establishment at Laughton, there was a visible change in Lucretia

"The irregular vehemence of her temper gradually subsided, and was replaced by an habitual self-command, which rendered the rare deviations from it more effective and imposing. Her pride changed its character wholly and permanently; no word, no look of scorn to the low-born and the poor escaped her. The masculine studies which her erudite tutor opened to a grasping and inquisitive mind, elevated her very errors above the petty distinctions of class. She imbibed earnestly what Dalibard assumed or felt the more dangerous pride of the fallen angel and set up the intellect as a deity. All belonging to the mere study of mind charmed and enchained her; but, active and practical in her very reveries, if she brooded, it was to scheme, to plot, to weave web and mesh, and to smile in haughty triumph at her own ingenuity and daring. The first lesson of mere worldly wisdom teaches us to command temper; it was worldly wisdom that made the once impetuous girl calm, tranquil, and serene."

We then see how the "Provençal," by taking more than common pains with his young pupil, plunged her mind amidst that profound corruption which belongs only to intellect cultivated in scorn of good, and in suppression of heart. He watched the age when the passions ripen; and he grasped at the fruit which his training sought to mature. Dalibard's aim was to encourage a dark desire for the forbidden: this, Lucretia, with the quickness of her sex, detected; she started not at the danger; but, "proud of her mastery over herself, she rather triumphed in luring on into weakness this master-intelligence, which had lighted up her own, to see her slave in her teacher—to despise or to pity him whom she had first contemplated with awe." She had now attained the age when woman is curious to know and to sound her power; she not only inflamed Dalibard's cupidity and ambition, but, strange to say, she touched his heart

We pass over a delightful interior scene, drawn in the author's best manner, full of nice detail, and characteristic colouring: it is too long for extract, so that we must be content with the common-sense of its introduction:

"We may now enter the drawing-room at Laughton, in which were already assembled several of the families residing in the more immediate neighbourhood, and who sociably dropped in to chat around the national tea-table, play a rubber at whist, or make up, by the help of two or three children and two or three grandpapas, a merry country dance. For, in that happy day, people were much more sociable than they are now, in the houses of our rural Thanes. Our country seats became bustling and animated after the Birthday; many even of the more important families resided, indeed, all the year round on their estates: the Continent was closed to us. The fastidious exclusiveness which comes from habitual residence in cities had not made that demarcation in castes and in talk, between neighbour and neighbour, which exists now. Our squires were less educated, less refined, but more hospitable and unassuming. In a word, there was what does not exist now, except in some districts remote from London, a rural society for those who sought it."

The full-length portrait of Lucretia, must not, however, be omitted:

"Lucretia Clavering was tall—tall beyond what is admitted to be tall in woman; but in her height there was nothing either awkward or masculine a figure more perfect never served for model to a sculptor. The dress at that day, unbecoming as we now deem it, was not to her at least, on the whole disadvantageous. The short waist gave greater sweep to her majestic length of limb, while the classic thinness of the drapery betrayed the exact proportion and the exquisite contour. The arms then were worn bare almost to the shoulder, and Lucretia's arms were not more faultless in shape than dazzling in their snowy colour the stately neck, the falling shoulders, the firm, slight, yet rounded bust—all would have charmed equally the artist and the sensualist. Fortunately, the sole defect of her form was not apparent at a distance; that defect was in the hand; it had not the usual faults of female youthfulness—the superfluity of flesh, the too rosy healthfulness of colour; on the contrary, it was small and thin; but it was, nevertheless, more the hand of a man than a woman; the shape had a man's nervous distinctness, the veins swelled like sinews, the joints of the fingers were marked and prominent. In that hand, it almost seemed as if the iron force of the character betrayed itself. Was her face handsome? was it repelling? Strange that in feature it had pretensions to the highest order of beauty, and yet, even that experienced connoisseur in female charms was almost puzzled what sentence to pronounce The hair, as was the fashion of the day, clustered in profuse curls over the forehead but could not conceal a slight line or wrinkle between the brows; and this line, rare in women at any age, rare even in men at hers, gave an expression at once of thought and sternness to the whole face. The eyebrows themselves were straight, and not strongly marked a shade or two perhaps too light, a fault still more apparent in the lashes; the eyes were large, full, and, though bright, astonishingly calm and deep, at least in ordinary moments; yet withal, they wanted the charm of that steadfast and open look, which goes at once to the heart, and invites its trust; their expression was rather vague and abstracted She usually looked aslant while she spoke, and this, which with some appears but shyness, in one so self-collected, had an air of falsehood. But when, at times, if earnest, and bent rather on examining those she addressed than guarding herself from penetration, she fixed those eyes upon you with sudden and direct scrutiny, the gaze impressed you powerfully, and haunted you with a strange spell. The eye itself was of a peculiar and displeasing colour—not blue, nor grey, nor black, nor hazel, but rather of that cat-like green, which is drowsy in the light, and vivid in the shade. The profile was purely Greek, and so seen, Lucretia's beauty seemed incontestable; but in front face, and still more when inclined between the two, all the features took a sharpness, that, however regular, had something chilling and severe; the mouth was small, but the lips were thin and pale, and had an expression of effort and contraction, which added to the distrust that her sidelong glance was calculated to inspire. The teeth were dazzlingly white, but sharp and thin, and the eye-teeth were much longer than the rest. The complexion was pale, but without much delicacy; the paleness seemed not natural to it, but rather that hue which study and late vigils give to men; so that she wanted the freshness and bloom of youth, and looked older than she was—an effect confirmed by an absence of roundness in the cheek, not noticeable in the profile, but rendering the front face somewhat harsh as well as sharp. In a word, the face and the figure were not in harmony; the figure prevented you from pronouncing her to be masculine—the face took from the figure the charm of feminacy. It was the head of the young Augustus upon the form of Agrippina One touch more, and we close a description, which already perhaps the reader may consider frivolously minute If you had placed before the mouth and lower part of the face a mask or bandage, the whole character of the upper face would have changed at once; the eye lost its glittering falseness, the brow its sinister contraction; you would at once have pronounced the face not only beautiful, but sweet and womanly. Take that bandage suddenly away, and the change would have startled you, and startled you the more, because you could detect no sufficient defect or disproportion in the lower part of the countenance to explain it. It was as if the mouth was the key to the whole. the key nothing without the text, the text uncomprehended without the key. Such, then, was Lucretia Clavering in outward appearance, at the age of twenty striking to the most careless eye—interesting and perplexing the student in that dark language, never yet deciphered—the human countenance"

Lucretia's passion for Mainwaring frustrates Sir Miles's hope of marrying her to her cousin Vernon, and thus mixing again the blood of their race. Then, the perplexity thickens by Dalibard discovering to Sir Miles the love of Mainwaring for Lucretia; the land-agent's son is dismissed; and Vernon's suit is pressed by Sir Miles, but deferred by his being put upon the ordeal of absence. Meanwhile Lucretia's correspondence with Mainwaring is kept up: the letters are hidden in an oak in the park, which Gabriel, at the instigation of Dalibard, discovers: he finds one of Lucretia's billets in the presence of Sir Miles, which the old Baronet secures, and his reading of it calls forth two most intensely written pages on this "Household Treason."

"He was long before he had courage to read the letter, though he little foreboded all the shock that it would give him. It was the first letter not destined to himself, of which he had ever broken the seal. Even that recollection made the honourable old man pause; but his duty was plain and evident, as head of the house, and guardian to his niece. Thrice he wiped his spectacles; still they were dim, still the tears would come. He rose tremblingly, walked to the window, and saw the stately deer grouped in the distance, saw the church spire, that rose above the burial-vault of his ancestors, and his heart sunk deeper and deeper, as he muttered, 'Vain pride! pride!' Then he crept to the door, and locked it, and at last, seating himself firmly, as a wounded man to some terrible operation, he read the letter. Heaven support thee, old man! thou hast to pass through the bitterest trial which honour and affection can undergo—household treason! When the wife lifts high the blushless front, and brazens out her guilt; when the child, with loud voice, throws off all control, and makes boast of disobedience, man revolts at the audacity; his spirit arms against his wrong; its face, at least, is bare; the blow, if sacrilegious, is direct. But, when mild words and soft kisses conceal the worst foe fate can arm—when amidst the confidence of the heart starts up the form of Perfidy—when out from the reptile swells the fiend in its terror—when the breast on which man leaned for comfort has taken counsel to deceive him—when he learns that, day after day, the life entwined with his own has been a lie and a stage-mime, he feels not the softness of grief, nor the absorption of rage; it is mightier than grief, and more withering than rage; it is a horror that appals. The heart does not bleed; the tears do not flow, as in woes to which humanity is commonly subjected; it is as if something out of the course of nature had taken place; something monstrous and out of all thought and forewarning, for the domestic traitor is a being apart from the orbit of criminals; the felon has no fear of his innocent children; with a price on his head, he lays it in safety on the bosom of his wife. In his home, the ablest man, the most subtle and suspecting, can be as much a dupe as the simplest. Were it not so as the rule, and the exceptions most rare, this world were the riot of a hell! And therefore it is that to the household perfidy, in all lands, in all ages, God's curse seems to cleave, and to God's curse men abandon it: he does not honour it by hate, still less will he lighten and share the guilt by descending to revenge. He turns aside with a sickness and loathing, and leaves Nature to purify from the earth the ghastly phenomenon she abhors."

The shock is too much for the aged Baronet to bear; he escapes from a home where the charm is broken—where Distrust looks askant from the Lares; he posts off to London, taking with him his dogs and his old valet. Meanwhile, Lucretia is at Southampton; an attorney, by desire of Sir Miles, requests her not to return to Laughton. The Baronet now revises his will, altogether altering the disposition of his property; he invites a party of his friends to a feast worthy of old; Sir Miles was the most jovial of all, and went to bed seemingly as steady and sober as if he had supped with Diogenes.

"The next morning, when the servant (who slept in the same room) awoke, to his surprise, the glare of a candle streamed on his eyes; he rubbed them: could he see right? Sir Miles was seated at the table—he must have got up, and lighted a candle to write—noiselessly, indeed. The servant looked and looked, and the stillness of Sir Miles awed him: he was seated on an arm chair, leaning back. As awe succeeded to suspicion, he sprang up, approached his master, took his hand; it was cold, and fell heavily from his clasp—Sir Miles must have been dead for hours. The pen lay on the ground, where it had dropped from his hand; the letter on the table was scarcely commenced; the words ran thus:—'Lucretia,—You will return no more to my house. You are free as if I were dead, but I shall be just. Would that I had been so to your mother—to your sister! But I am old now, as you say, and——'"

Lucretia is left with a portion of £10,000; her half-sister Susan has the same; and Laughton is demised to Vernon, on condition of his assuming the family name of St. John, with remainder, in case of failure of issue, first to the children of Susan Mivers, if any; and secondly to those of his once favourite niece, her half-sister Lucretia.

A few pages onward we find, as a relief to its somewhat gloomy precursor, the following cheerful sketch of metropolitan life:—

"November reigns in London. And 'reigns' seems scarcely a metaphysical expression as applied to the sullen, absolute sway, which that dreary month—(first in the dynasty of Winter)—spreads over the passive, dejected city. Elsewhere, in England, November is no such gloomy grim fellow as he is described Over the brown glebes and changed woods in the country, his face still looks contemplative and mild, and he has soft smiles, too, at times—lighting up his taxed vassals, the groves gleaming where the leaves still cling to the boughs—and reflected in dimples from the waves which still glide free from his chains. But as a conqueror, who makes his home in the capital, weighs down with hard policy the mutinous citizens, long ere his iron influence is felt in the province, so the first tyrant of Winter has only rigour and frowns for London. The very aspect of the wayfarers has the look of men newly enslaved; cloaked and muffled, they steal to and fro through the dismal fogs. Even the children creep timidly through the streets; the carriages go cautiously and hearse-like along, daylight is dim and obscure; the town is not filled, nor the brisk mirth of Christmas commenced, the unsocial shadows flit amidst the mist, like men on the eve of a fatal conspiracy. Each other month in London has its charms for the experienced. Even from August to October, when The Season lies dormant, and Fashion forbids her sons to be seen within hearing of Bow, the true lover of London finds pleasure still at hand if he search for her duly; the early walks through the parks and green Kensington Gardens, which now change their character of resort, and seem rural and country-like, but yet with more life than the country; for on the benches beneath the trees, and along the sward and up the malls, are living beings enough to interest the eye and divert the thoughts, if you are a guesser into character, and amateur of the human face; fresh nursery-maid and playful children, and the old shabby-genteel buttoned-up officer, musing on half-pay, as he sits alone in some alcove of Kenna, or leans pensive over the rail of the vacant ring; and early tradesman, or clerk from the suburban lodging, trudging to his brisk business, for business never ceases in London; then at noon, what delight, to escape to the banks at Putney or Richmond—the row up the river—the fishing-punt—the ease at your inn till dark!—or, if this tempt not, still, Autumn shines clear and calm over the roofs, where the smoke has a holiday; and how clean gleam the vistas through the tranquilised thoroughfares, and as you saunter along, you have all London to yourself, Andrew Selkirk, but with the mart of the world for your desert! And when October comes on, it has one characteristic of spring, life busily returns to the city; you see the shops bustling up, trade flowing back; as birds scent the April, so the children of commerce plume their wings, and prepare for the first slack returns of the season. But November! strange the taste, stout the lungs, grief-defying the heart, of the visitor who finds charms and joy in a London November."

[To be concluded next week.]

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

SIR CHARLES GOULD MORGAN, BART., OF TREDEGAR, COUNTY MONMOUTH.

This respected Baronet, one of the most influential and opulent in England, died at his seat, Tredegar Park, on the 5th inst., in the eighty-sixth year of his age. He was son of the late Right Hon. Sir Charles Gould, an eminent civilian, Judge Advocate and Judge Martial of the Forces, who married Jane, eldest daughter of Thomas Morgan, Esq., of Ruperra, county Glamorgan, and assumed, in conformity with the testamentary injunction of his brother in-law, John Morgan, Esq., the surname and arms of Morgan, of Tredegar.

Sir Charles married Mary Margaret, daughter of Captain George Stoney, R.N., and by her, who died 24th March, 1807, leaves surviving issue—1. Sir Charles Morgan Robinson Morgan, the present Baronet, and other children, of whom the eldest daughter, Maria Margaret, is wife of General Milman; and the second, Charlotte Georgiana, widow of George, third Lord Rodney.

The family of Morgan of Tredegar is of ancient Cambrian lineage. At a very early period, its immediate ancestor, Llewelyn ap Ivor, Lord of St. Clears, acquired the broad lands of Tredegar by marriage with Angharad, daughter and co-heir of Sir Morgan Meredith.

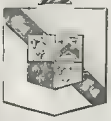
LADY EMMA PENNANT.

Her Ladyship, who died on the 2nd inst., at her residence, Queen's-park, Brighton, was fourth daughter of the late Earl of Cardigan. She was born 13th Sept., 1804; and married, 10th Oct., 1827, David Pennant, Esq. (only son and heir of David Pennant, Esq., of Downing and Bychton, county Flint), by whom, who died in 1835, her Ladyship leaves an only child, Louisa, heiress of the ancient family of Pennant, of Downing, married to Viscount Fielding, son of the Earl of Denbigh. Of Lady Emma Pennant's sisters, the second, Harriet Georgiana, was the late Countess Howe; the fourth, Mary, is wife of the Earl of Chichester; and the youngest, Anne, of the Earl of Lucan.

BISHOP SCOTT.

The Right Rev. Dr. Scott, Roman Catholic Bishop, died at his residence, Greenock, on the 4th inst. This excellent prelate was well-known in Glasgow, where he officiated for a lengthened period; and his death will, no doubt, cast a gloom over a large circle of friends and admirers, by whom he was esteemed for his unostentatious gentlemanly manners, and for the zeal he at all times manifested for the spiritual interests of those of his own persuasion.

WARNER OTTLEY, ESQ.



Died, on the 8th instant, at his town residence, in the seventy-second year of his age, Warner Ottley, Esq., of York-terrace, Regent's-park, and Stanwell House, Middlesex. At an early age, he commanded a company of Rangers in St. Vincent, West Indies, during the Carib Insurrection, and distinguished himself at the Storming of Dorsetshire Hill and the Vigil. During that period, two incidents occurred which may not be out of place in this memoir. A child of one of the Carib Chiefs had been made a prisoner by the company under the command of Mr. Ottley, upon being brought before him, he ordered it to be taken to his own tent, and showed it such attention, that when an opportunity presented itself for sending the child back, it could hardly be prevailed upon to leave him. On another occasion, a coloured servant of his brother proved the regard he had for him by placing himself before him when he perceived his life in imminent danger, and absolutely receiving a shot destined for his breast! The wound was, happily, not mortal.

For some years Mr. Ottley was a member of her Majesty's Council, in St. Vincent, and by his urbanity of manner enjoyed the regard and esteem of the island. In the relation of husband, father, brother, and friend, his kindness was pre-eminent, and he has left a family behind him, who will long and sincerely mourn his loss. He was a son of Richard Ottley, Esq., of Dunstan Park, in the County of Berks, by the eldest daughter of Sir William Young, Bart., of Dalaford Park, in the County of Bucks, and Governor of the Island of Dominique.

IRELAND.

LAMENTABLE CONDITION OF THE COUNTRY.

The accounts from the provinces are of the most lamentable nature, with respect to the general condition of Ireland.

A letter from the county of Tyrone says:—"Anything like the sale of fire-arms by the hardware merchants in Aughnacloy, and the different country towns about here, never was heard of in any country; and, almost without exception, the purchasers are of one persuasion. I saw one of the cases, which would contain about 100 stand, and examined some of its contents. They are Birmingham and London make. They are of quite good enough manufacture to do mischief, and range in price from £1 for single to £4 for double barrels. Pistols from 7s. 6d. a piece upwards. A Roman Catholic ironmonger, from a neighbouring town, is gone from home to bring £50 worth of arms, and a quantity of gunpowder. How will this end?"

A Clonmel paper thus refers to the state of the gun trade in Tipperary:—"No less than seventy-one guns were sold in our town the last fair day. This is bad work. The Government should look to it in time. They have had warning enough. A labourer entered our town a few days ago seeking for hire: he presented rather a formidable appearance; for, in addition to a spade and a flail, he had a handy gun strapped across his back. Every man has his gun."

The Repeal Association.—The speech of Mr. O'Connell at the Repeal Association on Monday excited considerable attention, from the fact that after all his abuse of the Young Ireland party, he now holds out the offer of reconciliation Mr. O'Connell began by deploring the extent of the present distress. He said he never felt so great a degree of responsibility as that which weighed him down at present. He did not think it was old age which had come over him—no, his mental anxiety for the state of his country. He then drew a melancholy picture of the state of the poor in the country—famine, pestilence, and death were raging amongst the people, and there was a most sullen state of discontent in the land. The people were procuring arms, they were buying them and seizing—buying arms and wanting food. On all sides the father was starving, the mother mourning, and the children wailing. Better far for that father to be in his grave—better far for the mother to be with her ancestors in the graveyard, and that the children were never born. (Sensation.) It was a horrible picture to look at—it was a frightful thing to think of. Oh! the man who could be unmoved at such a time, should have the heart of stone and a head of lead. In the meantime he had to announce with grief that Government had not the means of meeting the emergency—the dreadful distress that prevailed in all quarters. They unfortunately allowed themselves to be deceived by flatterers into the belief the failure of the potato crop was not general. It was now too late—and it would require three times the amount of food in the country to support the people. Mr. O'Connell's next topic had reference to the deplorable dissensions which had sprung up amongst the advocates of Repeal. Dissension had ever been the bane of Ireland. It was dissension that enabled the English to conquer the country. It was owing to dissension the yoke of England was not thrown off in the time of Elizabeth, when Tyrone took the lead of the people. He was not there to ask who caused the late divisions; all he should say was, he did not create them (Cheers.) He then read the first resolution passed at a recent Young Ireland meeting, which repudiated the charge of physical force, &c.; and said, although he had been well abused by the speakers, he would pass that over—he was not anxious to continue the quarrel—his anxiety was to heal the breach. (Loud and protracted cheering.) He would not ask who caused it; but he called upon every man to do his best to heal it. (Cheers.) He might be asked why he had not come forward before? His reply was that he could not do so as long as physical force was maintained as justifiable. They had disavowed the doctrine; and, although the Tory press might crow over him, and taunt him with defeat and submission, he felt he could afford to make this additional sacrifice of his feelings for the people of Ireland. (Cheers.) Let that party only give up that which was illegal, and he would heartily join with them. (Cheers.) He proposed there should be a private conference. (Cheers.) He (Mr. O'Connell) would name two gentlemen, not members of the association, to meet Mr Smith O'Brien, and himself, to discuss quietly the points of difference. Let him name Sir Coleman O'Loughlin, Mr. O'Hagan, Mr. O'Hea, Mr. Dillon, Mr. O'Connell, and Mr. Smith O'Brien. (Cheers.) One good would arise from this—they would know what they were quarrelling about. He concluded by moving that the foregoing committee be named to effect a reconciliation. (Cheers.) Mr. Steele seconded the proposition, which passed. The rent was announced to be £116 3s. 3d.

Serious Fire in King's County.—A very destructive fire has taken place at the splendid seat of Mr. Mangan, of Clonearl, King's County. All his beautiful and magnificent building, together with a vast deal of costly furniture, are now in ashes. The fire broke out in one of the sleeping-rooms, and it is not as yet known from what cause. Some attribute the disaster to the bursting of a chimney, and others to the negligence of a servant. The mansion was erected by the father of Mr. Mangan, at a cost of £80,000. It was insured.

More Deaths from Destitution.—The Cork Constitution has a melancholy addition to the long catalogue of deaths from starvation, the details of which have been published. The heading contains the dreadful fact—"Death of another unpaid labourer at Skibbereen." The name of the victim was Connor; he died the night of the 2nd inst., nine days' wages for labour performed on the public roads being due to him. The Galway Mercury thus reports two more cases:—"We regret to state, on the authority of Mr Nimmo, civil engineer, that two men, named Carter and Davin, of the village of Pullogh, have died this (last) week from starvation, having been unable to procure food or employment." From the county of Mayo, we learn that three men have died during the week of starvation, and several men, women, and children of diseases brought on by misery and destitution." The Sligo Champion says:—"The people are dying fast for want of food. In Geevagh a man named Waters expired on Wednesday (last week) from hunger In Ahamlish there were three deaths within the last few days from the same cause. The last victim was a person named James Gonnigle, of Derrilihan, parish of Ahamlish, and barony of Carberry. At the inquest, after an examination of five witnesses, the Jury pronounced the following verdict: 'That the said James Gonnigle came to his death from want of the common necessaries of life, accelerated, probably, by the cold of the night of the 28th ult., on which night the said James Gonnigle was returning from Sligo.' The wife of this victim of famine deposed that her husband did not eat one morsel on Saturday the 28th, nor on the 27th, but two spoonsful of Indian meal gruel, nor on the 26th, but boiled cabbage, without butter, gruel, or anything else but salt, and her answer to the Jury was, that they lived in that way for better than five weeks before, during which five weeks she got twelve stone of turnips from Lord Palmerston's herd, at one penny per stone."

Reported Disturbance in Kilkenny.—A reported outbreak in Kilkenny is thus noticed in the Freeman's Journal (a Dublin paper) of Tuesday:—"We have heard that private letters reached town yesterday, stating that an outbreak of rather a serious nature took place in Kilkenny city on Saturday. The accounts which reached us are rather vague, but, from what we could learn, it appears that a very large number of people collected in the town, and attacked some flour-mills and bakers' shops. The military were called out, and after charging the people with fixed bayonets, order was in some measure restored. The accounts state that the people were fired on from the mills and bakers' houses, but it is not reported that any person was killed. The military did not fire, but dispersed the people with the bayonet, without doing any injury. Mr. Carter, a gentleman connected with the Board of Works, escaped (by the fleetness of his horse) from an attack made on him by the people. The state of feeling in the town and districts about it is said to be very excited, in consequence of the occurrence alluded to."

Outrages by Armed Parties.—The Galway Mercury contains the following: "On the night of Saturday, the 28th ult., a party of armed ruffians visited the house of a respectable man named Davis, who resides at Lismore, three miles distant from this town, and demanded fire-arms. The old man of the house said that his son had the gun out in the field, where he was watching some of his property. One of the ruffians said, that, as they had come upon some other business besides that of providing fire-arms, they might 'kill two birds with one stone;' whereupon this 'redresser of wrongs' told his comrades that, as the son was out, they would pay the father with interest. On this, the ruffian, having clubbed his musket, struck the old man in the face with the stock of the gun, and literally made his nose as flat as the rest of his face. The old man dropped down almost lifeless; and his daughter, a mere child, having interfered to save her father, received a deep cut of a sword, which another of these villains carried, upon the head: she, too, fell over the body of her father. The ruffians then decamped. The old man is mending, but the girl is in a precarious state."

Another Frightful Murder.—An unprovoked and inhuman murder was perpetrated on Wednesday night (last week) at Loughorna, between Nenagh and Borrisokane, on the person of a poor man named Hanly, who, it appears, sold a pig that day in Borris, for the price of which, it would appear, his diabolical assailants attacked him. His house was entered soon after nightfall He had lodged the price of his pig in Borris; and the monsters, being defeated in their object, fell upon their defenceless victim, and literally beat his head to a jelly! The poor man resisted the robbers with all his might: he broke a spade-handle on the head of one of the villains, who was carried off, it is supposed, dead, in the arms of his comrades At the inquest, a verdict of "Wilful murder" was returned. Two men, of the names of Gaynor and Heffernan, have been arrested and lodged in gaol on the above charge.

Another Attempt to Murder.—Last Saturday afternoon, Mr. Hennessey, Overseer under the Board of Works, was fired at near the garrison town of Croom Castle, Limerick. Nine swan-drops were lodged in his body. Hopes are entertained for his recovery Mr. Leyne and the police from Ennis are on the alert to discover the perpetrators. The county of Limerick Magistrates' Meeting on Saturday agreed to increase the constabulary force at Croom.

Murder in Armagh.—A brutal murder has been committed in the county of Armagh, of which the following are the particulars:—Yesterday week was the fair day of Crossmaglen. About six o'clock in the evening a person named George M'Clean was returning home from the fair, and when about 100 perches from the town, he was beset and murdered by some persons who have not as yet been fully identified, although three individuals have been arrested, with blood on several parts of their clothes and hands. An inquest was held on the remains of the murdered man on Saturday, which was adjourned.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

Let me, to claim a few unvalued hours,
Point out the green lane, rough with fern and flowers;
The sheltered gate that opens to my field,
And the white frost thro' mingling elms revealed.
ROGERS.

It might seem invidious—it certainly would be ungracious, having given the Alpha and Omega of Stag-hunting—having offered our poor but honestly-intended notices of "the Royal" and "the Surrey," to have left altogether, without note or comment, the most sporting pack of hounds devoted to the chase of the hart and hind in what may be called, par excellence, the metropolitan country. It would, indeed, be a reproach to this, our sporting column, did it not afford a niche for Baron Rothschild's hounds, hunting, as they do, probably, the most perfect district for such woodcraft in the world, and put upon the scene with such appliances, and means to boot, as never fell to the lot of any similar sylvan establishment since the days of Nimrod—"the mighty hunter." Is there a spot of civilised earth—a clod, to which or to whom the name and fame of the Rothschild is unknown? Peradventure, there may be, in the character it will appear in here. Perhaps there may be many a respectable cloud-compeller of Frankfort many a goodly Burgomaster of Saardam, and eke of other amphibious marts, where the industrious and the well-to-do most congregate, ignorant of the fact that the millionaire Barons find time to cultivate Diana as well as Plutus. To such, as to all, it is fit the tale of their chivalry should be told

There is not in the wide world a valley so every-way adapted to the luxury and office of the Chase, as the Vale of Aylesbury. It is a hunting temple, intrinsically, and within fifty-five minutes of the stones! There, in a cottage ornée—in all the attributes of the sportsman's home unique—dwells, what time he takes his pleasure a-field, the Baron Meyer Rothschild—the country gentleman of the immortal threes. It is a passing rural sight, that glimpse of his lowly homestead, peering with its "white front through the mingling elms." It is situate in the village of Mentmore, some eight short miles from the Tring Station of the North Western Railway the fifty-five miles from Euston-square, as aforesaid. Had Frankfort never parted with those renowned brothers, what would, probably, have been the last thing they could have been induced to attempt, in the way of venture? To trust themselves on the backs of thorough-bred coursers, and execute forty minutes' best pace over a strongly-enclosed country, to the music of a pack of hounds. One can imagine your German taking to yachting: one can suppose him with a sort of a taste for looking at a race, or a polka, or a prize-fight; but one cannot conceive him cultivating pace under any combination of natural circumstances. But Providence sent the Baron Rothschild to the Vale of Aylesbury—and hence the virtue we sing in this refrain. At this fair, but tiny shieling, hight, Mentmore, are the kennels and stables of these spirited gentlemen. The establishment, without a shadow of pretension, is perfect in all its details. With the breed, seed, and generation of the pack, the reader need not be troubled. "A cry more tuneable," or more to a sportman's purpose, it would be hard to find. Twice a week, according to due notice in the journals, they take the field, with some three score of the right sort to bear them company—and do them honour. As a pleasure passage of woodcraft, their meet is not to be excelled. You are sure of sport, the society of gentlemen, and no fear of the Coroner before your eyes. It is not the custom to bid you "stand and deliver," as with the Surrey or "lie there and be hanged," as with "the Queen's." There all is really gentle and aristocratic; and to the rural Nimrod, who desires to see the metropolitan idea of a day's hunting, or the foreigner anxious for a sample of the British chase—we say in the spirit of emphatic counsel—"Go and see Baron Rothschild's Hounds."

TATTERSALL'S.

Monday.—The great feature of this afternoon's betting was the decline of Van Tromp to 8 to 1, and this on the face of an outlay exceeding £800: his enemies were numerous, and the tendency obviously downwards. A heavy stake—at the least £800—was also put on the Liberator, at an improved figure; and the odds quoted were also taken freely about Wanota. Planet rallied, Glentilt was backed at a slight improvement, and business generally was brisk and important.

THE MARKETS.

Corn Exchange (Friday).—The arrivals of English wheat for our market during the present week have been good, yet the show of samples of that article here to-day was by no means extensive On the whole the trade was firm, at fully Monday's quotations There was a good deal of in[illegible] for free foreign wheat sold for Irish account, at rather more money In corn under lock [illegible] to nothing was doing. The barley trade was steady, yet the maltsters purchased [illegible]. Although the supply of malt was not large, the trade was somewhat inactive, at previous currencies. Oats, beans, peas, and flour were mostly disposed of at unaltered quotations

Arrivals.—English [illegible]; barley, 7010, malt, 5370; oats, 4060. Flour, 2180 sacks. Irish: barley [illegible]. Foreign Wheat, ——; barley, 7380; oats, 10 010 quarters. Flour, 1320 barrels.

Town-made flour, 51s to 56s; Suffolk, 46s to 48s; Stockton and Yorkshire, 46s to 48s, per 280 lbs. Foreign.—Free wheat, —s to —s, Dantzig, red, 58s to 64s, ditto white, 64s to 68s per quarter. In Bond.—Barley, —s to —s; oats, new, —s to —s; ditto, feed, —s to —s; and peas, —s to —s per quarter. Flour, American, 34s to 36s; Baltic, —s to —s per barrel.

The Seed Market.—The demand for Linseed is somewhat active, at a trifling improvement in value In linseed and rape cakes a good business is doing, at our quotations. Seeds generally are a slow inquiry.

Linseed, English, sowing, 50s to 60s; Baltic, crushing, 44s 0d to 46s, Mediterranean and Odessa, 45s to 48s. Hempseed, 35s to 38s per quarter Coriander, 10s to 13s per cwt. Brown Mustard-seed, 9s to 10s, white ditto, 8s to 10s. Tares, 5s 6d to 8s per bushel. English Rapeseed, new, £25 to £26 per last of ten quarters. Linseed cakes, English, £13 5s to £13 10s; ditto, foreign, £8 10s to £10 10s per 1000, Rapeseed cakes, £5 0s to £6 0s per ton. Canary, 55s to 68s per quarter, English Clover-seed, red, —s to —s, extra, —s to —s; white, —s to —s, extra, up to —s. Foreign, red, —s to —s; extra, —s; white, —s to —s; extra, —s per cwt.

Bread. The prices of wheaten bread in the metropolis are from 8½d to 9d; of household ditto, 6½d to 8d per 4lb loaf.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 59s 7d; barley, 42s 11d; oats, 26s 7d; rye, 42s 5d; beans 45s 4d; peas, 48s 0d

The Six Weeks' Average.—Wheat, 60s 7d; barley, 43s 2d; oats, 26s 7d; rye, 42s 4d; beans, 46s 2d, peas, 49s 6d

Duties on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 4s 0d; barley, 2s 0d; oats, 1s 6d, rye, 2s 0d, beans, 2s 0d; peas, 2s 0d.

Provisions.—Prime Irish Butter is in steady request at extreme prices. In other kinds, a good business has been done at late rates. Carlow, landed, 94s to 98s Clonme 94s to 96s Cork, 90s to 94s; and Sligo, 80s to 84s per cwt. Dutch butter moves off steadily, at 100s to 104s for the best parcels, and 76s to 90s per cwt for inferior and middling qualities. English butter is dull, and rather lower Best Dorset, 100s to 104s; inferior and middling, 90s to 96s; Devon 88s to 91s per cwt and fresh, 10s to 13s per dozen lbs. Large parcels of Bacon have changed hands, at a rise of 1s per cwt; prime sizeable Waterford, 54s to 56s heavy, 52s to 54s; sizeable Limerick, 52s to 54s; and heavy, 50s to 53s per cwt. There is more doing for forward delivery. All other provisions are unaltered.

Tallow.—Although the arrivals have been heavy, prices of Y.C. are steady, at 47s 6d to 47s 9d on the spot. The nearest quotation for delivery is 47s 6d per cwt. Town tallow steady, at 49s 6d to 50s net cash.

Oils.—This market is dull, yet prices remain unaltered.

Hay and Straw.—Meadow hay, £3 5s to £4; clover ditto, £3 8s to £5; and straw, £1 10s to £1 14s per load. Trade dull at the above quotations.

Potatoes.—Although the supplies are on the increase the demand is steady, at from 110s to 180s per ton

Hops (Friday).—The sale for bags of the present year's growth has been very steady since our last report, at full prices, which are now nearly on a par with those paid for pockets, thereby proving that the produce this year is extremely even as to quality. Pockets move off slowly, yet previous rates are well supported:—Sussex pockets, 74s to 90s; Weald of Kent ditto, 80s to 9[illegible] Mid and East Kent ditto, 88s to [illegible] ditto bags, 80s to 100s; East Kent ditto, 84s to 120s per cwt.

Coals (Friday).—Adair's Main, 15s 6d; Chester Main, 16s 3d, New Tanfield, 15s 6d; Tanfield Moor, 17s 6d; Harton, 18s; Hetton, 20s; Lambton, 19s 9d; Stewart's, 20s; and Cassop, 19s 3d per ton

Smithfield (Friday).—The supply of beasts on sale here to-day was, the time of year considered, very limited, and of inferior quality. Prime Scots, &c., moved off steadily, at fully Monday's quotations, but all other breeds hung heavily on hand. There were in the market 93 beasts, 650 sheep, and 26 calves from abroad. Owing to the favourable change in the weather, a full average amount of business was transacted in sheep, at full prices. Prime small calves moved off freely, other kinds of veal slowly, at late rates. The pork trade was firm, but we can notice no improvement in value. Milch cows were held at from £16 to £18 each, including their small calf

Per 8lb. to sink the offals:—Coarse and inferior beasts 2s 6d to 2s 8d; second quality ditto, 2s 10d to 3s 2d; prime large oxen, 3s 4d to 3s 8d; prime Scots, &c., 3s 10d to 4s 4d, coarse and inferior sheep, 3s 8d to 3s 10d; second quality ditto, 4s 0d to 4s 4d, prime coarse-woolled ditto, 4s 6d to 4s 8d; prime South Down ditto 4s 10d to 5s 2d; large coarse calves, 3s 8d to 4s 2d; prime small ditto, 4s 4d to 4s 8d; large hogs 3s 8d to 4s 4d; neat small porkers, 4s 6d to 4s 8d. Suckling calves, 18s to 30s; and quarter old store pigs, 16s to 19s each. Beasts, 733, cows, 120; sheep, 2670; calves, 190, pigs, 260.

Newgate and Leadenhall (Friday).—We had a very steady trade this morning at full prices.

Per 8lb. by the carcase:—Inferior beef, 2s 6d to 2s 8d; middling ditto, 2s [illegible] prime large ditto 3s 2d to 3s 4d; prime small ditto, 3s 6d to 3s 8d; large pork, 3s 6d to 4s 2d, inferior mutton, 3s 6d to 3s 8d; middling ditto, 3s 10d to 4s 2d; prime ditto, 4s 4d to 4s 6d, veal 3s 6d to 4s 8d; small pork, 4s 2d to 4s 8d

ROBERT H[illegible]

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

There was a slight advance in the price of Consols on Monday, arising from the improved state of the Paris Money Market. According to the advices received on the morning of that day, quotations advanced to 95⅝ to ¾ for money, and 95¾ for account. These prices were not, however, maint[illegible] 95¼ ⅜, and 95⅜ ½. [illegible] of the Commissioner for the Reduction of the National Debt, until Thursday, on which day the books for the transfer of Consols closed. A slight reduction then occurred, and the closing price marked, after some fluctuations was, 95⅛ for the opening with dividend Exchequer Bills have been done as low as 7 to 11 premium, but improved a point towards the close of the week, quoting 9 to 12 premium. Bank Stock is firm at 260½. Reduced 94½. New Three-and-a-quarter per Cents 96. India Bonds 17 to 21 premium.

There has been a greater activity in the Foreign Market during the past week—Portuguese, Mexican, and Spanish having been most dealt in. The latter, after slightly advancing on Monday, left off at 26¼ for the Five per Cents.; Three per Cents., 37¾ for money and account, improving a point on Tuesday. On Wednesday a reaction took place, and the closing quotations are 26½ for the Five per Cents; Three per Cents, 37¾ Mexican, on Monday, was firm, at 22½ for money, and 22¾ for account; on Wedensday an advance of one per cent. was quoted, the Mexican Government having confirmed the late conversion, the strong probability of which was stated in the last number of the Illustrated News The last quotation is 23⅞ for account. Portuguese had materially improved, having been done on Monday at 40½ for money, again advancing on Tuesday. A reaction, however, occurred on the latter day, and the closing quotation was 40¼. A further decline has since occurred, and the price last stated is 38⅛ for money, and 38 for account. The memorial forwarded by the Committee of Bondholders with regard to the decima, or reduction of 20 per cent. from the dividends of the bondholders, not only remains unnoticed, but the deduction is announced to commence in January. Dutch continues firm, with an upward tendency; the Two-and-a-Half per Cents. closing at 60½; Four per Cents, 92¾; Ecuador Bonds, 3½; Granada, 19¾; Peruvian, 36; Russian, 111; Venezuela, 39½.

The Share Market shows signs of depression, and a general inclination to sell is the prevailing characteristic. Under these circumstances prices are necessarily weak, although the decline at present is not considerable. The state of the market on closing will be seen by the subjoined list:—Ambergate, Nottingham, Boston, and Eastern Junction, 2⅝; Birmingham and Dudley, 5¾ pm.; Birmingham and Oxford Junction, 8¾; Bristol and Exeter, 78; Ditto New, 7; Caledonian, 23½; Eastern Counties, 22⅞; Ditto New, 7⅜ pm.; Ditto, Perpetual, No. 2, ⅝ pm.; Ditto, York Extension, 3½; E, Lanc. FINE ARTS.

The Lily and the Rose. Drawn by Kenny Meadows. Engraved by Henry Robinson. Published by Hogarth, Haymarket.

Numerous as are the fond imaginings of the pencil of Kenny Meadows, which have, from time to time, appeared in our pages, we are persuaded that, for originality of design, novelty of treatment, and artistic character, "The Lily and the Rose" must take precedence.

The original is an exquisitely-engraved Print, measuring 13 inches by 7 inches. The design of the artist is to typify two flowers, "the Lily and the Rose," by two varieties of "Beauty's ensign." The Rose is characterised or personified by a coy maiden, who is tempting a pair of bees with the nectareous chalice of a flower; whilst an epicurean butterfly is settling on her blooming cheek, thus aiding the delicacy of the floral incarnation; which is a specimen of prodigal or gushing beauty — "nods, and becks, and wreathèd smiles"—such as poets and painters love to enshrine in their genius. The figure is in part concealed by a rose-bush, richly laden with large and beautiful flowers, a cluster of which is admirably relieved by the maiden's black hair. This portion of the design recals a beautiful illustration in olden poetry:—

Of all flowers methinks a rose is the best;
It is the emblem of a maid:
For when the west winds court her gently,
How modestly she blows, and paints the sun
With her chaste blushes! When the north comes near her,
Rude and impatient then like chastity
She locks her beauties in her bud again,
And leaves him to base briars.

ROWLEY.

The Lily, "the Queen of Flowers," is personified by a maiden of more intellectual expression than her companion—both equal but opposite beauties. The pensive cast of the features of the fairer sister is admirably contrasted with the playful air of the lower figure. The graceful form of the wreathed lily, too, is a most effective set-off to the contour of the fair form it encircles; and the bright flowers are relieved by the dark butterflies, or shine with winning lustre in the maiden's dark hair. The tint of the distance, too, is cleverly executed; and the group placed upon a delicately ruled ground, with the title-line, in letters of rich fancy, vignetted by a bright butterfly,—all combine to render this a most charming production, which will, ere long, grace the walls of many a drawing-room and boudoir. At this season of interchanging affections, the novelty before us is entitled to special notice. It is engraved in Mr. Robinson's best style; and the nice gradation of the several tints, the delicate finish of the features, and the effect of the lilies, bright as if produced by double printing, render this work a masterpiece of the engraver's skill.

The group reminds one of the pleasing lines of Cowper—the Goddess Flora loquitur:—

"Your's is," she said, "the nobler hue,
And your's the statelier mien;
And till a third surpasses you,
Let each be deemed a queen."

Thus sooth'd and reconcil'd, each seeks
The fairest British fair;
The seat of Empire is her cheeks,
They reign united there.

MUSICAL REVIEW.

The Illustrated Musical Almanack. Hurst.—Jullien's Album for 1847. Jullien.

We noticed the illustrative and poetical attractions of the Almanack in last week's publication; but an additional article, referring to the musical beauties, is but just, in consideration of the distinguished talents that have been called into action by this novel production. There are six songs, composed by Balfe, Wallace, Hatton, Crouch, A. Lee, and a composer who assumes the name of Florimel. There will be little difference of opinion as to the merits of these songs—they are all above the average, and possess more or less melodious inspiration; but the popular one will be Wallace's "Lay of May," a lovely air in four flats, six-eight time, with a charming accompaniment. Mr. Hatton's graceful melody, "I then will breathe my vow," is nicely constructed, and well phrased.

M. Jullien's musical annual contains 30 vocal and 14 instrumental pieces, by composers of every grade, native and foreign, including the names of Balfe, Barret, Hatton, Roch-Albert (Jullien), Verdi, Donizetti, Kœnig, Schira, Schulz, Rubini, Rossini, Duprez, Knight, Farmer, Hœlzel, &c., with poetry by F. W. N. Bayley, Fitzball, Albert Smith, Lake, D. Ryan, Linley, Hurrey, &c. The decorative portion of the Album is superb; there are two magnificent views of the interior of Covent Garden Theatre during the Bal Masqué, and during the Promenade Concerts. The portrait of Mdlle. Flora Fabbri, in the pas of "La Castigliona," is well executed, but it is not a likeness of the Italian danseuse. The covers, title and dedication pages, from the pencil of J. Brandard, Esq., are gorgeous.

Railway Meeting at Windsor.—A meeting was held at Windsor, on Monday, for the purpose of taking into consideration the competing schemes for a railway communication from that town to London, viâ the Windsor, Staines, Richmond, and South Western Line, and the railway to connect Windsor with the Great Western at Slough. The meeting was very fully attended, and great excitement appeared to prevail on the subject. Amongst those present were the Hon. Henry Ashley, M.P., the Hon. Captain Fitzmaurice, M.P., Col. Reid, M.P., Ralph Neville, Esq., M.P., Colonel Challoner, Sir Robert Sidney, Captain Bulkeley, W. G. Hayter, Esq., M.P., C. S. Voules, Esq., &c. &c. A resolution was moved by Mr J. Minton, in favour of the South Western scheme. He said he had the authority of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests to state that they had no objection to offer to that line. An amendment was moved by Captain Bulkeley to the effect that the connecting line from Windsor to the Great Western would best accommodate the inhabitants. He accused the Government of having been bribed by the South Western Railway Company to favour their scheme by offering to contribute money towards the projected improvements. After a very animated discussion, the amendment in favour of the Great Western communication was declared to have been carried, and petitions to Parliament in accordance with it were agreed to.

Agitation for the Repeal of the Malt Tax.—At the monthly meeting of the Central Society for the Protection of Agriculture and British Industry, held on Tuesday, at 17, Old Bond-street, the question of the repeal of the malt tax was brought under the notice of the committee, when a resolution was adopted that a meeting of that body should be summoned for the 12th of January next, to take the subject into consideration.

Produce from the Pacific.—The enterprise of British merchants is wonderfully developed at this period. Novelties pour into our ports almost daily from every quarter of the globe; and, to the catalogue of bricks from China and Kaffirs from the Cape, locusts from one region, and wonders from everywhere, we may add sugar, cotton, and wool, of excellent quality, from the remote Pacific. These articles, grown in the Sandwich Islands, have been forwarded from thence; and, as indications of the capabilities and resources of the islands of the Pacific, attracted considerable notice in the Underwriters' rooms, at Liverpool, where they were exhibited last week.

SIR EDWARD L. BULWER LYTTON, BART.

Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton, whose name is known, through his works, in every nation of Europe, is the youngest son of General Bulwer, of Heydon Hall, Norfolk. His mother was the daughter and heiress of H. W. Lytton, Esq., of Knebworth Park: on her death Sir Edward Bulwer succeeded to the property and name of Lytton. He was born in 1803. He lost his father early in life, and his education devolved on his mother: it was completed at home, under tutors, and not, as is often the case with persons of his rank in life, at a public school. At the usual age he went to Cambridge, where he gave an early proof of genius in a poem on "Sculpture," which gained a prize. He employed his vacations in travelling through England and Scotland, and afterwards France and the Continent: traces of the impressions then gathered may be found scattered through his works.

It was at Cambridge that he was introduced to the rich stores of German literature, which had not then been made so familiar to the public as they are now, by a friend who had long resided at Weimar. It was the writings of Goethe that principally interested him; but, at a later period, he seems to have been more completely won by the more kindly sympathies of the soul of Schiller whose minor poems he has translated.

Like many other young authors, his first published effort was a poetical one, "Weeds and Wild Flowers," which appeared in 1826. This was followed by "Falkland," a tale, published anonymously. It was in 1828 that he struck into that course in which he has distanced all competitors—the philosophical and imaginative Romance. In that year appeared "Pelham," a tale that, for its sketches of fashionable life, and its keen, smart satire, stands unrivalled. The darker portions of the tale do not so much predominate as in many of his later works. The list of works that followed "Pelham," proves that Sir Edward must have had great application and untiring energy; with much to lure him away from the toils of a literary life (in any form far from an easy one), he bent himself like a strong man to his task; it was long a fashion to suppose him a literary fop, from some personal peculiarities of dress and manner. But he must have had an iron will and increasing industry, or he could never have accomplished what he has done; he has ranged over the fields of History, Romance, Poetry, and the Drama, in the following works:—"Devereux," "The Disowned," "Paul Clifford," "Eugene Aram," "England and the English" (a clever dissection of English society), "The Last Days of Pompeii," "The Rise and Fall of Athens," "Cola Rienzi, the Last of the Tribunes," "The Pilgrims of the Rhine," "Leila, or the Siege of Granada," "Night and Morning," "Ernest Maltravers" (which was dedicated "to the great German people, a nation of thinkers and critics"), a continuation of the same work under the title of "Alice, or the Mysteries;" in "The Last of the Barons," he took a farewell of the public as a writer of fiction; but, like some other last appearances, it was not a final one; that we hope will be long deferred; "Lucretia, or The Children of Night," is his latest romance, from which we this week give extracts.

In addition to these works he has written four dramas—the "Duchess of Lavallière," "Richelieu," "The Lady of Lyons," and "Money." "The Lady of Lyons" will long keep possession of the stage: it is as great a favourite now as when it first appeared. The characters are few, the story interesting, and, as a piece of dramatic construction, the plot is one of the most perfect of modern plays. "Money" is still performed, but seldom: "Richelieu" only by Macready, or when some actor wishes to try one of Macready's parts. Between the publication of "The Last of the Barons" and "Lucretia," Sir Edward translated the minor poems of Schiller in Blackwood. They have been printed in a separate volume, with a biography of the German poet. Sir Edward has written many short poems, such as the songs of the Blind Girl, in the "Last Days of Pompeii." The idea is often striking, but he seems to want the "accomplishment of rhyme:" his verse does not flow freely. The defect will be perceived by any one who reads Byron, the greatest master of this "accomplishment" in our language. Besides these works, Sir Edward, at different periods, edited the Monthly Magazine and the Monthly Chronicle, for which he wrote the mystic tale of "Zanoni."

As a politician, though he sat in Parliament for many years, he never attained great distinction. His votes were always with the Liberal party. He assisted them on one occasion by an able pamphlet; and, as he was the heir of a large property and of a very ancient family, the Whigs made him a Baronet. But his greatest exertions in Parliament were connected with Literature. He was an able advocate of the Law of Dramatic Copyright.

As an orator, he lacked the readiness and power of impromptu reply so essential to a party leader: his speeches were those of a man in the habit of putting his thoughts on paper. He was often above or beyond his audience; yet, at times, he can adapt himself completely to the occasion. At a recent agricultural meeting, his address was the most practical of the day, though he was surrounded by country gentlemen and farmers.

To enter into an analysis of the writings of Sir Edward Lytton would be here impossible: we may briefly state, however, that he does not paint life as it is, and make us admire the fidelity of the pencil; nor does he take a period of history like Scott, and reproduce it, with dramatic effect; nor does he create character, and evolve it in all its peculiarities to a perfect individualism. We do not recall from his pages any person we seem to know intimately, like Parson Adams, or Toby Shandy, or even a Jeannie Deans. His fictions are the means of working out an end or purpose—some moral or social problem—and that purpose he never forgets; all the characters are managed with consummate skill to that one conclusion. The writer is perfect master of his machinery: he makes the persons speak, often speaking himself with them or through them, so that, in the midst of the story, the author himself cannot be wholly forgotten. But, the power with which you are carried along is irresistible: you may not like the road you are going, nor the company you are thrust among; but you cannot escape till the end of the journey is reached. The two chief characters in his last tale, "Lucretia," for instance, are hateful monsters, with whom there can be no sympathy; yet the power with which their career is described is extraordinary. It is the writer's skill that rivets you to the page, whose incidents, in a common hand, would be simply repulsive:—

And caught and struggling in that mental net,
His spirit seems to dare you to forget.

We have to acknowledge the courtesy of Count D'Orsay for permission to copy his excellent portrait of Sir E. Bulwer Lytton, in the annexed Engraving.

SIR E. BULWER LYTTON, BART.

Death of the Widow of Thomas Hood.—We are sorry to announce the death of the widow of the late Thomas Hood, the celebrated humorist and poet. The public are aware that Mr. Hood's life was closed in the midst of much physical suffering and much mental anxiety; and there is little doubt that the unwearied exertions of Mrs. Hood, her unceasing attendance on her husband's death-bed, and the grief and trial which preceded and followed her bereavement, have been the immediate causes of the disease which has thus prematurely terminated her existence. She expired on the morning of Friday, the 4th inst.

Extension of the Cheap Omnibus System.—The omnibuses at 2d. and 3d. each passenger, now running to and from Paddington and Hungerford-market, the Bank and Charing-cross, the Bank and Tottenham-court-road, &c., have been found so productive that it has been determined to extend the cheap travelling system; and accordingly omnibuses have begun to run between Paddington and the Bank, viâ New-road, City-road, &c., at the rate of 4d. each passenger for the whole distance, and 2d. to and from Tottenham-court-road.

LE JARDIN D'HIVER, AT PARIS.

This Illustration will be especially interesting to such of our readers as take peculiar interest in rural affairs, in which, by the way, our present Number is unusually fertile. Such is characteristic of the approach of Christmas; when the produce of broad acres is in the ascendant, and takes the lead of the ingenuity of those "in populous city pent."

The Jardin d'Hiver, which we now introduce to the reader, is an elegant specimen of what the Parisians have accomplished in the way of amusement for the people, who now seem to be the universal study. The Jardin (or Winter Garden) is a vast conservatory, tastefully laid out in walks, bordered with flowering exotics, that load the atmosphere with their delicious fragrance. In the centre of the Garden is a small fountain, around which are ferns and water-plants; from the roof of the building hang beautifully ornamented flower-pots, filled with rare plants; and at the extremity are refreshment rooms, well warmed with good fires, and furnished with luxuriant couches.

The Jardin is in the Champs d'Elysées, than which there could not be a more inviting location in Paris; and, in the dull, cold days of December and January this is the most fashionable promenade. The company is good, from the circumstance of a franc being the charge for admission; but, if the visitor buy plants or flowers to the amount of two francs, the admission-money is allowed in the purchase. Here you enjoy not only the choicest blossoms of the East, but the loveliest flowers of France. The admission-money is a franc well spent; for who would not, for this amount, enjoy, in the most inclement season, a walk through a lovely garden, sheltered from wind and rain, feasting his eyes not only on beautiful flowers, but the most lovely forms and faces in creation.

We have no public resort of this kind in London, if we except the Conservatories at the Pantheon and the Colosseum; the Botanic Society's Garden being an exclusive affair. Plants, it is true, figure at "Promenade Concerts," but soon become very sorry representatives of the kingdom of Flora.

THE WINTER GARDEN, (LE JARDIN D'HIVER.) AT PARIS.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

Death of Lieutenant-General Dickinson.—We have to record the decease of the oldest surviving general officer connected with the Royal Artillery—Lieutenant-General Richard Colleton Dickinson, who expired on the 5th instant, at his residence, near Notting Hill, at the advanced age of eighty-four, after a military service of sixty-five years.

Death of Colonel Swale, R.M.—We regret to announce the death of Colonel Swale, of the Royal Marines, which event took place at his residence at Southsea, on Saturday last.

The 31st Regiment.—On Monday the head-quarters of the gallant 31st Regiment, under the command of Major Staunton, debarked at Gravesend from the ship Madagascar. This distinguished corps was present at Moodkee, Ferozeshah, Buddewall, Aliwal, and Sobraon, with the division of Sir Harry Smith—in all of which battles it was hotly engaged, and suffered very severely; 28 officers and 530 men formed the list of casualties, the whole strength of the regiment before the battle of Moodkee having been 32 officers and 733 men. Four standards captured by the regiment from the Sikhs were landed amid the deafening acclamations of thousands of spectators, who lined the bank of the river, cheering with all their might and main the stern heroes of the Sutlej. One of these trophies was taken at Ferozeshah, one at Aliwal, and two at Sobraon. Among them was an Akahlee flag; and desperate must have been the combat before these devotees left their banner, which they are sworn to lose only with their lives. The colours of the corps, torn to shreds from the storm of grape-shot through which they were victoriously borne, and stained with the blood of the ensigns who were killed carrying them to the muzzles of the Sikh guns, which the regiment captured, formed objects of great interest to the assembled spectators. Colonel Spence, C.B., who commanded the 31st in all these actions, met them at Gravesend, and marched at their head to Chatham, where every one seemed to vie with another in doing all honour to these brave men. The 31st Regiment sailed for India in January, 1825, on board the ill-fated Kent East Indiaman. The only officers now with the regiment who were present at that lamentable catastrophe are Colonel Spence and Quartermaster Benison.

"THE SHANNON" IRISH STEAM-PACKET ON FIRE.

The Shannon steam-packet, Captain Moppett, belonging to the British and Irish Steam Packet Company, left the Thames on Wednesday morning (the 1st inst.) at nine o'clock, with passengers and goods for Southampton, Plymouth, Falmouth, and Dublin. After riding a tide on the Flats, she reached Southampton at six o'clock on Thursday morning, left at noon, and arrived at her moorings in Catwater, Plymouth, at half-past two on Saturday morning. Being a very thick, foggy night, the passengers remained in their berths; but at half-past five were alarmed by the sudden orders of Captain Moppett, who, observing smoke issuing through the cabin floor, rushed on deck, and ordered all hands to lie out and clear the main hold. There were upwards of 120 passengers on board, and many of them rushed to the sides of the vessel with such eagerness that two women fell into the water, and were with some difficulty rescued by a seaman passenger named Thirsty, lately paid off at Woolwich from her Majesty's steamer Avon. A foolish report, that there was gunpowder on board, operated so forcibly on the mind of an elderly gentleman named Bennett, that, although very ill, the crew were compelled, by his importunities, to convey him immediately on board the coal-hulk alongside.

At a quarter past six o'clock, the Shannon's moorings were cast off, and she was run ashore to the east of Mr. Hill's shipbuilding yard, Cattedown. At seven o'clock, she was scuttled; and about the same time, the flames first began to ascend from the hold but, shortly after this, the County and West of England engines arrived by land, and the engine belonging to her Majesty's Customs by water, in a barge, from which most effectual assistance was derived. At ten, the flames issued from the circular cabin window aft. About eleven o'clock, the Dockyard engine arrived, under the orders o Lieutenants J. B. Dixon and H. T. Veitch, with a party of blue jackets from her Majesty's ship Queen; and was shortly followed by the engine from the Plymouth Citadel, with a company of the 14th, headed by Colonel Barlow and Adjutant Blunden. The last and most powerful engine which assisted in extinguishing the fire was the floating engine attached to the ships in ordinary in Hamoaze. By this machine so large a volume of water was poured from the chief cabin into the main hold of the burning vessel, that in less than ten minutes all cause of present alarm ceased. The addition of these forces, in the course of two or three hours, effectually put down the fire. Very little of the effects carried into the after-cabins by the passengers was saved. The fore-cabin and deck passengers did not lose any of their luggage.

On the fall of the tide, the scuttle holes in the ship's sides were plugged and caulked, and the vessel made sufficiently tight, under the direction of Mr. Hill, ship-builder, to allow of her being hauled off from the beach.

Several beams between her engine-room and stern are destroyed, and her saloon is charred, broken and desolate. The fire seems to have commenced under the spiral cabin staircase.

Most of the cabin berths were occupied. A woman named Miner, who expected her confinement in January, became the mother of a boy on board the Shannon, prior to the ship's arrival at Southampton—an event for which she was totally unprepared. Her wants were, however, well supplied by other female passengers, and she is now with her friends in Plymouth. Her husband left her, with two other children, before the discovery of the fire on Saturday morning; but, fortunately, was not far from the ship when the alarm was given, and, returning immediately, conveyed his wife and children ashore.

The origin of the fire remains unknown. Some of the passengers affirm that it first smelt like burning cotton. The contents of the cargo are various, comprising bales and boxes of all descriptions, cotton, crape, shawls, silks, books, stationery clothing, hops, spirit, wine, &c. It is surmised that some of the cargo ignited spontaneously shortly after leaving Southampton on Friday, and continued smouldering until the ship's arrival in Catwater, on Saturday morning.

The conduct of Captain Moppett is greatly commended by the passengers: and on the discovery of the calamity, and during its continuance, he exhibited the retention of a cool deliberation and sound judgment in the time of danger.

Repeal of the Malt Tax.—On Wednesday, a public meeting of farmers and others interested in the repeal of the malt tax was held at the York Hotel, Blackfriars, Mr. William Lamb presiding. The chairman announced that communications from almost all the agricultural counties had been received, promising hearty co-operation in the cause. Mr. Cheetham, the chairman of the Rutlan Agricultural Association, assured the meeting that that body would be satisfied with nothing less than the removal of the whole duty. It appeared that since the last public meeting deputations had been sent throughout the country, and the gentlemen composing them were called upon to report progress. An appeal was made to the meeting, as to whether it would be politic to continue to send deputations throughout the country; whereupon it was unanimously resolved, that the most prompt and energetic measures should be had recourse to for the immediate and total repeal of the tax on malt, deputations being sent to all those neighbourhoods from which special invitations might be received. Mr. B. B. Cabbell, M.P., expressed his determination to support this measure in the House of Commons.

Death of Lord Stourton.—We have to record the demise of this nobleman, which took place on the 4th inst., at his seat in Yorkshire, aged 71. He was brother to Sir Edward Vavasour, Bart., and to the Hon. C. Langdale, late M.P.

CHESS.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

The Rector."—We have not got the Paper at hand to refer to. Correspondents would save us a good deal of trouble if they would write out the positions they wish solutions of

"D. T." and "Senior"—Cases for binding the Numbers of Vol. VII. of the "Chess-Player's Chronicle" may be obtained, we dare say, of the publisher, Mr. Hurst. Vol V., which contains the Games of the great match between Mr. Staunton and Mr. St. Amant, is almost out of print: apply to Mr. Hastings, Publisher, Carey-street

"Islington Literary and Scientific Institution."—A Correspondent at Islington asks how it happens that, while Chess forms a prominent feature among the studies and amusements of nearly every other similar institution in the kingdom, the subscribers to this are weak enough to permit a minority of would-be authorities to exclude it from their rooms? It certainly is news to us, that, in the present day, the committee of any popular society devoted to literary and scientific purposes should object to the introduction of so attractive and entertaining a recreation as Chess playing: but, in such a case, the subscribers have surely the remedy in their own hands

"J. G. H."—Give up all idea of constructing problems till you have had two years' hard study of the best masters in this branch of Chess.

"J. W.," Hove.—The position you mention is by Bolton, and was published in an early Volume of the "Chess-Player's Chronicle" White: King at his B's 6th, Kt at K 6th, Kt at K Kt 6th, Ps at K R 3rd and K 3rd. Black: King at his R's 4th. White mates in six moves. It is an extremely difficult Problem, and we leave it for the study of our readers until next week, when you shall have the solution.

"A Z"—It is by D'Orville, of Antwerp; but you quote it incorrectly. The pieces stand as follows:—White: K at Q B 5th. Ps at Q 3rd, Q B 2nd, Q Kt 2nd, and Q R 3rd. Black: K at Q R 4th, Ps at Q B 3rd, Q Kt 5th, and Q R 3rd. White to mate in six moves. This is a beautiful piece of Pawn play

"S. B."—The actual terms of Messrs Harrwitz and Horwitz's Match were that eleven games, in all should be played out to the end, the winner of the first six to be entitled to the stakes. Mr Harrwitz won the first six to his opponent's four; but they have subsequently played two more games to conclude the contest, and the final result was—

Harrwitz .... 6. Horwitz .... 5. Drawn .... 1.

"Check" must have the goodness to forward the solutions of his Problems before we can look at them

"Broomfield" Our solution of Enigma 69 would not be correct, if any move could be found to defeat it; and we hoped "Broomfield" would have seen that, whether the Rook or the Bishop interposed, mate was alike inevitable in two more moves If the Rook is interposed play your White Q to her B's 4th. and, whether Black takes or not, he must be mated next move. The weight of the Economic Chess-board we should think about three ounces. Write to the Publisher of the "Chess-Player's Chronicle."

"S. B."—Your first note subsequently came to hand, and the best of your three positions appears in this week's Chess Enigmas. The question in your second epistle requires consideration. We will give you our opinion next week.

"R. W.," Manchester.—We regret that we can afford you no further information. The numbers will, doubtless reach England shortly

"Gambit."—Your solution of the last problem is correct, but you have failed in the very clever one by Anderssen

"Sopracitta."—The solution of Enigma 76, by "W. H. C"—an original and beautiful little stratagem, by the way—is this: 1. R to K 6th; P one. 2. R to K 4th; P takes R. 3 P one, mate.

"E B. S."—Under the circumstances mentioned, mate must be effected within the fifty moves, or the game be drawn.

"G. H," Glasgow. See our solution of Problem 149.

"B. M. P" Your solutions and the accompanying observations are perfectly correct. With respect to Mr. Bolton's elaborate position of fifty-one moves, if you will kindly favour us with the name and date of the publication from whence it was extracted, we will endeavour to furnish you with a key.

"C. F.," Devonshire.—It shall be examined.

"W. R." See our answer above, to "Sopracitta."

"A Constant Reader."—Hoyle is no authority in Chess. In the case mentioned, you must adjust the pieces, and begin the game again.

"M C. A."—Under such circumstances, you can claim another Queen, or any other piece you choose.

" ? ." -Your having called "check" does not compel you to play the piece to any particular square, provided you have not quitted your hold of it. But, as you have taken up the piece, you must move it somewhere.

"Felix."—"D. D.," Trinity College, Cambridge.—The 7th Volume of the "Chess-Player's Chronicle" may now be had complete. Give your orders to any Bookseller

"S. W."—You may obtain any modern Chess work of Hastings, Carey-street, Lincoln's Inn.

"H. S."—In case of "Stalemate," the game is drawn.

Solutions by "G. A. H." and "R. H.," "Gambit," "G. H," "X.," Guernsey; "X," Brentwood; "C. F.," "Badmansir," "Florio," "E. S. T.," and "J. E. C," are correct. Those by "M. G.," "F. P. W.," "Simcoe," "J. N.," and "B. G," are wrong.

JULLIEN'S ALBUM FOR 1847

MAGNIFICENT CHRISTMAS PRESENT, OR NEW YEAR'S GIFT

M. JULLIEN has the honour to announce that his MUSICAL ANNUAL for 1847 is NOW PUBLISHED, and is by far the best work of the kind that has ever appeared It contains no less than Thirty Pieces of Vocal, and Fourteen of Instrumental Music, the greater part of which have never before been published, the copyrights having been purchased expressly for this work, at an immense cost, with the view of rendering it immeasurably superior to any of its predecessors

The portion which has already appeared comprises those Pieces only whose decided success has induced M. Jullien, at the request of numerous influential Patrons, to include them in this Selection.

The Illustrations, in addition to the elaborately-executed Covers, Title, and Dedication Page, include

TWO MAGNIFICENT VIEWS of the INTERIOR of COVENT-GARDEN THEATRE. The [illegible] taken [illegible] the [illegible] observed in that splendid arena on the occasion of M. Jullien's Grand Bal Masqué [illegible], a view of the Theatre taken during the Concerts the [illegible] the Figures in both views exhibiting the audience in a manner at once life-like and elegant. To those who have visited the audience on either occasion, the Album will form a delightful Souvenir, and to those who have not had the opportunity, it will convey an accurate idea of the gorgeous scene

A splendidly-coloured Portrait of the celebrated Danseuse, Mdlle. Flora Fabri, in the admired Pas, "La Castigliana."

An Original Subject, "The Fortune Teller," illustrating Baker's beautiful Ballad of that name

The whole of this department of the Album has been under the active superintendence of J. Brandard, Esq., whose pencil only has been employed in its production

Nothing more need be said in favour of the Musical department of this Album, and, in proof of its vast superiority over all others, than to call attention to the names of the Contributors, where will be found the principal talent in Europe, viz., Rossini, Verdi, Donizetti, Rubini Roch-Albert [illegible], Goldberg, Schira, Schulz Stoepel, Duprez Jose Gomis, Masurani, [illegible] Jullien, Hatton, Barret Alexander Lee, Koenig Knight, Baker, Farmer, [illegible] Mould, Hurry, Forest Desmond Ryan, Albert Smith, &c

It will thus be perceived that, in addition to the latest compositions of the best English Composers, the Album will contain some of the newest and most popular productions of Italy, Germany France Spain, &c., a careful selection of which has been made from those works that are now attracting the attention of the Continental dilettanti.

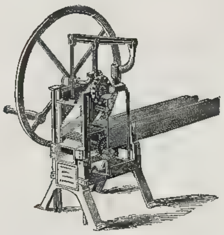
"GENTLEMEN—I now enclose my five pound subscription and shall feel very grateful for [illegible] British College of Health, New road, London. SOPHIA GREY."

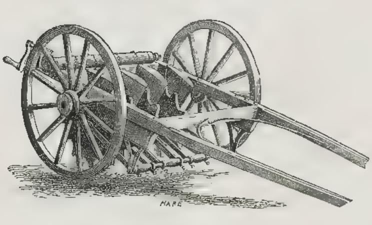
Lady Grey was cured, in 1834, of a complication of disorders by MORISON'S PILLS, after thirty years' suffering under doctor's treatment, since which period her Ladyship, to her immortal praise be it said, supplies, at her own expense, the deserving poor with the Vegetable Universal Medicine. N.B.—No Chemists or Druggists are allowed to sell MORISON'S PILLS.

AGRICULTURAL IMPLEMENTS AT THE SMITHFIELD CLUB CATTLE SHOW.

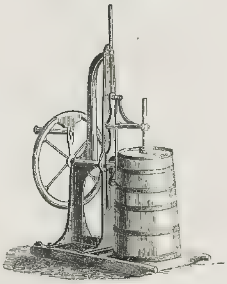
The following Implements (with two exceptions) were exhibited at the Cattle Show.



GILLETT'S CHAFF CUTTER.



HORSE DIBBLING MACHINE.



RICHMOND'S VERTICAL DASH CHURN.

GILLETT'S IMPROVED CHAFF CUTTER.

This machine differs from all others in the application of the knife, which moves vertically up and down, has two edges, and cuts both ways. The feed is regulated in the usual manner, and is at rest during the ascent and descent of the knife.

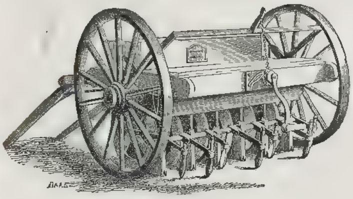
HORSE DIBBLING MACHINE.

BY BARRETT, EXALL, AND ANDREWES, READING.

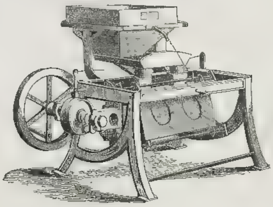
One of the advantages of this simple machine is, that it does not fail to deposit the proper quantity of seed at equal distances and at a given depth, by which a great saving of seed is effected; as it will, with certainty, plant two and not more than four grains, which it slightly presses into the ground. They may be made with any number of dibbling wheels. The Cut represents one with four only.

RICHMOND'S IMPROVED VERTICAL DASH CHURN;

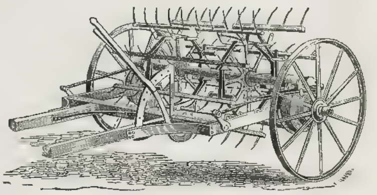
For which a prize has been awarded by the R.A.S.E. It is a simple and most efficient little implement, and highly prized in every dairy in which it has at present been introduced.



VINGO'S SEED DEPOSITOR.



FARMER'S MILL.



SMITH'S DOUBLE-ACTION HAY-MAKER.

VINGO'S PATENT SEED DEPOSITOR.

The merits of this really valuable and ingenious contrivance are not yet sufficiently understood. It combines the properties of the drill and dibbler, in a manner not attempted in any other machine. It obtained a prize of £10, at the Royal Agricultural Society's Meeting at Shrewsbury, although it was then in a comparatively imperfect state.

It can be constructed of any number of rows, with an adjustment for shifting the width of the same to any number of inches apart. It does not make holes as a dibbler, but forms grooves in the soil, by means of pressing-wheels; and, in the grooves or beds, the seed is deposited at intervals, as dibbling, or in a train, as drilling, by the action of slides with great accuracy, at any quantity to the acre.

The seed is seen to drop with great regularity in the grooves made in the soil and is covered effectually by hoes from behind. Any uniform depth is attained by the application of weight to the pressure-box, and the entire apparatus is readily raised out of the ground at headlands, or when turning.

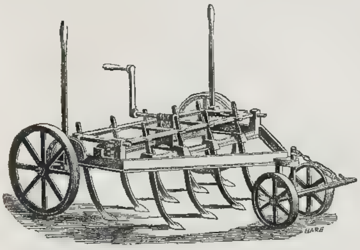
FARMER'S MILL.

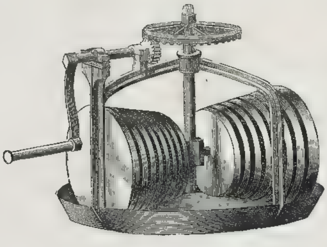
MANUFACTURED BY GARRETT AND SON.

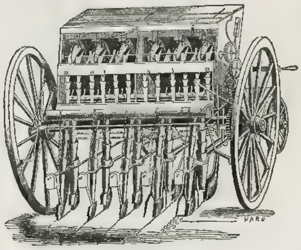
The peculiarity of this novel machine consists in the form and position of the stones—they are inclined parallelograms, at an angle of about 65°, the upper stone being shorter than the under one by the extent of its horizontal motion when at work. The perfect parallelism of the grinding surfaces, and their accurate adjustment to the various sized grain is most completely secured; whilst the motion being uniform over the whole area, no injury is sustained from the flour or meal becoming heated, as is the case with the circular stones.

SMITH AND CO.'S IMPROVED DOUBLE-ACTION HAY-MAKER.

This useful machine can be worked by one man, who has never occasion to leave his horse, as it can be instantaneously and with the greatest ease raised from or lowered to its work, and as quickly also, and as easily, it may be thrown in or out of gear, or the action of the teeth reversed, thus insuring great saving of time and labour, obviating the liability to injury and dilapidation, and saving the labourer from the peril to which even a careful and skilful man has been hitherto exposed in the management of this desirable implement, which obtained the prize of £5, at Newcastle, July, 1846; £5 5s. at the Great Yorkshire; and £5 5s. at the Derbyshire Meetings.







COLEMAN'S PATENT SUBSOIL HARROW.

This implement is constructed on an entirely new principle, having two frames parallel with each other, the upper frame being suspended about six inches above the lower, and is moved backwards and forwards by means of a worm and segment, by which the depth of penetration of the tines or prongs is regulated. This implement may be used as a scarifier, skim, or cultivator. There are nine prongs, to which blades, varying from two to nine inches may be affixed. The extreme width is seven feet.

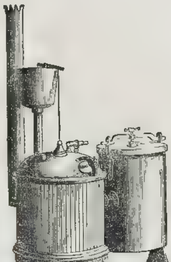
AINSLIE'S PATENT CLAY MILL.

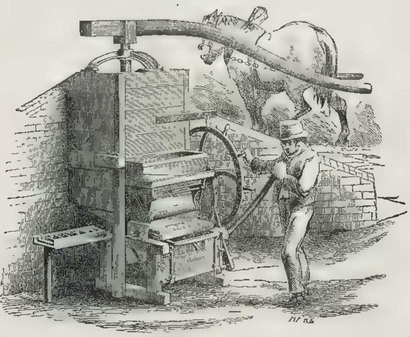
The purpose of this machine is to effect the grinding of clay for the manufacture of bricks and tiles in a more perfect manner than can be done by the common pug-mill—viz., by breaking the stones or other substances contained in the clay, instead of screening it. This is effected by a series of edge rollers, placed loose on cross-arms projecting from an upright shaft, and rolling round upon the bottom of an iron pan, coned six or more inches to the centre: to accommodate this inclined surface, the cluster of rollers is also conical, and this simple arrangement gives a varied velocity to the rollers, which is said to assist materially the grinding operation. The unground clay is placed in the centre of the pan, and, when ground, is delivered through openings at the base of the cone.

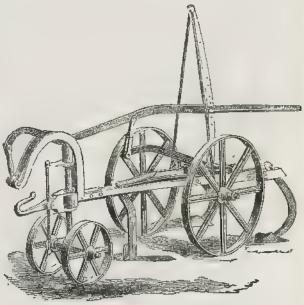
IMPROVED DRILL FOR GENERAL PURPOSES.

GARRETT AND SON, LEICESTER,

Have had three prizes awarded for this drill. It is for the purpose of depositing corn or seeds with compost, guano, or well-rotted farm yard manures, either in a moist or dry state, and at any proper intervals apart. The most recent improvements in its construction consist of a compound lever, whereby the manure and seeds may be buried at any depth below the surface, and separate from each other, with as much soil between them as may be considered necessary. The drill is so made, that, when the manure apparatus is not required for use, it may be entirely removed: leaving it a light and simple corn-drill, and adapted to the draught of two horses instead of three.







RICHMOND'S IMPROVED PORTABLE COOKING APPARATUS.

VICTORIA BRIDGE WORKS, SALFORD.

A compact arrangement for the culinary department of a farm. The boiler holds 60 gallons, and the fittings, or supply-cistern, safety-valve, water-gauge, pipe-laps, &c., are most complete. Attached is a 6-bushel wrought iron vegetable pan, so constructed that it may be turned over to empty without removing it from its place.

HALL'S BRICK-MAKING MACHINE.

F. RANSOME, IPSWICH, PATENTEE.

This machine consists of a pug-mill upon an improved construction, to which the moulding apparatus is so attached that the clay, after passing through the pug-mill, is forced immediately into a series of moulds prepared to receive it.

The bricks made by it are much sounder and better than those made by hand; and, with the power of one horse and two men, from 8 to 10,000 bricks can be produced per day.

SMITH AND CO.'S IMPROVED LEVER CULTIVATOR.

The entire frame, tires, and lever are of wrought iron: it can be used with three, five, seven, or nine tines at equal distances, and which are so arranged that they are not likely to clog up, and in an instant and with ease it is raised from its work or lowered into the earth to any required depth; it may also be worked with equal effect on sloping ground, or with one wheel in a furrow, the teeth penetrating the ground to an uniform depth, as on a level surface. This implement obtained a silver medal from the Royal Agricultural Society of England at Newcastle, 1846.

THE PENINSULAR MEDAL.

EVERY injustice in the world has an end, if men could but wait for it. The prayers of the wronged, that Homer represents as so slowly following the strides of oppression, though their pace be tardy and weak, yet they overtake the wronger at last; they awaken sympathy at every step; they excite indignation at every stage of the long pursuit; and the feeling becomes at last too strong even for power and authority to resist. The prayer is granted; and it is often so reasonable in its nature that men wonder it was not done long before. An instance of this has just been furnished: the veterans of the army that fought through the hardest campaigns in which England was ever engaged have received from Her Majesty that mark of honour, which, for thirty years, Ministries, the War Office, and, it is sad to have to say it, the Chief who led that army, and who owes to it all his greatness and fame, have hitherto coldly, and with singular obstinacy, denied. Constantly have the soldiers who fought through the whole of the Peninsular War claimed a medal as an honorary distinction, marking them out as the men who maintained the long and bloody struggle that preceded Waterloo. Only now is it given!

The immense political results of that battle gave it an importance beyond what it would have derived from its glory as a military achievement. It was the "last of fields," a "King-making victory." The power of Napoleon there sank for ever—at once exhausted from within his Empire, and overwhelmed from without. It gave safety to the Monarchs of Europe, who had begun again to tremble, lest the star of their Conqueror should once more be in the ascendant; and, as its last and greatest consequence, it gave peace to the world.

No wonder the gratitude was great in proportion to the benefit, and that no token of the feeling it was in the power of the nation to bestow was wanting. Medals, subscriptions, monuments, everything was showered on the victors of Waterloo. But the last blow that prostrates a giant is not necessarily the hardest; the last of a series of achievements is not always the greatest. The results sought for follow it because it is the last; but they are equally to be traced to the arduous exertions that preceded it. The final battle of the war, fierce and sanguinary as it was, had been preceded by many others, as bloody, as fierce, as hardly fought; but the badge of honour was given solely to those who took a share in the last great field, and withheld from those who, having fought through all the campaigns before it, did not happen to be in that one battle. They played through the whole tragedy, but were excluded from the acknowledgments of the audience, because, to use a technicality, they were not "on" in the last scene. No one ever disputed that the Waterloo Medal was well won, and justly bestowed; but it was felt that some similar tribute was due to those who fought their way from the rock of Lisbon to the gates of Paris; it was felt that in all the qualities of soldiership, the men of Vittoria, and Badajoz, and Albuera, and Talavera, and Salamanca, and many fields besides, had as strong a claim to an honourable acknowledgment of their services, as those who had received it for a short, but policically important, campaign. And, ever since that period, the refusal of a medal to the Army of the Peninsula has been a source of irritation and discontent; every year has added to it; a new generation grew up, and a more liberal distribution of such rewards was adopted. To the Army in India, medals and distinctions were given for single campaigns against enemies who, however brave, bore no comparison with the Legions of France, under such Generals as Soult and Junot. Nay, they were given for operations that produced no real advantage to the Empire politically, and were qualified, even as military successes; the campaign of Affghanistan is an instance. Still more lately we have had the campaign against the Sikhs, and the battles of Moodkee and Sobraon; they also have had their medal. Thus the oldest veterans of our army, who had seen the hardest service, in the longest war in which England was ever engaged, were gradually surrounded by younger men, who had not undergone a tithe of their labours, but who were all entitled to wear a decoration constantly refused to them. The number of years that have elapsed since the close of the Great War (all our others have been little ones), have left comparatively few of this gallant band; and, at last, as their generation was almost passing away, the boon they have so long asked is granted. Why, in the name of all that is just and generous, was it so long denied?

The answer must be sought in our military system; frigid, parsimonious, and severe, in all that regards the bulk of the Army—the subaltern without interest, and the private without even hope; but lax and corrupt where it comes in contact with high birth, or political connections, with all that makes "influence." The lion's share of the Peninsular honours had been appropriated; the officers of the highest ranks had secured crosses and clasps enough; and it was hardly the mere merits of the parties, or accident, that made them fall so constantly on names that of themselves suggest the idea of "interest." Rank may be openly purchased; a decoration cannot; those who got it merited it, no doubt; but all who merited it did not get it: and we fear the favoured ones did not very zealously assist their comrades of lower grade in urging their rights; men are wonderfully patient under the wrongs that do not press on themselves. Where they might have looked with most confidence for support, they were met with cold refusal and discouragement. The Duke of Wellington "never interfered in the distribution of honours;" it was for the Sovereign alone to do it. And we are proud to say that it is the Sovereign who has done it! It may be that the aged leader of that gallant host, touched by compunction, repents, though late, of his neglect, and has advised now an act of justice, which a word from him would at any time have secured; for in everything—in military matters, especially—"the Duke" was all powerful. But what has been refused so long, will not come from him now with that grace it would have worn twenty years ago; the country and the Army will rather believe he but obeys the commands of one of more exalted rank and more generous nature. To the few veterans who yet survive to wear the badge, its value is diminished by a generation of neglect and delay; they "are old, and cannot enjoy it." But it is something to see the old dead yoke of routine and official apathy broken, and justice done, though tardily. The kindness of the Sovereign to those whose claims rest on past services, will not be without effect on the present and the future.

FOREIGN CORN PORTS—ALEXANDRIA.

The exports of wheat, barley, and pulse, from Alexandria, have declined of late years in consequence of the superior encouragement given to the growth of cotton: from 50,000 to 60,000 quarters of linseed were exported from Alexandria in a single season, but the exports are now much less. The other exports are mostly rice, senna and other drugs and gums brought from the interior, indigo, opium, ostrich feathers, dates, soda, linen cloth, coffee from Arabia, &c.

The situation of the famous city of antiquity was admirably chosen; but, a century since, the modern city was little more than "a place for mere embarking" Under the vigorous government of Mehemet Ali, the commerce of Alexandria has latterly revived, and it has again become a place of much importance in the trading world; and many new warehouses and other buildings have been constructed.

The New or Asiatic Harbour is on the eastern side of the town: a rock, called the Diamond, lies a little to the east of the Pharos Tower; the water, immediately within the port, S.W. from the Pharos, is forty feet deep. Vast improvements are now in progress at Alexandria; and the old port might be made one of the most convenient in the world.

The purchases of grain at Alexandria for England have of late been very considerable. By a late arrival, the scarcity of British shipping in this port was stated to be very great; but the last received letters from Alexandria speak of considerable activity in business, in consequence of a reduction in the prices of several of the leading articles of trade. Purchases of grain continue to be made for England. Cotton was well supported, the chief shipments being directed to Trieste and Liverpool. Twenty-five vessels recently arrived there had been taken up at high rates for immediate dispatch.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

PARISIANA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Paris, Wednesday.

Our good Parisians are agitated by a thousand rumours; so much the more so, as the whole of the more affluent population is flying about the streets in search of novelties and purchases for the New Year's Day—an occasion upon which a Parisian bachelor pays off all the dinner and other invitations and favours he has received during the year, with a sacrifice of twenty per cent. of his revenue vested in baubles. The least incident sets the whole Bourse mad. On Thursday, the Duke de Cazes, the most fortunate of all parvenus, and the most active of all intriguers, was seen walking the streets of Paris with Rothschild. Immediately, the Exchange was filled with rumours of newly-devised speculations, and all the shares oscillated above and below in turn. At one hour of the day it is reported that Abd-el-Kader has sent in his humble submission to the Court—up go the stocks! but soon this is proved to be an unfounded invention, and it is asserted, on the contrary, that the Emir Emissaries are in France, ascertaining the misery of the country; and, indeed, there are not wanting knowing men to assert that the Emir himself is, or has been recently in Paris, in the suite of the Bey of Tunis. Hereupon, the stocks go down again! To see any Turk or Arab in Paris, will certainly astonish no one henceforward.

In spite of all mishaps and fears, however, pleasure still holds on its uninterrupted course; preparations are making on all sides for the great season of Paris that commences now but in January. The theatres put forward their utmost resources from the lethargic Académie de Musique, concentrating all its energies on the bringing out to morrow the new opera of Rossini, down to the minors who are passing in review in new farces specially written for the purpose, all the incidents, discoveries, manners and vagaries of society during the past year; just as you do in your pantomimes. One of these farces had nearly proved fatal to one of the actors. Leclerc, representing a living incarnation of fulminating cotton, and dressed in that substance from head to foot, whilst on the stage rubbed a lucifar match on his sleeve, which not only immediately ignited itself, but his whole person likewise, and it was with the utmost difficulty he was saved from being roasted as completely as a Christmas turkey, fortunately he was none the worse ultimately, and reappeared laughing; but the impression upon the audience was terrible at the moment.. The French nation have in their memories many terrible events of this kind, on the stage and elsewhere, so far back as Charles VI., who, thus accidentally burnt at a masquerade, grew mad, and yielded France for years to be the prey of every domestic and foreign enemy. The favourite wonder of the moment is the new theatre of Alexandre Dumas. Whilst that peripatetic gentleman, the Briareus of literature, who composes novels, plays, and feuilletons simultaneously with the 1,000 horse-power of a steam-engine, is travelling with headlong speed from Spain to Algiers, and from Algiers to Tunis, his theatre in the Boulevards is being completed, regardless of expense; which circumstance, by-the-by, as the Parisians never lose the opportunity of a pun, has given rise to the following. The edifice is officially called, in honour of A. Dumas's patron, Le Théâtre de Montpensier; but the jeering crowds give it a shorter name—Le Theâtre Dépensier (the expensive theatre). Certainly it is entitled to the name: as fast as the stucco has been placed on the walls, new invented machines are introduced, which, by heats, artificial draughts, and violent absorption, dessicate the moisture. Statues, painting, gilding, nothing is spared the Count de Monte Christo is here at home. But the dramatic wonders, we are told, are here to surpass those of architecture and statuary. The adherents of Dumas already speak in utmost contempt of all the olden classical establishments; one of the leading writers in his interests comparing them to mile-stones on the road-side, which show the way one should go, but never move an inch forward. However, we here look upon every theatre with favourable eye, not only as the most unceremonious and amusing resort of us who love our country passionately but hate our homes, but likewise that they are heavily taxed to support the charitable institutions of the country. During the last twelve months, the theatres of Paris have paid towards the support of the hospitals 1,046,000 francs: if each lessee had retained his share of the tax, they all would have had triumphant seasons. Amongst the theatrical events I have already alluded to in Paris, the most interesting still is that continued lawsuit of Mdlle. Aralde with the lessee of the Odéon, in which the latter has appealed against the award which condemned him to pay 50,000 francs for withdrawing her part in "Ponsard's Agnes de Meranie," But the liberation I formerly mentioned prematurely of Gardoni, resisted, but just decided by the Law Courts, from the Académie, on the condition of paying 57,000 francs, and the successful début of the handsome tenor at the Italian Opera, amidst the smiles and cheers of the fair dilettanti, is one of the favourite topics of Paris. The subject is accompanied with reports, both loud and deep, of scenes of fierce jealousy and huge artistical wrath, and of appeals to the King to prevent the transfuge from performing at Court. One of the objects of pilgrimage of the idlers is the residence of the defunct M. Robet. This gentleman, recently deceased at 84 years, was the oldest of the barristers of Paris, and, independent of other property, possessed a whole row of houses in the Rue de Clichy, a newly-built and fashionable quarter of Paris. But M. Robet, the Solitaire de la Rue de Clichy, had been deeply acquainted with the world, to his cost; and he proposed to himself for the sole object of his remaining life to imitate as much as possible a rat, except in its dishonesty—so that he let his houses remain uninhabited, except by the long-tailed quadrupeds; their walls black, their windows shattered—silent and unvisited as tombs, except when he flitted past on his way to that which he had selected for his residence, which he entered by crouching through a hole broken in the wall, and which he covered with planks. In a corner of his room he had amassed enough five-franc pieces to last his lifetime, and his only expense was his clothes, which he wore till they fell to pieces, and left him naked, like his worldly friends had once done; and his meals, which consisted of some fragments of food bought at the cook-shop. Thus he lived on, without society whatsoever, even without the sight of a fire on his hearth in the coldest winter; and so he would have died, unpitied and unknown, but that a wily wine-grower, M. de Freene, hearing of his whereabouts, came from the country, and made the hermit behold his young and beautiful daughter at the cook-shop. The sight of her re awakened in the hoary recluse "that touch of nature which makes all men kin." The father wrote letters interpreting the daughter's interest in the old man's fate, until the worthy limb of the law closed his thrifty life, and left the young lady his fortune. May the spirit of the deceased hover over this heiress when she chooses her husband amongst our fortune seekers!

THE UNITED STATES AND MEXICO.

The Great Western arrived at Liverpool last Saturday night, having left New York on the 17th ult. Our letters by that vessel contain some news of interest.

Among the more important intelligence just received from New York, is the news of the bombardment of Tobasco by the United States squadron. They left Anton Lizardo October 16th, and arrived at Frontera the 23rd, and captured two steamers, and several small schooners; on the 24th and 25th, they ascended the river seventy-two miles to Tobasco, towed by the Petrel and the Vixen. They passed the Devil's Turn at two P.M., landed, and spiked four 24-pounders. They arrived off Tobasco at six P.M., and anchored in line ahead, distant one hundred and fifty yards from the shore. The City was summoned to surrender. The Governor refused, when three shots were fired from the Vixen. Skirmishing immediately ensued. On Sunday no damage was done. The Americans captured one brig, three schooners, and a large sloop, in all. At the town and below, there were nine vessels and many boats captured On Monday, the 26th, at daylight, there began a sharp fire of musketry from the shore, which was returned by the squadron guns, and continued for some time, at intervals. A flag of truce came off, beseeching the enemy to spare the town, to which the Commodore assented. The prizes were got under way, and ready for returning. This action lasted thirty minutes, when Lieutenant C. W. Morris was despatched with orders, and he, passing the heavy fire of the enemy, was wounded in the neck by a musket-ball. He stood up in his boat, and cheered the men on gallantly, till he fell in the arms of Midshipman Cheever. The Commodore then commenced cannonading in good earnest from the Vixen, the Bonita, the Nonita, and the Forward; and in three quarters of an hour, he almost destroyed the City, sparing the houses of the Foreign Consuls. At midday, the fleet left, firing up the streets as they passed them. All the prizes were saved except one, which grounded, and was burned by the Commodore's orders, to prevent her falling into the hands of the enemy.

We present to our readers a plan of the River of Tobasco and its entrance, engraved from the American Sun. The City of San Juan Bautisto de Tobasco is twenty-four leagues from the Bar of Frontera. The City of Tobasco had no fortifications; they had two small 6-pounders of brass, one 12-pound carronade of iron, about 200 regular troops, and 500 militia, badly equipped. Six miles below the City is the Long Reach of Accachapas. At the head of the bend, there is a battery that has a three-mile straight reach, covered by three long 24-pounders and one long 12-pounder. This battery was taken by approaching it by a short cut from the Devil's Turn to the rear—a distance of about two miles through a thick, heavy wood. There is a bar at Accachapas, with only six feet of water in the channel at the low-water season, which requires a good pilot; in fact, the whole river is full of bars and shoals and snags. It is twenty-one leagues from the City to the mouth of the great River Usumacinto, which is navigable for over 400 miles. This river also communicates with the Ports of Laguna and Campeachy, by which route supplies are sent into Mexico. Mexico is also receiving large supplies vid Balize, Honduras, and Central America, which ports are seldom visited by any of our vessels of war to keep them in a state of neutrality. Frontera, which is the dépôt for logwood, is six miles from the bar. There are about 1500 inhabitants of all classes in Frontera, and there are generally about twenty-five to fifty regular troops stationed in the town, but they can muster at any time from 300 to 500 men and muskets. They had no cannon at this fort. Tobasco has a population of 6000 inhabitants. The stores and warehouses were principally owned by Spaniards.

The accounts from Mexico come down to the end of October. It was reported that Rejon, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, had resigned, and also that Pacheco, the Minister of Justice, had followed his example. It was said they would be succeeded by General Lefragno and General Ladron de Genevara, both of them formerly reputed to be inimical to Santa Anna. There had been an attempt made upon the life of General Salis, which was unsuccessful. It had called forth a severe denunciation from Santa Anna, who offers the support of his army to maintain General Salis in his position of Acting President.

Beaty's powder mills, eight miles from the city of Baltimore, exploded on the 3rd ult. Five men were blown to atoms. It is stated that no less than two tons of gunpowder were in the building, all of which exploded almost simultaneously. The concussion was tremendous. The whole surrounding country and city of Baltimore were violently shaken, as if by an earthquake. Furniture and earthen and china ware rattled in every dwelling.

The ex-President of the United States, Mr. John Quincy Adams, now in his eightieth year, has been attacked by paralysis, but is gradually recovering, and, so great is the remaining vigour of that once iron constitution, that his physicians entertain hopes of his speedy restoration. He was attacked in Boston, while on his way to Washington to take his seat in Congress, which meets on the 7th of December. His mind still retains its giant strength.

The New York Herald, of the 30th November, gives a telegraphic despatch from Washington, which states that Santa Anna had been compelled to refund the two millions of dollars which he had taken from a conducta.

The Acadia has since arrived, with intelligence five days later.

Tampico was quietly invested by the American squadron, under Commodore Connor, on the 14th ult. The fleet left Anton Lizardo on the 12th ult.; on the 14th, Commodore Perry crossed the bar, with the Spitfire, Vixen, Petrel, Bonetta, and Reefer, with reinforcements from the Cumberland, Mississippi, Princeton, and St. Mary's No opposition was offered, and the town surrendered unconditionally. Commodore Connor garrisoned the town, with a force of 150 sailors and marines. A small flotilla was placed at the entrance of the harbour, to guard any approach from the sea, and the steam-frigate Mississippi was despatched to Brazos and Belize, in order to obtain a force competent to insure the retention of the capture. The force was supplied with great promptitude, and on the 21st ult. the Mississippi set out for Tampico with a detachment of 50 men and guns and munitions of war, tendered for the use of the Supreme Government by the Governor of Louisiana. Further troops would follow.

The intelligence with regard to the war, with this exception, is unimportant. From the Army of Occupation at Monterey we have no further advices.

Accounts from California, vid Mazatlan, state that the occupation of the territory by the Americans was not peaceful; that insurrections had occurred at several points, and that the French Consul at the seaport of Monterey had been arrested for having protested against the American usurpations. An attempt of the boats of the United States sloop-of-war Cyane to seize a Mexican brig at Guaymas had been repelled. The Cyane, it is said, lost 20 men in the affair.

The canal navigation had almost entirely closed, and, in consequence, a slight advance in the price of breadstuffs took place.

The weather had been very stormy and severe.

From Canada we have papers to the 25th ult. It was anticipated that the break in the Welland Canal would be repaired in time to allow the vessels detained to pass down the canal.

FRANCE.

The communications with France have been much interrupted this week, in consequence of the snow. The mails have arrived very late every day. There is nothing of particular interest in the papers.

The French Government is said to have come to an important resolution with respect to Algiers. The principal military establishments of the colony are to be removed to the interior. The Governor and his Staff, and the whole of the military administration will henceforward be stationed at Medeah; the Governor of Oran at Mascarah; and the Governor of Constantina at some town in the interior not yet fixed.

The Presse announces in the following article, the departure from Paris of the Bey of Tunis, for his capital, his Excellency having, as we stated last week would probably be the case, countermanded his proposed visit to London:—"The presence of the Bey of Tunis at Paris appears to have seriously engaged the attention of Lord Palmerston, even in the midst of the anxiety occasioned by the marriage of the Duke de Montpensier and the affair of Cracow. England is extremely susceptible on every matter which regards the Mediterranean, and the Bey of Tunis, the neighbour of Algeria, and the ally of France, would have been seen with much satisfaction at the Court of Queen Victoria, where an exertion would have been made to remove him from the exclusive patronage of the French nation. But an obstacle presented itself. The Bey on his arrival in France was treated as a Sovereign Prince, but England, who had not yet recognised him in that quality, wished to consider him as a vassal of the Porte, and to admit him to a Royal audience only through the introduction of the Ottoman Ambassador. The Marquis of Normanby was consequently instructed to negotiate this grave affair with M. Raffo, the Bey's Minister, and he was further instructed to give that officer to understand that it was the interest of his master to conciliate Great Britain, and that hitherto the Bey had been equally animated by good feeling towards all nations, but that at present he appeared to change his policy, and to devote himself entirely to France, which moreover would be fully demonstrated if he did not consent to proceed to England on the conditions proposed. The Bey not having been convinced by these arguments that he ought to renounce the prerogatives of a Reigning Prince, M. Raffo communicated to the Marquis of Normanby the refusal expressed by his master. Lord Palmerston did not rest there; he sent a dispatch to Paris to be read to M. Raffo, stating that if the Bey proceeded to London he might be certain of being received with the utmost cordiality, but that the British Cabinet had duties to perform, and certain obligations, which would prevent the Ministers from admitting the Prince to approach the Queen otherwise than through the presentation of the Turkish Ambassador. The last application had no better success than the first, and the Bey persisted in his resolution."

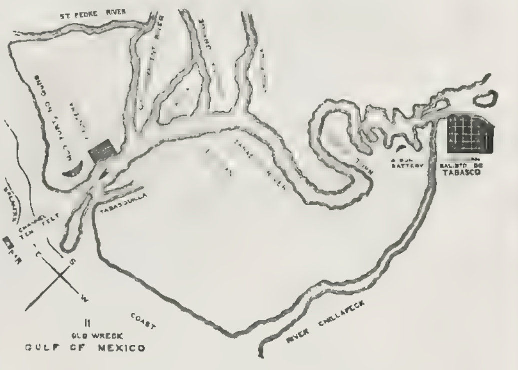
Public feeling in France is again excited by a rise in the price of corn. Letters from Havre state that a large portion of the American corn which arrived there on Saturday was brought up to be transmitted to the interior of the country at a rise of from 8 to 10 per cent. on the previous price of the article. The northern departments are said to suffer severely. The price of wheat rose last week in the markets of Lille, Montevilliers-Louviers, Luneville, Pourcain, and other places The Pas de Calais adds, that there are two millions of human beings in the northern departments of France who are destitute of the means of subsistence. The Government are actively occupied with endeavours to avert the threatened evil.

The French Consul at the Mauritius, M. Barbet de Jouy, has, on account of his unwarrantable letter to the English Admiral Dacres, been recalled by his Government. The circumstances are these:—Admiral Dacres was invited to a ball by the officers on the station. According to etiquette, a list of the guests was laid before him, and on the name of the French Consul meeting his eye, he observed that that gentleman had omitted to pay him his respects according to usage. Thereupon two officers waited upon the French Consul to withdraw the invitation, with a courteous explanation of the cause. The Consul, so far from apologising, wrote an insulting letter to the Admiral, which the latter enclosed to his Government. Lord Palmerston laid the case before the French Government, and M. Guizot has thought it right to recall M. Barbet de Jouy.

The municipal elections have commenced. The results as yet are favourable for the Ministry. M. Barbet, the friend of M. Thiers, and whose election will be treated as indicative of the political feelings of the electors, was at the head of the poll. The elections for the fourth, fifth, sixth, eighth, ninth, tenth, eleventh, and twelfth arrondissements had terminated in re-elections of the old officers.

A severe frost prevailed in Paris on Sunday and Monday. At midnight on Saturday the thermometer was 11 degrees below the freezing point of Fahrenheit. On Sunday, at noon, it was 13 degrees below it.

Immense flocks of aquatic fowls, coming from the north, passed over the French capital on Friday and Saturday—an indication, it was considered, of the approach of a severe season. During many years so much snow had not fallen in Franch so early in the winter as in the present; but it has not yet been attended or followed by intense cold.



TOBASCO RIVER AND CITY.

Some of the Paris papers last week reported the death of Prince Metternich. The report had no foundation, but letters from Vienna state that the Prince has suffered severely from bronchitis; although recovered, he is weak, but the worst symptoms are those arising from the effects of age.

SPAIN.

Our latest news from Spain does not comprise any of importance. Several days papers have been detained by the severity of the weather

The private advices from Madrid mention the arrival of Don Enrique in that capital on the 6th inst., accompanied by M. Vicente Gonzales Arnao, Secretary to the Spanish Embassy at Paris

Four of the six electoral districts into which Madrid is divided had on the 6th formed their board, in favour of the Progresista candidates. In the other two the Government had gained the advantage. The formation of the board is considered more or less a sign of the final result of the elections.

A rumour generally credited was current at Madrid on the afternoon of the 6th inst., to the effect that some of the Ministers had tendered their resignations.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

Death of Colonel Davies, late M.P. for Worcester.—Colonel Thomas Henry Hastings Davies, a distinguished Peninsular and Waterloo officer, died on the 11th inst. at Elernley Park, Worcestershire, aged 5[illegible]

Death of Lieut.-Col. Fountain Elwin, K.C.—This distinguished officer, whose name is familiar to many, from having been one of the commanders of the force sent to take Paris previous to its occupation by the Allied Forces, expired on the 8th instant, at his residence, at Peckham, aged 67.

Experiments at Woolwich Marshes.—Mr. Lancaster, junior, a day or two ago, made some experiments with the rifle-ball submitted by him in the form of a sugar-loaf. The experiments were made in the presence of Lieut. Colonel Dundas C.B., who appeared highly satisfied with the result. About forty rounds were fired; some at 1200 yards, some at 900 yards and 600 yards. The whole of the firing was very good; and, at 1200 yards, the balls entered the target to the depth of an inch. The first three rounds at 900 yards each entered the bull's eye, the aim being so correctly taken, and the form of the ball ensuring a correct course at that considerable distance for small arms.

Sudden Death in the Streets.—On Tuesday an inquest was held before Mr. Baker, at the Bell, in Petticoat-lane, Whitechapel, on the body of Jacob Mormon, aged seventy years, a sugar baker, in the employ of Messrs. Martineau and Co., in Whitechapel. On Sunday evening last the deceased was proceeding along Petticoat-lane, when he suddenly staggered, and fell to the ground. He was immediately raised from the ground by a City police constable, who discovered him in a state of insensibility. He was conveyed to the above house, but he expired before he reached there Verdict, "Natural death."

Deplorable Accident by Machinery.—On Monday last, as John Derrick, a workman in Mr Henderson's iron and tin-plate works, in Horsley-fields, Birmingham, was wheeling off a barrow loaded with iron faggots, the barrow swayed on one side, and threw him head foremost against a large pair of shears, worked, as is usual, by steam, and constantly going. He was thrown in such a position, that, to save his head from being crushed or cut off, he was compelled to thrust his hand and arm into the mouth of the shears; he did so; his hand and a part of his right arm were cut off two or three inches above the wrist. The poor sufferer is going on well.

Dexterous Robbery. On Tuesday morning, about eight o'clock, the following daring and extensive, as well as dexterous, robbery was committed at Messrs. Cox Savory and Co 's, the silversmiths and watchmakers, of Cornhill. It appears that the shopman, according to custom, opened the shop shortly before eight, and then, locking up the door, went to breakfast. It was during his absence a thief or thieves, who had evidently been watching his movements, contrived either to pick the lock, or enter the shop by means of a false key, and swept off trays containing no less than 149 gold and silver watches, of the value of nearly £1000. About the time in question, a cab was observed to drive away rapidly from the opposite side of the street; it is supposed that it conveyed away the plunder.

Fatal Accident on the Great Western Railway.—On Saturday last, Mr. G I. Mills held an inquest at the De Burgh Arms Tavern, opposite the West Drayton station of the Great Western Railway, on the body of Thomas Webber, a guard of one of the luggage trains, whose death occurred under the following circumstances:—The deceased was the head guard of one of the night luggage trains On the night of the Tuesday previous the deceased left the Paddington terminus with a train, to which two engines were attached, shortly after eleven o'clock, and reached the West Drayton station soon after midnight, where the train was stopped, and the deceased got down, in order to see what goods were going by the train. On his return to the train he gave the usual signal for starting, upon which the other two guards got up, but the deceased delayed doing so until the train had got on about a hundred yards, and was by that time at a speed of from eight to ten miles an hour. The deceased then laid hold of the handle of one of the trucks with the intention of mounting, but the handle slipped out of his hand, and he immediately fell, the wheels of the succeeding trucks passing over him, and amputating his right arm, tearing the scalp from off the right side of his head, and otherwise most seriously injuring him. Immediate attention was paid to the deceased, who was removed to the West Drayton station, and two surgeons were sent for, when his arm, which merely hung by a little bit of skin, was amputated. The deceased was at the time quite sensible, and begged the surgeons to leave him alone, his only desire being that he might have leave to get up and walk away. Deceased survived for sixteen hours. The Jury returned a verdict of "Accidental Death."

Attempt to Poison a Family at Wakefield.—At the York assizes, yesterday week, George Adamson, a youth of 16, was tried for having, on the 12th day of October last, administered white arsenic to Ann Bramah, Lydia Rachel Bramah, Thomas Bramah, and Alfred Bramah, with intent to murder them. The extraordinary particulars of this occurrence are as follow:—The prosecutor, Mr. Thomas Bramah, is a tailor living at Wakefield; and the prisoner was his apprentice, and had been so for six months. The prosecutor, on the 12th of October last, went to the Mechanics' Institute, to attend a lecture, leaving in the kitchen of his house, his wife, his son Thomas, his daughter, an infant eighteen months old, and the prisoner. After prosecutor had gone out, Lydia Rachel Bramah, the daughter, began to prepare some porridge for supper, and she went out to a grocer's shop to fetch some treacle. During her absence, Mrs Bramah went up stairs, leaving the prisoner in the kitchen. On the family sitting round the table to supper, the prisoner observed that a small plate would do for him, as he had been eating an apple. A small plate of porridge was accordingly given to him, and after he had partaken of a small portion, he retired to bed. The youngest child was the first of the family taken ill, but soon afterwards Mrs. Bramah, her son and her daughter were seized with a violent sickness. Mr. Dunn, surgeon, was sent for, who applied the stomach-pump to the family, and fortunately their lives were saved. On Mr. Dunn analysing the contents of the stomach, he detected white arsenic. Mr Dunn also examined the prisoner, whom he likewise found to be very ill. After Mrs. Bramah had partly recovered from the effects of the poison, she asked the prisoner what had induced him to commit such a diabolical act, when he said he supposed the devil had tempted him to do it. The Jury returned a verdict of "Guilty," but recommended him to mercy on account of his youth. Sentence of death was recorded against him.

EPITOME OF NEWS.—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

It appears by accounts from Smyrna, that 860 houses had been destroyed by fire at Salonica on the 17th ult., by which calamity 1500 families were reduced to indigence.

The German papers mention the death of Dr. List, who may be considered in a great measure as the parent of the Zollverein. It was he who in the first place put forward the idea of the German Customs Union, which he was enabled to render popular by his writings before it was brought into application.

Letters from Naples mention that the Government has at length issued its decree, reducing by 91½ grains per salm the export duty on oil by favoured flags (equal to about £1 per ton).

The Abbé Macpherson died at Rome lately, aged 88. He was for many years rector of the Scotch College on the Quirinal hill. Up to his death the Abbé had a liberal pension from the papal treasury.

Accounts to the close of September from Monte Video, received viâ America, state that an attempt had been made by a partisan of Oribe to assassinate Rivera. The attempt was unsuccessful. The assassin was secured, and was being tried.

The Mimer, a Swedish vessel, which arrived at Hull last week, had, as part of her cargo, a case of skulls, and they were passed by the Customs' authorities as "One case containing human skulls, being specimens illustrative of natural history; value £10." As "specimens" they are free of duty.

At the annual sale of Mr. Murray, at the Albion Hotel, last week, the number of books disposed of wholesale greatly exceeded any demand made for the last seven years. It is said that Messrs. Longman had an equally active demand on a recent occasion. These are symptoms of a returning prosperity to that channel of intelligence which has too long been in a declining state.

Letters from Constantinople of the 27th ult. announce that Tahir Pacha, Governor of Mossoul, had defeated the rebels of Kurdistan. The cholera had unfortunately made its appearance at Mossoul, but the mortality was not great.

The change of Ministry, which had been for some time expected in Baden has taken place. The Minister of the Interior is appointed President of the Council of State, and is replaced by M. Bekh.

Further accounts have been received from Turkey regarding the massacres of the Nestorian Christians. On the 27th of October, Bedi Khan, at the head of 12,000 men, penetrated into the district of the Jeln tribe. They fell like birds of prey upon the Nestorian villages; carried fire, sword, and desolation everywhere; murdered indiscriminately old men, women, and children; burnt their huts and cottages, and continued the butchery for several days, till not a spark of animation remained. According to the most authentic reports 67 Nestorian villages and towns have been laid waste, and from 6000 to 10,000 Nestorian Christians have been murdered. The tortures inflicted on those who resisted the invaders are barbarous and atrocious in the extreme. Hundreds have been impaled, and hundreds more have been burnt at slow fires. There were several cases of the unfortunate victims having been bedaubed with fat, and then baked in ovens?

The Directors of the South Eastern Railway are making preparations for the extension of the electric telegraph from Folkestone to Boulogne. They have already extended their wires round the Custom House at Folkestone, where it will form, by means of the sub-marine telegraph, a communication between London and Boulogne.

A pension of £100 a year has been offered by the Government to Father Mathew.

The Norwegian papers contain a series of statements touching the appearance of the "sea-serpent" in the larger fiords. The monster has been seen quite close, in different places and at several different times, by about 16 persons. The accounts agree in representing the creature as dark in colour, about 50 feet long, and of the circumference of a man's body. It is described as showing itself only in calm weather, and as then swimming with its head elevated, in vertical undulations of its body, like a leech.

Russia and Prussia have each appointed a Consul at Cracow, but none of the German Powers have followed these examples, notwithstanding the wishes expressed by Austria. Their declining to do so is regarded by a German journal as a tacit protest against the incorporation.

A decided novelty, as an export from this country, is that of the article of hay, which is now taking place to a considerable extent from London to Oran, a port in the French territory of Algeria.

The King of Denmark is countenancing the construction of railways, believing that they will exercise a beneficial influence upon the commerce of the country. In support of the first great undertaking of the kind, he has authorized the Minister of Finance to subscribe 1,687,500 marcs banco, or one-fourth of the expenses necessary for the construction of the line.

The Flemish papers announce great distress in the neighbourhood of Ghent. The high price of the raw material having obliged many of the leading manufacturers to close their establishments, a large number of persons were thrown out of employment, whose condition has been rendered more than usually deplorable by the inclemency of the weather and the scarcity of provisions.

It is understood that the Government has determined upon some important changes in reference to the transportation of convicts.

R. J. Eaton, Esq., M.P. for Cambridgeshire, whose death was erroneously stated to have taken place at Malta last month, has returned to London somewhat improved, though by no means convalescent.

There is now a regular supply of rabbits imported twice a week from Ostend, in which the poulterers of the metropolis are doing a brisk trade; the prices vary from 6½d. to 8d. per lb.; they are in general much larger but inferior in flavour to our rabbits.

On the 13th instant, upon the occasion of the birthday of the King of the Belgians, a grand concert was given at the Palace at Brussels, at which all the members of the Royal Family assembled. After the concert their Majesties returned to Lacken. Their Majesties have left Belgium for Paris, and will be absent about eight days.

Intelligence has been received at Vienna that M. Dembinski, chief of the insurgent Poles, who had disappeared after the defeat of the nobles of Gallicia, near Lissa, has been arrested at Cilly (Carniola). He had been concealed in Hungary, and, by means of a false passport, was travelling with a lady when arrested.

Letters from the Polish frontier state that the time in which the kingdom of Poland is to cease is approaching, and that it is no secret that Prince Paskewitsch has orders on the slightest revolutionary movement to fire on Warsaw from the Citadel, and utterly destroy it.

A letter from Berlin, dated December 9, says:—"The bankruptcy of the house of Schiller and Müller, which was made known yesterday, has excited a great sensation on 'Change. Their debts amount to 800,000 dollars, of which, as far as is yet known, 80,000 dollars fall upon a house in this city. The alarm is increased by the apprehension that the blow will not be the only one."

On Tuesday the line from Ipswich to Bury was inspected by Captain Coddington, the Government Inspector, who expressed himself satisfied with the line and its fitness for travelling upon with safety. It will be opened for conveyance of passengers on Monday next.

The Poor-law Commissioners have just issued a circular, calling on all Boards of Guardians to state what accommodation is provided for the casual poor; the time they are allowed to remain when admitted, and whether any limitation is placed on the number admitted.

A short time ago, two large lots of geese, in number 2400, from the neighbourhood of Boston, were on the road for an extensive dealer in poultry at Spalding. They have for some time back eaten upwards of 21 sacks of oats daily, in fatting for the London market. On Monday next (the first day of killing) the whole of the people connected with this trade at Spalding, will (agreeably to ancient custom) be regaled with a splendid dinner.

The Aix-la-Chapelle Gazette, of the 13th instant, has the following paragraph:—"Considerable sums have been placed at the disposal of Don Carlos's son; and the co-operation of England has been promised him, if he will give Spain institutions suited to the present times. The negociations as to that purpose are commenced. The French Government remonstrances, tending to prevent Don Carlos's son enlisting troops, have, hitherto, not only been without effect, but have been even very haughtily noticed. The Italian States evince the greatest ardour in promoting the views of the Legitimists."

Elihu Burritt, the American blacksmith, addressed a public meeting at Birmingham, on Tuesday, setting forth the advantages of fraternal alliance amongst all the nations of the world. Resolutions were passed condemnatory of the war system, and a memorial, embodying their spirit, was adopted to Lord John Russell. Mr. Sturge presided at the meeting, which was attended by about 4000 persons.

A young tailor, named Lebon, about 50 years ago, when just out of his apprenticeship, left his native town, Rodez, in the Aveyron (France), to court fortune in Paris. A yard measure, a pair of shears, and a few francs, were all the charms he carried with him to win the favours of the fickle goddess, except his natural taste and genius. Still, however, he won her smiles, and gradually gained renown and wealth. He uniformly retained affection for his native place, and showed it on all just occasions till his death, which happened a short time ago. On opening his will it was found to contain a legacy of 400,000f. to the commune of Rodez.

It is now stated that the Exeter and Crediton Railway will not be opened until March next, in consequence of the difficulty of forming a junction with the Bristol and Exeter Railway, at Cowley-bridge, arising from the fact that the bridge across the river at Pynes cannot be erected during the winter.

A Quebec paper mentions a diabolical attempt to fire a powder magazine at St. Pierre, Newfoundland, with the intention of destroying every house in the place. From thirty to forty houses are said to have been blown up, and two lives destroyed. The guilty villain fell a victim to his infernal designs

We learn from Florence that on the day on which a subscription was opened at the French Legation, for the sufferers from the inundations of the Loire, the Duke of Devonshire, who arrived in Florence only the preceding day, went personally to the Count de la Rochefoucault, and presented a rouleau of 30 Louis. This noble example was quickly followed by many of the resident English, some contributing 100f and some 200f.

In the course of Wednesday no less than 12 fires occurred in different parts of the metropolis, but no very great damage was sustained.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

ADMIRAL LORD AMELIUS BEAUCLERK, G.C.B., G.C.H.

This distinguished naval officer died, on the 10th instant, at his seat, Winchfield House, Hants, aged seventy-five. At the period of his decease he held the important office of principal naval aide-de-camp to the Queen, and was a Knight Grand Cross of the Orders of the Bath and of Hanover. His Lordship entered the navy in 1782; and, after passing through the intermediate grades, became Post Captain of the Nemesis (28) in 1793. Subsequently serving off the coast of Ireland, in the Dryad (44), he captured La Proserpine; and, in 1809, he participated in the Walcheren expedition. Lord Amelius Beauclerk was third son of Aubrey, fifth Duke of St. Albans, by Catherine his wife, daughter of William Earl of Bessborough, and grandson of Lord Vere Beauclerk, a celebrated naval commander, who, for his professional services, was created Baron Vere of Hanworth, in 1750.

LORD STOURTON.

William, seventeenth Lord Stourton, whose death, at the age of seventy, occurred on the 4th instant, was the representative of one of the oldest Catholic families in all England, whose pedigree can be traced to a period antecedent to the Conquest. At that memorable epoch, Botolph Stourton, an active adherent of Harold, gallantly disputed every inch of ground with the invader, and finally obtained from William his own terms. Having broken down the sea walls of the Severn, Botolph entered Glastonbury, when the victorious Norman had made his appearance in the West; and, thus protected, compelled the Conqueror to grant whatsoever he demanded. Sir John Stourton, the first Lord Stourton—a direct descendant of the patriotic soldier to whom we have just referred, acquired renown as a statesman and warrior in the reign of Henry VI.; and many of the subsequent inheritors of the coronet became distinguished in the political transactions of their times.

The nobleman whose decease we record was eldest son of Charles Philip, Lord Stourton, by Mary, his wife, daughter and coheir of Marmaduke, Lord Langdale, and grandson of William, fifteenth Lord, by Winifred, his wife, daughter and coheir of Philip Howard, Esq., of Buckenham, in Norfolk. Through his descent from this lady, who became eventually coheiress of her uncles, Thomas and Edward, eighth and ninth Dukes of Norfolk, his Lordship was one of the coheirs of the dormant Baronies of Howard, Mowbray, Braose, &c.

He married, in October, 1800, Catherine, daughter of Thomas Weld, Esq., of Lulworth Castle, Dorsetshire, and has left a very large family, the eldest son of which, Charles, present Lord Stourton, is married to Mary Lucy, daughter of Charles, seventh Lord Clifford. Of the deceased peer's brothers, the second assumed the surname of Vavasour, and is the present Baronet of Haslewood, while the third, Charles, who has changed his patronymic to Langdale, is well known as a leading member of the Catholic Aristocracy.

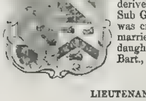
GENERAL SIR MARTIN HUNTER.

General Sir Martin Hunter, G.C.H., G.C.M.G., was the son and heir of Cuthbert Hunter, Esq., of Medomsley, in the County of Durham, by Anne, his wife, daughter of the Rev. Martin Nixon, Vicar of Haltwhistle. Martin Hunter entered the Army in 1771: his services, of indefatigable and brilliant repute, extended through the great American War; through the battles against Tippoo Saib, in the East Indies; and through the campaign under Sir Ralph Abercromby, in the West Indies, in 1798. Hunter was at the battles of Bunker's Hill, Brooklyn, and Brandywine; his service is also in honourable association with the siege of Connamore, the engagement near Seringapatam, and the capture of Trinidad. In 1800, he commanded the 48th Foot at the siege and surrender of Malta. He also held military command at Halifax, North America, and he was Governor of New Brunswick. He was afterwards made a General: in 1832, he was appointed Governor of Stirling Castle. General Hunter was, previous to his demise, the oldest officer in the British Army, and the last survivor of the leading heroes of Bunker's Hill. The gallant General married, in 1797, Jean, daughter and heiress of James Dickson, Esq., of Auton's Hill, in the County of Berwick, and has left a large family: his death occurred at Auton's Hill on the 9th instant.

COLONEL DAVIES, LATE M.P. FOR WORCESTER.

Colonel Thomas Henry Hastings Davies, of Elmley Park, who represented for so many years the city of Worcester in Parliament, on Whig principles, died on the 11th instant, in his fifty-eighth year. The gallant officer, whose ancestors were in very early times seated in Montgomeryshire, was eldest son of the late Thomas Davies, Esq., Advocate-General to the East India Company, by Anna, his wife, daughter of Hugh Baillie, Esq., of Monkton, in Ayrshire. He married, 17th Jan., 1824, Augusta Anne, only child of the late Thomas Crespigny, Esq., but has left no child. His surviving brothers are Warburton Davies Esq., of Woodgate, Sussex, and Lieut.-Col. Francis John Davies, of Danehurst, in the same county.

SIR JAMES SAMUEL LAKE, BART.



This Baronet, whose death took place on the 10th instant, was son and heir of the late Sir James Samuel William Lake, Bart., by Maria, his wife, daughter of Samuel Turner, Esq., and derived in direct descent from Sir Bibye Lake, Sub Governor of the African Company, who was created a Baronet in 1711. Sir James married, 1st May, 1833, Anna Maria, eldest daughter of Vice-Admiral Sir Richard King, Bart., and has left two sons.

LIEUTENANT-COLONEL MAHON.

On the 7th of December died another of the celebrités of that greatest of human events—the French Revolution—Lieutenant-Colonel Mahon, a Knight of the Legion of Honour, and Aide-de-Camp to Marshals Mortier and Lannes. The deceased warrior, who was descended from an Irish family, was born in 1772, of French parents, in France. He was but nineteen when he entered the career of arms just after the breaking out of the French Revolution. He was almost immediately promoted to the rank of Second Lieutenant of the First Battalion of the Loire; appointed on the 25th of January, 1792, Lieutenant in the 13th Regiment of Dragoons; he shortly, through his brilliant conduct, got to be a Captain on the Staff of the Army of the Rhine, and in this capacity made the campaigns of 1792.

Having retired during the reign of terror, he again entered the service in 1795, and was successively Aide-de-Camp to Marshal Lannes and to Marshal Mortier, at the battles of Ulm, Austerlitz, Saalfeld, Jena, Pultusk, Ostrolenka, Friedland, Saragossa, and Ocana. During this period he received the decoration of the Legion of Honour, for his courageous conduct in swimming across a river with his despatches and his sword between his teeth, under the fire of the Spanish lines, which had already brought down two of his comrades charged with a like mission. He was also present at the engagements of Sierra Morena, Campo Mayor, and Badajos; at the siege of the last place he was severely wounded by the bursting of a howitzer. He was the bearer from Marshal Lannes of the account to the Emperor of the fall of the fortress of Spandau, to which he had valiantly contributed.

After serving in the Russian campaign, he distinguished himself at the siege of Dantzig, where the efforts of 100,000 Russians and Prussians were resisted by 40,000 French. Reduced to 8000 by the horrors of that memorable siege, the remains of the garrison obtained a capitulation, which granted them their return to France, with all the honours of war. This capitulation was violated, and the heroic defenders of Dantzig were sent prisoners to Siberia. On the 2nd of January, 1814, after an exile of eight months, and enduring the greatest hardships, they were exchanged. M. Mahon returned to France in 1815, where he finished his career at the family estate of La Grillionire, at the age of seventy-four.

IRELAND.

THE REPEAL ASSOCIATION.

There was a large attendance at the Repeal Association on Monday, and Mr. O'Connell's speech excited considerable attention. Mr. O'Connell commenced by saying, that he deeply regretted to be obliged to announce that the state of the country was tenfold worse than it was that day week. (Hear, hear.) The frost had set in, and cold and hunger were doing their work, in fact, starvation was stalking through the land. In Connaught there were no less than forty-seven deaths from starvation within the week; not merely reports of deaths, but forty-seven cases in which coroners' juries returned verdicts of death from starvation. (Hear, hear.) This was a horrible state of things, and he hoped that they would soon be put an end to. The landlords had come forward to give relief at least to some extent; but the merchant classes, he regretted to say, were holding back. (Hear.) He (Mr. O'Connell) had seen no meeting of these men; however, he soon hoped to hear of one; and in the name of the forty-seven starved and murdered victims, he would implore of them, and the men of all classes, to come forward and render every assistance in their power to relieve the distress. Mr. O'Connell proceeded to refer to the disputes with the "Young Ireland" party, and said he had come there to effect a reconciliation, if possible, and if he could not do so he would, at least, show the world who it was that receded from the proposition. (Hear.) There was a great secret in political life, and that was to be honest and in the right; and he (Mr. O'Connell) was in the right, and, therefore, could afford to make an offer of conciliation. (Hear, hear.) He had been abused for doing so, and he was told that the Young Irelanders had a triumph. Now, on the contrary, he considered that it was he who had had a triumph; for the real question was, who would first come forward and act most kindly towards old Ireland? (Hear, hear.) He had made an offer of a conference to consider a legal question, but he had conceded nothing; all he wanted was to see if he could concede anything—for principle he would never concede (hear); and why, he would ask, had he gone so far? Because, as he said before, men in the right could afford to take such a step, while those in the wrong could not do so; he was in the right, and he was ready to concede a matter of form, if necessary, by enlarging or limiting the basis on which the Association was founded. (Hear, hear). He (Mr. O'Connell) was ready to do this; but he was not prepared to leave the cause of Ireland in the hands of men in whose discretion he had no confidence, and whose power to manage such a movement he totally denied. ("Hear, hear," and cheers.) What was the Young Ireland party after all, with the exception of Mr. William Smith O'Brien? They were the scribblers for a newspaper; in fact, the split with the Association was between it and the compositors' room of a newspaper. (Hear, hear.) The Repeal Association had set at defiance the Crown Lawyers, a partial Judge, and a packed Jury; and was it to be barked at by the yelpings from a compositors' room? (Cheers.) No; certainly not. His plan was simple. He had proposed a conference, not an arbitration—a discussion, and not a dissension. He proposed that the law of the case should be ascertained; and how was he met? Was it by a generous acceptance of his terms? He regretted to say he was not met as he ought. (Hear, hear.) He had proposed that himself, Mr. William Smith O'Brien, and four others (three of whom did not agree with him), should meet and settle the law of the case; but his proposition was not acquiesced in; on the contrary, they had passed resolutions quite foreign to the subject. (Hear, hear.) The learned gentleman then read a letter which he had received from the Rev. Dr. Miley, whom he had sent down to Limerick to Mr. O'Brien, to endeavour to induce him to join in the proposed conference. [The letter stated that the Rev. negotiator had totally failed in his attempts to induce Mr. O'Brien to accede to the proposition of a conference, except upon such terms as he (Mr. O'Brien) would prescribe, and which were in consonance with the views of the Nation.] Now, he (Mr. O'Connell) had done all in his power to effect a reconciliation; and it was not his fault if it were not effected. (Hear, hear.) He had gone as far as he could, and had recieved letters of congratulation from all parts of the country for the sacrifices he had made; but the division was not healed. Still, however, he did not despair of again seeing the Repeal body united ("hear," and cheers); and, if all the seceders did not come forward, he hoped that at least some of them would repent their errors, and rejoin him in his struggles for Ireland. (Cheers.)

Alderman O'Brien, M.P., having handed in some money from Cashel, and stated that the Repealers there were all Old Irelanders,

Mr. R. A. Fitzgerald, M.P., addressed the meeting, and said he was happy to be able to state that he had effected a reconciliation between Mr. Meagher and Mr. Clements, and yet hoped to see his friend Mr. W. S. O'Brien again in that Hall struggling for his country, for he could not forget what he had done for Ireland. (Hear, hear.)

The rent for the week amounted to £101.

The Weather in Dublin.—The frost has become so intense that the Liffey is frozen, even where the tide runs. This has not occurred for several years. The canals are also frozen. The weather is extremely severe, and must greatly aggravate the sufferings of the poor.

Another Death from Starvation.—A Dublin paper states that from some of the remote districts the most horrifying details have been received of the sufferings of the poorer classes; and also various particulars of deaths from starvation. On the 6th instant an inquest was held by A. Hosty, Esq., coroner, at Lisheenager, on view of the body of Michael Walsh. Mary Walsh having been sworn and examined, said—The deceased was my husband. We had neither potatoes nor corn for the last twelve weeks, nor did deceased get but six days' work during that time. There were no public works in the neighbourhood but one road, and he was unable to get employment. The only support ourselves and three children had were a few turnips, and, occasionally, a little meal we used to get from a neighbour. We lived upon one meal a-day, and often suffered from hunger for the last three weeks. Deceased took ill on the 1st instant, and died on the Thursday following. During that time myself and my children lived on a few boiled turnips, without meal or any other mixture, and we are all suffering from hunger.

The Late Murder at Crossmaglen.—On Wednesday (last week) the inquest on the body of George M'Clean, who was murdered when returning from the fair of Crossmaglen, terminated, when the Jury returned the following verdict:—"That George M'Clean was murdered on the night of the 4th inst., and that Hugh Quinn and James Shoulder were accessary to his death." Quinn and Shoulder have been committed to Armagh gaol. The murder, it appears, was committed through private revenge, and had nothing whatever to do with religious or political feeling.

The Late Murder in Armagh.—The investigation into the circumstances connected with the murder of George M'Clean, of which we gave an account last week, is terminated. The Jury found a verdict inculpating Hugh Quin and Jas. Shoulder, who are lodged in Armagh gaol, for trial at the next assizes. It cannot be clearly ascertained for what cause M'Clean was murdered. He was a respectable farmer, and highly spoken of by all parties. Quin was tried for the murder of Bryan M'Creesh, in 1839. The Newry Telegraph, in speaking of this murder, says: "The permanent settlement of a magistrate in this district is imperatively requisite. This is no idle assertion, but a truth attested by melancholy facts. Within the last eight years, no fewer than six murders have been perpetrated, at different periods, in the immediate vicinity of either Crossmaglen or Newtownhamilton. And now, in December of this present year, George M'Clean has been murdered in Crossmaglen

Another Murder.—On Sunday night, the gamekeeper of Sir Hugh Stewart, Bart., on going his rounds in the demesne of Ballygawley House, county Tyrone, saw a man armed, who on being challenged by the keeper, and being closed on by him, discharged the contents of his gun with fatal precision into the body of the keeper, who died on the spot.

THE RETURN OF THE 31st REGIMENT FROM INDIA.

LANDING AT GRAVESEND.

At last they tread their native shore;
  True warriors—humane as brave—
Who firmly stood when false Lahore
  Had will'd for them a ruthless grave.
Proudly their tatter'd banners wave
  Rent into rags by shot and shell;
Proud is the bayonet and the glaive
  Which could defend their flags so well

High flamed their flags at Aliwal,
  Where gallant Smith hath crown'd his fame;
Ferozeshah—Sobraon—all
  The fields that honour England's name.
And now the Thirty First have come
  A remnant of their former [illegible]
Alas! how oft the muffled drum
  Hath roll'd for a brave comrade's corse

For, 'twas not Punjaub's lawless hordes
  That thinn'd so much the Regiment's ranks;
Scant was their number at the fords
  [illegible]
'Twas [illegible] thirst—
  That [illegible] heart,
Yet still the veteran Thirty First
  Most gloriously achieved its part.

Then honour'd be the Soldier true
  Whose breast hath ramparted our Land;
And honour to the Jacket Blue,
  Who joins the Soldier heart and hand.
May both receive their doubtless due—
  [illegible] respect,
  [illegible]
  [illegible], Vienna, or Utrecht.*

On the 4th instant, the head-quarters of this distinguished regiment arrived at Gravesend, by the ship Madagascar, from Calcutta, which place they embarked from on the third of August last. They lost by deaths four men and one officer, Lieutenant Richard Sparrow. They brought home with them five captured colours—three of which they took from the enemy at the short but brilliant campaign against the Sikhs. The head-quarters is under the command of Brevet Major Dav[illegible] F. Longworth. Its strength consists of 19 sergeants, 7 drummers, 15 corporals, and 174 privates, with 21 women, and 30 children. This regiment left England in the year 1825, in the Kent East Indiaman, which was sunk in the Bay of Biscay. Lieutenant-Colonel James Spence, who is at Chatham, having arrived by the Overland Mail, was with the regiment at the time as Lieutenant. The dépôt at Chatham, for making up the strength of the regiment, contains nearly 500 men.

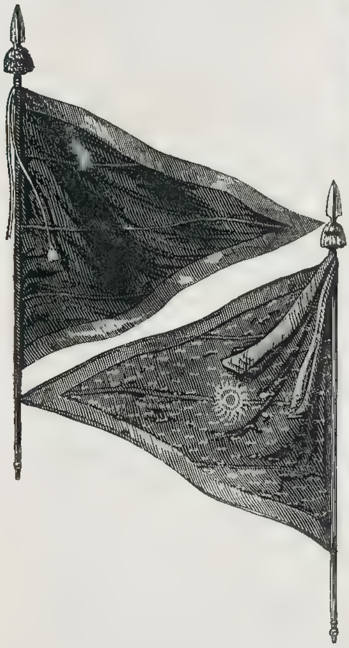
* The places for the Treaties, by a common figure.

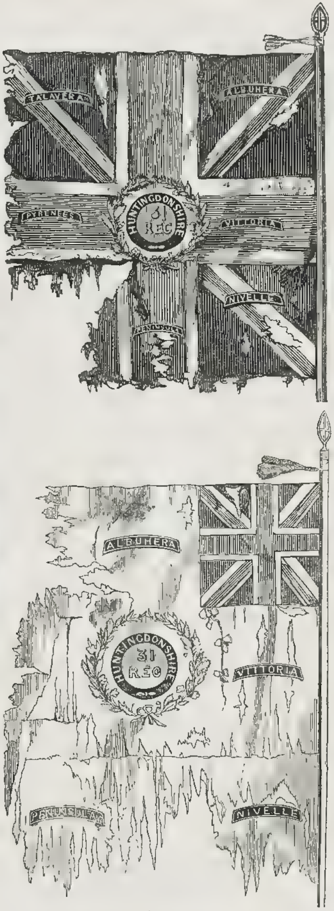
On the evening of the 6th, the head-quarters marched into Chatham garrison, from Gravesend, by the Rochester and Gravesend Railway, where they were met by the very superior band of the Royal Marines. On their arrival at the Rochester terminus, the band struck up "God save the Queen," and these heroes of the Sutlej were greeted by hundreds of people with loud and repeated huzzas. The soldiers, in return for this spirited welcome, waved the five colours captured from the enemy—one from Ferozeshah, two at Aliwal, and two taken at Sobraon. These banners bear testimony of the severe engagements. The Queen's colours and the regimental colours of the regiment are complete fragments. The head-quarters were also accompanied by the depôt band, which played, at intervals, in passing with the regiment through the streets of Rochester and Chatham, and were greeted along the whole line by thousands of people who assembled to witness their return.

INDIAN COLOURS TAKEN AT ALCANY.



INDIAN COLOURS TAKEN AT ALIWAL.

Out of 215 men, there are but 80 unwounded. Lieutenant-Colonel James Spence and Quarter-Master Bennison are the only two officers now with the regiment that went out with it in the Kent East Indiaman, when it took fire and sunk in the Bay of Biscay. The following officers have come home with the head quarters: Major James Staunton, Major D. F. G. Longwood, Lieutenant G. Elmslie, Lieutenant H. P. Hutton, Lieutenant R. Mackenzie, Lieutenant T. Scarman, Quarter-Master S. Bennison, Assistant-Surgeon H. C. Foss, and Adjutant A. S. Bolton. Lieutenant-Colonel James Spence headed the troops The officers of this regiment having been on the most friendly terms with the Royal Marine Corps, and being members of the mess of the Royal Marines, they dined at the Royal Marines' mess-room with the officers, who invited them, on their arrival at the garrison, to a superb repast.



COLOURS (31ST REGIMENT).

Annexed is a synopsis of the recent services of the 31st in India:—On the 12th of December, 1845, the regiment marched from Umballa for the frontier, then consisting of 31 officers and 841 non-commissioned officers, drummers, rank and file. The following officers were killed, or died of their wounds.—Colonel Bolton, C.B., Aide-de-camp to the Queen; Major Baldwin; Captain Willis; Lieutenants Pollard, Hart, Bernard, Brenchly, Tritton; Ensign Jones; Assistant-Surgeon Gahan, 9th Foot, doing duty with 31st; total, 10. Officers wounded:—Lieutenant-Colonel Byrne, Captains Bulkeley, Young, Garvock, Lugard; Lieutenants Plasket, Law, Atty, Elmslie, Gabbett, Timbrell, Pilkington; Ensigns Paul, Hutton; Lieutenant and Adjutant Bolton; total, 15. Officers that were in all the actions and escaped:—Lieutenant-Colonel Spence, Captain Longworth; Lieutenants Robertson, Noel; Quarter-Master Bennison, Captain White also (but was not at Aliwal and Sobraon); total, 6. Lieutenant-Colonel Spence commanded a brigade under Sir Harry Smith, on the 10th of February, at Sobraon; and Captain Longworth commanded the regiment at Sobraon, and had the command of it from the 4th of February to the 12th. Deducting baggage and camp guards, about 733 came into action, and the casualties amounted to 531.

THE INSURRECTION IN PORTUGAL.

VISCOUNT SA DA BANDEIRA.

PORTUGUESE politics are a hopeless, almost helpless, mass of confusion; for the last fifteen years there has been no settled Government; the only fixed point in the ever-changing scene has been the Throne; and even that has gained and lost power, as Charters have been broken, changed, renewed, and again violated—Ministries made and dissolved—Insurrections excited and suppressed.

Spain and Portugal have not been fortunate with their Constitutions; they have possessed all the conditions of a Free Government, as far as Charters could give them, in some respects even more liberally framed than our own. But when they are tried by action they fail; something is always wanting to give them efficacy. Outwardly the vessel of State seems gallantly rigged, and spreading a goodly amount of canvass; but the lightest gale shows the want of ballast within; the whole fabric goes over, and is suddenly seen floating keel upwards; magazine, armament, stores, and pay-chest, all reversed. And to the surprise of everybody, it seems to swim as well the wrong way as the right; nay, it is difficult to say which is the right one. Matters are always in such utter confusion that it is impossible for any change to make them worse; and to States, as to individuals, this is sometimes a kind of negative consolation.

We have been looking back at the political history of Portugal since 1836, and we find but a series of changes and convulsions, that must have ruined the country altogether, if the form of a Nation's Government were so essential to its existence as writers suppose it to be. The Ministries and rulers of Portugal are always changing; the people grow their vines under all, and pay their taxes to whoever may be uppermost, with little alteration, either for the worse or the better. Through all the political struggles of the period we refer to, we meet continually with the same names; above the troubled waters stand always the same fishers, raised or concealed only by a grade or two of rank or a title. At present, men who have been members of the same Cabinet are fighting against each other in the field—for an appeal to arms is very possible in the Peninsula, though it appears to us so irreconcileable to the theory of a Representative Government.

We give portraits of the leaders on both sides—the first of which is

VISCOUNT SA DA BANDEIRA.

Sa da Bandeira, who, with all the other Nobles who have joined the Insurgents, has been deprived by Royal ordonnance of his title of Viscount, is the leader of the rebellious troops, or rather the irregular forces who have combined with a few regiments to coerce the Queen's Government. He is a veteran in Portuguese politics, having been Minister of Finance after the movement of the 9th of September, 1836, when the popular discontent, aided by a lucky fire, which burned down the Lisbon Treasury, and all the account books, upset the Government of that day. Palmella, Terceira, Saldanha—all mixed up in the present struggle—then represented the Aristocratic party; they joined against Bandeira; then, as now, arms were resorted to, but Bandeira held his own, his opponents fled, Palmella and others seeking refuge in England. As the terms rebel and insurgent, in such a country, are bestowed not for the mere resort to arms, but according to the result of the appeal, there was at least a chance that Bandeira might have succeeded by the same means now that were once tried against himself. But as he has failed, it is most probable he will ere long be seen promenading in Regent-street, that Alsatia of fugitive European politicians. The movements of Bandeira, since the outbreak, have been but imperfectly described. He was badly supported in the outset; his force was irregular; he had no money (nobody has any in Portugal; the rebels are about as rich as the Government); and in the last action, near Chaves, the few regular troops he had with him—the 3rd and 15th Regiments—went over to Casal, the Queen's General, without firing a shot. The insurgents were totally routed, the fugitives robbed and plundered by the guerillas, and Bandeira himself arrived at Oporto, with a few officers, in an open boat—a chief without an army. Those who stood their ground, however, in this affair, behaved very well, as shown in the following account:—

"The greater part of Sa da Bandeira's staff, and of the guerilla chiefs, were left dead on the field. The importance of this engagement is increased by the fact of its having been a regular pitched battle, in which Sa da Bandeira chose his own ground. The desertion of his troops, of course, beat him; but there is no doubt that these men had been coerced: whatever may be said about duty, however, the stain of treason is theirs. The slaughter was the result of the courageous stand made by the insurgents after being deserted by full 1000 of their men! They fought and died on the ground of which they would not yield an inch. Sa da Bandeira, a General of undoubted bravery and skill, did not retreat until his little army was utterly routed, and then fled towards Oporto."

It is said that 300 men fell in this engagement.

DUQUE DE SALDANHA.

Saldanha, Palmella, and Terceira are the three chief leaders of the Court or aristocratic party in Portugal. They have been in and out oftener than we can here specify: from 1836 to the present time, they have been prominent public men. They were all members of the Cabral Ministry: the Duke de Palmella, President of the Chamber of Peers; the Duke of Terceira, President of the Council; and the Duke de Saldanha, a Member of the Council of War; he is also a Marshal. The Cabrals imposed some taxes which roused the peasantry to violence; their Ministry was dismissed, and Bandeira and Das Antas formed another. But the Court party, Saldanha, and his colleagues upset it, in concert with the Queen, by a coup d'état; that is, they persuaded the Queen to dismiss it abruptly; upon which, Bandeira and Das Antas raised a rebellion, which has ended as we have seen. If the reader will imagine to himself Sir Robert Peel ousted by a majority against him, and Mr. Roebuck and the Radicals coming in his successors, and farther suppose Sir Robert and the Duke persuading the Queen to dismiss the member for Bath and his colleagues, and still further picture those gentlemen, instead of submitting quietly, going down into the country, getting up an insurrection, the Duke of Wellington being sent down with the household troops to quell it, he will have a rough idea of how party politics stand in Portugal as clearly as English illustrations can give it. Marshal Saldanha leads the Queen's troops; he had, at the date of the last accounts, invested Santarem, held by Das Antas and his force: the Marshal's despatch says that his troops occupied exactly the same position as the army he commanded in 1833 and 1834 against Don Miguel—a remarkable coincidence. Colonel Wylde, Prince Albert's Equerry, is at the Marshal's head-quarters. Privation had begun to be felt in the town, and the consternation was increasing daily. Saldanha does not think his enemy very formidable. He says:—"All the districts through which I have passed give the clearest proofs of the falseness of the assertions of the rebel chiefs; everywhere the inhabitants present themselves in a body before me, giving the most evident demonstrations of rejoicing at seeing themselves rescued from the power which oppressed them. Everywhere I hear the same story of two or three anarchists in each district, having nothing to lose, getting together some mauvais sujets, and forcing, through threats of confiscation and through violence, men of all ages to take up arms."

THE DUQUE DE SALDANHA.

And again:—"The present, far from being a popular movement, as the ex-Conde das Antas wished to represent it, is the most unfounded and unheard-of rebellion which ever has existed, and is owing solely to the intrigues of its leaders."

SANTAREM.

Santarem, the refuge of the Portuguese insurgents, is a town about 47 miles N. E. of Lisbon; it is situated on the Tagus, and is a place of considerable antiquity. The fortifications are tolerably strong, but there is little prospect of Das Antas making a long resistance.

THE PROGRESS OF THE INSURRECTION.

Lisbon letters of the 5th instant have reached us. They state the important fact that the troops under Colonel Lapa and Major Joaquim Bento have entered Coimbra. It has not been as yet officially published, but no doubt exists of the fact. The force under Colonel Lapa amounts, it is said, to something over 1200 men.

The intelligence from Oporto represents the popular cause there to be under more gloomy auspices than it has heretofore been since the movement commenced. Sa da Bandeira, however, was busily occupied in endeavouring to recruit his forces, so as to enable him to make head against Cazal, should that general make his appearance before the city.

In the Northern provinces a rising of a more than usually formidable character has taken place in the name of Don Miguel. Macdonald is in the Minho, at the head of 600 guerillas, and 3000 armed peasants (guerillas). A Spanish general named Garcez, is at the head of 400 guerillas, and a contingent of peasants; and a German officer has also under his command about 300. All these have raised the Miguelite standard. Macdonald was at Braga, and it was understood he was about to go to Viana, probably to meet some supplies of arms, ammunition, &c., which may have been sent by sea to that port.

There is no intelligence from Santarem of more recent date than the 28th ult. The force that Das Antas had detached to Coimbra, consisting of 600 regulars and 150 students, was said to have been interrupted on its march by the refusal of the regulars to proceed to Coimbra, or to return to Santarem.

The rain, at Lisbon, had set in torrents, and the weather, for some days, was so bad, that there was every probability that the operations before Santarem must be suspended. Desertions were still taking place amongst the troops within Santarem to Saldanha's side. It was thought probable that Bomfim had moved from the Alemtejo into Santarem with his regulars, consisting of 2000 men, which would give great strength to Das Antas. Galamba, with 300 men, had certainly entered.

The Miguelite insurrection in the north, though calculated to excite uneasiness in the minds of the Queen's Government, is not connected with the popular movement directed by Das Antas and his colleagues. The forces under Macdonald were extremely well received at Braga and Guimaraens, and it is universally admitted that they are well conducted, paying for all they require in the way of provisions, &c.: they are well supplied with funds. The principal part of them are armed with fusils, of which 8000 stand were issued at Oporto during the first ebullition. Casal was at Amaranthe, it was supposed on his road to invest Oporto. But it was asserted by well informed persons, that he would pass Oporto, and move either on Coimbra or to join Saldanha. Oporto was prepared for defence. Bomfim was in Santarem with Celestino's division. The Mindello was sent by the Junta of Oporto to bring money and men from St. Michael's. A great quantity of goods had been dispatched at the Oporto Custom-house.

The preamble to the decrees for the formation of the new Bank of Portugal, the creation of a sinking fund, and the regulation of the currency, contain frank admissions of the very embarrassed state of the Government.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON ALMANACK—SECOND EDITION OF 40,000.
This Day, Price 1s , gilt edges,

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON ALMANACK,
AND PICTURESQUE CALENDAR FOR 1847

This ALMANACK is submitted to the Public by the Proprietors, with confidence of its superiority over its predecessors. The Work was commenced in 1845, with a view of furnishing a Repository of Useful Knowledge of permanent value for constant reference, in Astronomy, Astronomical Occurrences, and the Natural History of the Year

The ASTRONOMICAL DEPARTMENT has been placed entirely under the superintendence of JAMES GLAISHER, Esq , F R.A S., and of the Royal Observatory at Greenwich.

On the third page of each month is a series of tableaux of Memorable Events, carrying out in a true spirit what is usually and properly introduced into our Almanack, not for occasional reference only, but to cherish respect for these landmarks of British History.

The fourth page of each month is devoted to Natural History. The whole of this portion is from the very able pen of Mrs. LOUDON; and the interesting series of Illustrations to this department has been drawn and engraved by Miss LOUDON, under the immediate superintendence of Mrs. LOUDON

The Calendar Illustrations are from the masterly pencil of WILLIAM HARVEY, and engraved in the first style of Art, by LINTON, illustrative of the National Sports.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"A Subscriber," Llanelly.—A copy of the "Penny Cyclopædia" may be purchased for about Six Guineas. Inquire of any Bookseller for Professor Saunderson's "Tangible Arithmetic." Apparatus (Latin) is both singular and plural.

"Adelaide." —The price of Keats's "Poems" is 2s 6d. (Moxon.)

"S. H. R. P," Waltham, will, perhaps, forward the Sketch.

"G. M. C.," Stonehouse.—Yes

"E.," Hanwell —We regret that we have not room for the List of Prizes.

"J. B." Inquire of any Law Bookseller.

"A Well-Wisher to the Press" is thanked for his hints, though he unwittingly suggests one of the scenes for illustration which he censures elsewhere.

"A Widow," Carlow. We cannot advise.

"Bowman" should send his Puzzle to some Magazine.

"A Young Sportsman." Snipes are Game, by the statute.

"Z. S.," Walsham, is somewhat impatient.

"P. Q. R."—The Astronomer Royal stated, in his communication to the Royal Astronomical Society on the 13th of November, that, "on one of the last days of October, 1845, Mr. Adams called at the Royal Observatory, Greenwich, and left the elements of the New Planet." On the 10th of November, 1845 —a few days afterwards only, and not eight months—M. Le Verrier published his first memoir. "P Q R." is recommended to see the Astronomer Royal's account.

"A Subscriber from the Commencement."—The liveries should be red and white. Our Correspondent must bear in mind that the heraldic rule does not require that the exact colour or metal should be adhered to; but that any shade will do. Thus: when the colour in the arms is red, reddish-brown or maroon will be sufficiently near. Where the shield is divided per pale, the colour on the dexter side is the leading one. Certain it is, that almost all the regulations of heraldry, once so much valued by our ancestors, are now-a-days sadly neglected; nevertheless, there are many who still adhere to this last relic of chivalry, and love to accord with its laws.

"Xenophon." —We believe the correct pronunciation of the Poet's name to have been Cowper. Cooper may be a fashionable mode, but it arises in affectation.

"Dora." The family of Carlo Buonaparte consisted of thirteen children: of these, five died in infancy; the others were Joseph, Napoleon (the Emperor), Lucien, Louis, Jerome, Eliza, Pauline, and Caroline, of whom the only survivor is, we believe, the youngest son, Jerome, ex-King of Westphalia. There are full details of the Buonaparte Family in Mr. Burke's Patrician.

"R. G. L." —The moon moves round the Earth in 29½ days, and her varying appearance, as seen from the Earth, is caused by her different positions with respect to the sun and the Earth. We recommend "R. G. L." to see the "Illustrated London Almanack" of this year, at pages 25, 29, and 33, for full particulars relative to the different appearances and phases of the moon.

"D. M." We have not room to engrave the Christmas or Gipsy Cake, made at Manchester, weighing 15 cwt., and containing 15 gold wedding rings!

"H H," Walsall, is thanked: the Illustration will appear shortly.

"Laura."—"Truth Without Prejudice," published anonymously, is by a lady of high family, in Sussex.

"Ulverston." The Royal Livery is crimson.

"An Old Subscriber," Islington —The Illustrations will appear in a week or two: they have only been named once.

"H W.," Newcastle, is thanked; though we cannot avail ourselves of his aid.

"D. W."—The Wenham Lake lies 18 miles from Boston, in the State of Massachusetts

"Tudor."—We have seen the Lithograph, but cannot engrave it: it is, as yet, a mere project

"St. Leger."—The Sketch at page 205 of the present Volume is a good likeness.

"G. E. F.," Liverpool.—Address Mr. Nutt, Foreign Bookseller, Fleet-street

"Nonvidens."—Knowledge, whether derived from a Collegiate or other education, is always a powerful aid to a Member of the Bar If the student intend to follow the practice of the Common Law, a year's service in a special pleader's office is absolutely essential; and, for a Chancery Barrister, the same term in a Conveyancer's chambers would be required. Many good authorities on the subject recommend, also, a year to be spent with an Attorney.

"A. H"—The East India Directors have not come to any such regulation as that mentioned by our Correspondent.

"S S S."—The term "Milesian" is applied to those families which claim to have been planted in the sister kingdom at the time Milesius, the Spaniard, conquered Ireland. See "The Patrician" for the present month, page 336.

"Question"—The simple assumption and usage of any name renders the adoption legal. The Sign Manual or Royal License is a mere customary form, satisfactory in giving publicity to the change, and showing that the alteration arises from no bad motive; but it is not absolutely necessary. The fees on a Sign Manual not including a change of arms, amount to about £50: when heraldic ensigns are involved, the cost is considerably greater.

"T. G." is thanked for the additional details.

"Houston," Washington.—The papers shall be forwarded on the receipt of a remittance.

"A Constant Reader." The two Misses Smith.

"A. W."—We cannot spare time or room.

"A Subscriber," Beverley, may, with propriety, prefix "Mr."

"A Subscriber," Trinity College, Cambridge, is thanked.

"Rara Avis," Manchester.—A pamphlet, of practical worth, on the Breeding and Rearing of the Canary Finch, is published by Limbird, 143, Strand.

"C. E." Next week.

"J. C. K.," near Ringwood, had better consult a Solicitor

"An Old Lancashire Subscriber."—The letter receives no additional validity by being sealed in the way mentioned.

"A Correspondent" The Christian name of Cromwell's favourite daughter, Mrs. Claypole, was Elizabeth: Lord Fauconberg married Mrs. Claypole's sister, Mary, the third daughter of Oliver.

⁂ ERRATUM at page 384, in our last.—Messrs. Garrett, the makers of the Improved Drill, do not reside at Leicester, but at Leiston, near Saxmundham, Suffolk.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 19, 1846.

THERE is a practice prevailing extensively in English society to which some limit might be set with considerable advantage. It is the superabundant expression of praise for exceedingly slight services. It is difficult to say what a man could do that would not produce him a "vote of thanks." If a man sits in a large chair a whole evening, listening to a batch of pompous orators, he for that fact receives a "vote of thanks" for his "able conduct," the only ability displayed being that of a good listener. Eating a dinner in public, and giving a string of toasts after it, meets the same reward. But as these are mere compliments, they may pass; though the exaggerated language they are paid in, out of all proportion to the merit and degree of the service, is an offence to truth, and a violation of sincerity. The principle is carried still further in other cases; so far, that it is growing into an abuse. Talents and honesty seem to be becoming very scarce, for they are excessively trumpeted. If a man happens to have had the management of a public fund, as a treasurer of a society, or in any analogous position, and if he does not actually embezzle them and depart to America, he is sure of a piece of plate, inscribed with some fulsome flourish about his ability and integrity, and so forth. From the admiration expressed of non-defalcation, it looks as if dishonesty was rather to be expected in a post of trust than otherwise; and that a man deserved presents of plate, blazoned with his unheard of merit, for keeping himself out of the dock of the Old Bailey.

There is a good deal of loose thinking prevalent on this subject. It was but the other day, a claim to public respect was made on the part of a member of the Corporation of London, because he had, during his life, had the management of large sums of money, and the "breath of suspicion had never rested on his name." Here was a common duty praised as if it were an exalted virtue. Now, the refraining from doing an act that, if done, would bring down ruin on the doer, does not strike us as an extraordinary merit, for which thanks and praises should be given. We do not subscribe for premiums to men for not cutting their throats, or jumping into rivers, or committing bodily self-destruction; dishonesty (at least, that which comes within reach of the law) is a moral suicide. If we get into the habit of treating rectitude as the exception to, rather than the rule of, men's conduct, it will not be long before it becomes so in reality. We must not sing so loudly and invariably the praises of honesty among those who have little temptation to be otherwise; it ought to be exacted rigorously, and expected, as a duty, to be done unpraised; where it is a crime not to be so, the merit of not offending is scarcely superhuman.

We are indiscriminate in laudation in other ways; we praise everything—it is becoming a habit; everybody praises everybody else, and thus the "caw me, caw thee" goes round the whole circle of society. If one chairman or treasurer receives a piece of plate, it becomes a kind of slight not to pay the same compliment to his successor; thus, parties and cliques are formed, and the matter becomes a question of cabal and intrigue—not of merit. The "getting up" of some of these tributes would furnish very edifying disclosures. Cases have been known in which they have been concocted to cover a retreat, and give a little éclat to the close of a term of office, during which the virtues displayed required a strong magnifying power to perceive. The effect of this indiscriminate bestowal of thanks and praise is to destroy its value; nay, it is ceasing even to have any meaning whatever. In a case that has recently occurred, a gentleman got a vote of thanks from the managers of a Society who were, at the moment they passed it, highly displeased with his conduct! Could anything be more hollow and insincere? Yet it is the natural effect of the system. An Honorary Secretary of a Charitable Society, like many other Honorary Secretaries, had less time for the duties of the office than his own affairs; so, with the best intentions in the world, the business got into confusion, the managers discontented; then they met, examined, voted formal thanks to the Secretary for his "zeal and activity in the cause"—and got rid of him! This is a specimen of the social hypocrisies among which we live. Men get so accustomed to hide their real opinions that they see nothing wrong in what really is double dealing. But "votes of thanks" cannot sink much lower if they become sentences of suspension or deprivation. "Praise undeserved," it is said, "is censure in disguise;" when the "praise" cuts short the connection, it is "censure in disguise" with a vengeance.

Cassio, I love thee well;
But never more be officer of mine.

This, however, only expresses a personal regard for the offender; Othello did not "thank" Cassio for causing the riot for which he disbanded him. It is difficult to say what amount of mismanagement in an official post would disentitle a man to the inevitable "vote of thanks" that now descends on those who deserve it, and those who do not, with perfect impartiality.

THE WEATHER.

IN our paper of December 5th, we noticed the frost which had then visited the metropolis, for the first time this winter, particularising the temperatures of each day, till Dec. 2nd. This cold weather continued until the following Saturday; on Sunday, Dec 6th, it was less cold, and a period of comparative warm weather set in, and continued till the afternoon of Thursday, Dec. 10, when the frost set in again with increased severity, and thus it has continued till the present time. On December 10, at 5h. 30m. P M., the direction of the wind suddenly changed, from S W. to N by W., and it blew strongly for two or three hours from this quarter; on the wind lulling, at 9h. P M., snow began to fall. During the evening, the reading of the thermometer declined rapidly, and descended below 32 degrees before midnight, and to 25 degrees after midnight. On the 11th and 12th snow was falling frequently.

The following are readings of thermometers placed with their bulbs four feet above the ground, and protected from the effects of radiation. Continued from those in our paper of Dec. 5:—

In the Morning, at Half-past Seven.		The Highest in the Day	In the Evening, at Half-past Seven.	The Lowest in the Day.
Dec. 3,	35 deg	37 deg	37 deg.	27 deg.
4,	26	38½	34	23
5,	31	39½	36½	29
6,	34	41	37½	31½
7,	36½	44	Not observed	[illegible]
8,	36	42½	41	35½
9,	40	42½	41½	38
10,	39	42	26½	39
11,	26½	31	25½	25
12,	30	31½	29	23
13,	27	30	30	25
14,	16	31	27½	15
15,	19	30	26½	18½
16,	29	34	26	23

It will be seen that on Dec. 14, the reading descended to a very low point, being 17 degrees below that of freezing water; and on the 15th and 16th it was also very low. The lowest readings, generally, will be found to differ but little from those taken in the morning, showing that the lowest readings generally have taken place at this time.

Between Nov. 28th and Dec. 5th, the average temperature was 31½ degrees, being about 12 degrees below that of the season.

Between Dec. 6th and 9th, the average was 40 degrees, being a very little below that of the season.

From Dec. 10th to the present time, the average temperature has been below 27 degrees, being full 13 degrees below that of the season

The direction of the wind has been principally from the N. and N N.W.

The readings of thermometers placed on, and near to vegetation, have been frequently below 10 degrees, within the last few days. In the Times of this morning (Thursday), is an extract from the Manchester Guardian, relative to the weather. Reference being made to the difference between the readings of two thermometers, placed at different distances from the earth, and attributing this difference either to the inaccuracy of one of the instruments, or to the difference existing between the temperatures of the air between the two places. I beg leave to say that both these suppositions are erroneous, for this reason:—The air in immediate contact with the ground, cooled by radiation, on clear and calm nights, is generally from 10 to 15 degrees below that at the distance of four feet from the ground, and the observed difference at Manchester is to be attributed to this cause. Those readings at Manchester are more valuable than those usually found in newspapers, from the circumstance of the position of the instruments being so accurately given.

Blackheath, Thursday, Dec. 17th, 1846. J. G.

MEDALLION PORTRAITS OF HER MAJESTY AND PRINCE ALBERT.—These beautiful works are executed in haut relievo, in a new style of art, introduced by M. Lequine: they are admirably adapted for the embellishment of the library, the club-room, or the study, and are certainly of classical design. M. Lequine has just presented a pair of these Medallions, (28 inches square,) to the Corporation of London, who have returned the sculptor their unanimous thanks for his "beautifully executed portraits," and caused them to be placed in the Museum at Guildhall.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

THE ROYAL FAMILY.—Her Majesty, Prince Albert, and the Royal Family remained at Osborne House till yesterday, when they returned to Windsor for the Christmas holidays.

LORD AND LADY JOHN RUSSELL.—Lord and Lady John Russell and the Hon. Miss Lister arrived in Chesham-place on Wednesday forenoon from Chorley Wood. The family are expected to pass the holidays in the country.

LORD WILLOUGHBY DE BROKE.—The venerable Lord Willoughby de Broke continues, we regret to learn, in indifferent health.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND'S FAMILY. The Duchess of Richmond, and the Ladies Caroline and Cecilia Gordon Lennox, have left Portland-place, for Goodwood, to join the Duke of Richmond, and a family party, who have already assembled there. The Duchess had been detained in town, owing to the illness of Lord Alexander Gordon Lennox, who, we are happy to state, is now convalescent.

THE MINISTERS.—A Cabinet Council was held on Wednesday, which was attended by all the Ministers in town. It sat two hours and a half. The Cabinet Ministers again assembled in the evening at the residence of Earl Grey, in Belgrave-square, the noble Earl having given a Cabinet dinner.

WOBURN ABBEY.—The Duke and Duchess of Bedford have arrived at Woburn Abbey, from visiting Viscount Melbourne, at Brocket Hall. The noble Duke and Duchess are about to entertain a numerous party of distinguished friends. Various theatrical representations are spoken of.

PRIVY COUNCIL.—Her Majesty is to hold a Privy Council to-day. At this Council it is supposed that the time for the meeting of Parliament will be determined on, and a proclamation will be issued, summoning both Houses to meet for the despatch of public business.

THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON.—The Duke of Wellington will entertain a select circle at Strathfieldsaye, Hants, during the ensuing week.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

THE FROST.

The frost set in with considerable severity on Monday. Although the ice in the Parks was very thin a number of fool-hardy persons as usual insisted on venturing upon it. Several of them, consequently, got a ducking. In St. James's Park on Monday an accident took place, by which one life was lost, and the lives of three or four other persons considerably jeopardised. A merchant's clerk, named Thomas Thomas, of No. 5, Grove, Cleveland-street, was skating on that portion of the water opposite Buckingham Palace, when the ice gave way, and the man was in the act of sinking beneath the surface. Thomas Pavey, iceman No. 9, immediately went to his assistance, and having placed the break-ladder in such a position that he could have rescued the individual without much difficulty, two or three other persons, anxious to render assistance, got hold of the ladder, which overturned it, and the iceman, with Mr. Thomas, another person named George Pilley, and a young man named George Wright, were all forced through the hole, and were to be seen struggling in the water beneath the ice. After a deal of trouble, Pilley and Thomas, with iceman Pavey, were got out by Whinneth, iceman No. 22. They were all taken to the receiving tent in the Park. The two former were placed in hot beds, but upwards of ten minutes elapsed before the unfortunate George Wright could be got out; when that was at length accomplished, he appeared lifeless. He was, however, taken to the tent, and placed in a hot bath, and everything was done by Dr. M'Cann, the surgeon to the Humane Society, but without avail. The deceased was in the employ of Mr. Hollebone, wine merchant, No 1, Stockbridge-terrace, Pimlico, and was only nineteen years of age. Fahrenheit's thermometer fell as low as 16½, or 15½ degrees below freezing point at 8 a.m. on Monday, in the Blackfriars-road.

In the course of Tuesday, from 8000 to 10,000 persons ventured upon the ice in St. James's Park; on the Serpentine, Long Water, and the Round Pond, Kensington Gardens, 4000 or 5000 persons, chiefly skaters, might be seen pursuing their gambols; while in Regent's Park fully 500 more participated in the amusement. Fortunately no accident took place. The severity of the frost had begun to affect to some extent the navigation of the Thames. The Putney boats were in the course of Tuesday afternoon laid up, in consequence of their being unable to pass through Putney-bridge, and above that locality the river is full of ice.

The number of persons who went on the ice in St. James's Park on Wednesday was estimated at upwards of 10,000. Not a single accident occurred during the day. The Serpentine, in Hyde Park; the ornamental waters, in the Regent's Park; the Long Water and Round Pond, in Kensington Gardens, were crowded with skaters and sliders. The river on Wednesday, above bridge, presented a singular appearance, owing to the immense pieces of ice that were drifted up with the tide. On that day a lad named Scott, aged about twelve years, was sliding on some ice on the Grand Surrey Canal, Camberwell-road, when the ice cracked and broke, and he fell into the water. The accident was witnessed by several persons, whose efforts to save the poor boy were entirely without success. After sinking at the time of the breaking of the ice, the body was not seen. On Wednesday night, there was rather a heavy fall of snow, and on Thursday morning a thaw commenced, but thousands were skating in St. James's Park The ice was in bad condition in many places, and the skating had no claim to the term scientific. On Thursday night, the weather was much colder. During yesterday, the frost continued.

THE SEIZURE OF CRACOW

On Wednesday evening a meeting was held in the National Association Hall, Holborn, for the purpose of taking into consideration the recent seizure of Cracow, and the evident determination of the three Powers to annihilate the Polish nation.

Doctor Bowring, M P., was in the chair. Letters of apology were read from Mr. Duncombe, M.P., from Lord Dudley Stuart, and from Mr. Douglas Jerrold.

Dr. Bowring made an animated appeal in behalf of Poland, and concluded by assuring the Poles in this country that the hearts of the English people were with them, and that they were ready to assist in the resuscitation of Poland. (Cheers.)

Mr. Moore proposed the first resolution—"That, though they deplored the recent events in Poland, they felt rejoiced at the violation of the treaty of Vienna, which was repugnant to the liberties of Europe."

Mr. Savage seconded the resolution.

Some other speakers addressed the meeting, which was numerously attended; and resolutions expressive of sympathy with the Poles, and deprecating the violation of the independence of Cracow, were agreed to.

THE NEW HOUSE OF LORDS.—It was generally expected that their Lordships would meet in their new house on the assembling of Parliament, but it is now ascertained that the decorations and embellishments, which are of the most magnificent description, cannot be completed in sufficient time. Consequently the Peers will for a short period continue to sit in the present house.

THE BRITISH MUSEUM.—On Tuesday, the spacious building, forming part of the British Museum, known as the "Townley Gallery," was sold by auction by the Messrs. Eversfield, by order of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, to be cleared away, for the purpose of having erected on its site a wing to connect the gallery, in which are deposited the Egyptian relics, with the western wing of the magnificent façade, which is nearly completed.

THE PARISH OF ST. PANCRAS AND THE POOR-LAW COMMISSIONERS. At a numerous meeting of the Directors and Guardians of the Poor of St. Pancras, held on Tuesday, a mandate from the Poor-Law Commissioners was read, containing rules for the future management of the poor, and assuming absolute control over the parish. The rules and regulations of the Commissioners are divided into twelve sections—viz., admission of paupers, classification of paupers, discipline and diet of paupers, punishments for misbehaviour of paupers, visiting committee, repairs and alterations of the workhouse, officers of the workhouse, qualifications of officers, salaries of officers, continuance in office and suspension of officers and supply of vacancies, and duties of workhouse officers. The Commissioners order that the rules shall be in force after the expiration of twenty-one days from the date of the mandate. The communication was received with great indignation, and they expressed a determination to resist the application of the rules. On the motion of Mr. Douglas, the matter was referred to the vestry.

REFUGES FOR THE HOUSELESS.—In consequence of the inclemency of the weather, the three establishments at Playhouse-yard, Whitecross-street; Great Ogle-street, Foley-place; and Glasshouse-street, East Smithfield, were opened for the season on Monday night. There were admitted into the western asylum 22; to the central asylum, 1.1; and to that at the east end, 84; all of whom were in a most destitute condition. On Tuesday evening the doors of each establishment were opened at five o'clock, when the applicants were very numerous. The regulations are the same as in previous years, each applicant having the accommodation of a bed of hay in a wrapping of tarpauling, with a skin of leather in which to envelop themselves, and which is found the most conducive to health as well as to cleanliness. A portion of bread is given to each inmate night and morning, and those who remain in the institution on Sunday are supplied with an additional ration of bread and cheese.

MORTALITY IN LONDON. The total number of deaths which occurred in the metropolis during the week ending last Saturday, was 1163, showing a further increase in the mortality as compared with the previous week, and attributable, no doubt, to the extreme severity of the weather. The returns have during the whole autumn been considerably under the average; but since the winter may be said to have fairly commenced, namely, during the last two weeks, the number has exceeded the average. The return exceeds the weekly average of the last five years by 195. The number of deaths in London during the corresponding week of last year was 970.

MORE CUSTOM-HOUSE FRAUDS.—It is stated by the London Mercantile Journal, that a fraud of a most extensive character has been committed in one of the largest warehouses belonging to the St. Katharine's Dock Company, by the connivance of the Customs' officer in charge of that warehouse. The amount of which the revenue has been defrauded in this single instance is said to be between £20,000 and £30,000. Sugar is the article by which this fraud has been effected, and the way it has been done is simply this:—Upon the presentation of warrants for the delivery of goods to the company's clerks, it is the practice to present the document to the locker on the premises, for him to certify that he has received the necessary order from the Custom-house that the duty has been paid, before the delivery is allowed to take place. In this instance the locker asserted that he was in receipt of the "order," when such was not the case, no duty having been paid. The Dock Company delivered the sugar; and we presume stands exonerated. It was a "split" among the actors which brought this affair to light, and it is to similar differences that the public are mainly indebted for all they know of the frauds upon the Customs, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer for all he may have received, in the shape of verdicts, from fraudulent traders.

THE ELECTORS OF MARYLEBONE.—At the Marylebone Vestry, on Saturday, it was stated that there were in the parish 14,017 persons entitled to vote on the register, but only 7733 were actually qualified, and out of that number 1020 persons were disqualified, by reason of non-payment of the window tax.

POSTSCRIPT.

Cabinet Council.—Another Cabinet Council, which was attended by all the Ministers in town, was held at the Forign Office yesterday.

Awful Instance of Sudden Death of an Officer.—It is with regret that we record the death of Captain Joseph C. Dacre, of the 94th Regiment, at Chatham, who was found dead in his bed on Wednesday morning by his servant. This officer was on duty the previous evening, and went round at five o'clock to see that his depôt was correct, and being the captain of the day he took the guard at ten o'clock at night, and on being relieved went to bed in his usual spirits. The cause of death is ascribed to apoplexy. He has been in India twenty-three years.

Melancholy Shipwreck.—The barque Hope, of Liverpool, 550 tons, Jones, master, from Camarines Bay for Liverpool, laden with guano, struck on a bank off Morris-castle, between Wexford and Wicklow, when the crew, 26 in number, left the barque and landed. They remained ashore two nights, but boarded her again on the 9th of December. Finding, however, that she was not seaworthy, they took to their boats; sixteen seamen in the long-boat, and the remainder, including the captain and officers, in the gig. The latter party was soon after seen alongside of a schooner; but the crew in the long-boat, not being so fortunate, continued drifting before a very strong northerly wind, with heavy snow squalls, without either provisions or water, until Sunday last, when the boat came ashore about four miles east of Newquay, on the north coast of Cornwall. It was then found that ten of her crew had died of cold and hunger.

The Extraordinary Case of Swindling in a Church.—At Westminster Police-office, on Thursday, Robert Warmington Crowther was re-examined on a charge of uttering fraudulent orders for the payment of money. It will be remembered that the circumstances attending the case upon which the prisoner was remanded were stated in a part of our impression last week, and were of a very extraordinary character. He presented himself at Trinity Church, Sloane street, with two ladies and a marriage license, on the morning of Thursday week and having been united to one of the ladies, paid the fees of the ceremony amounting to £1 14s., with an order for £5 upon Messrs. Dixon, of Chancery-lane, and received the change. It was ascertained, in the course of the same afternoon, that there was no account in that name in the establishment, and the prisoner was taken into custody a few hours afterwards. Another case was proved against the prisoner, in which he had given a forged cheque for £30 upon Messrs. Dixon. It is believed that the prisoner is insane. He stated, when asked for a explanation, that he had paid £400 into the bank of Messrs. Dixon in 1841. This was denied by the clerk. The prisoner was committed for trial.

LATEST FOREIGN NEWS.

RUSSIA AND POLAND

Information of an authentic character leads to the belief that Russia has openly declared an intention to complete the incorporation of Cracow with the Russian Empire; the cession of that territory to Austria temporarily being the mere prelude to this still greater act of spoliation, which, we need hardly say, is likely to lead to the most important consequences.

FRANCE.

Our latest accounts from Paris mention that a good deal of snow has fallen, and that there has not been such a severe season in that capital for some years.

The King and Queen of the Belgians arrived at the Tuileries on Tuesday evening, and were expected to remain in Paris about a week.

SPAIN.

Our Paris correspondent writes us that a telegraphic dispatch had reached that city from Madrid of the 11th, announcing the progress of the elections as far as known; from which it appears that out of the six seats for the city, three of the number elected were opposition members. viz., Mendizabel, Salamanca, and San Miguel. Ten of the elections in the northern provinces gave seven in favour of Ministers, and three against them.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

ANOTHER DEATH FROM DESTITUTION.

An inquest was held on Monday, at the Two Chairmen, Dartmouth-street, Westminster, before Mr. Bedford, on the body of Elizabeth Doddemede, aged seventy, who died from the want of sufficient food and clothing.

The room which the deceased and her husband had occupied was a front kitchen, at No. 15, Dacre-street. It was so low that a man with his hat on could not stand upright, and the approaches to which were so inconvenient that the Jury had much difficulty in viewing the body. It was also in a most pitiable condition; there was no furniture, nor were the commonest articles of domestic comfort to be seen. A heap of hay, straw, and rubbish, which had been used as a bed, lay in one corner of the room.

Samuel Barber, landlord of the White Swan, Little St. Andrew-street, Seven Dials, said the deceased was his sister, and was the wife of a jobbing carpenter She was in a state of idiotcy, brought on, he thought, by the destitute circumstances in which she was placed.

The Coroner: Was the deceased in want of the common necessaries of life?—Witness: Yes; and has been for some time past. She and her husband have been in the receipt of relief from the parish of Marylebone, but it has now been stopped for some time. I am sure that they have been in a starving state, for they had no way of getting money. Her other brothers were unable to assist them, and no one would undertake to make them any provision after the parish allowance was stopped.

Mr. John Lavies, surgeon, of Great George-street, said that he had made a post-mortem examination of the body of the deceased, and found it very much attenuated. There was no organic disease to account for death. Some of the internal glands were indurated, a common thing where there had been a paucity of food.

Margaret Eleanor Richardson said she resided in the same house as the deceased, but had not seen her leave her room for the last two years. Dr. Wright attended her last year, and said that the only thing she wanted was food, not physic. They had no out-door relief from the parish.

James Doddemede, the husband of the deceased, was called into the room. He was evidently in the last stage of starvation, and, though not a lunatic, it was clear, from the incoherency of his replies, that his mind was weak. In answer to questions from the Coroner and Jury, he said that he had been in a very destitute state for the last seven years, and that a sum of 4s. 6d. per week, which he had been allowed from Marylebone, was stopped last April, because he would not go into the "house."

The Coroner: How did you live, then?—Witness: Oh, upon what I could scratch together. When I could get work, I earned sometimes 1s. 6d. sometimes 1s., and sometimes 9d. per day.

The Coroner: Did you apply for relief?—Witness: Not for the last year; but the gentlemen of Marylebone knew how badly I was off, for Mr. Langley came and saw me, and wanted me to go into the workhouse.

The Coroner: Why would you not let your wife go into the workhouse?—Witness: Why, she begged me never to let her go, and I promised, on the word of a man, that she should not.

The Jury returned a verdict of "Died from the want of the necessaries of life."

ANOTHER DEATH FROM WANT.

On Tuesday night Mr. W. Payne held an inquest at St. George's Workhouse, Southwark, respecting the death of John Tracy, aged sixty-four years, who it was alleged had died from starvation and exposure to the weather.

The first witness was Cornelius O'Brien, who said: I am a lodging-house-keeper, and reside at No. 5, Vine-yard, Harrow-street, Southwark Bridge-road. I let out beds to poor men and women, most of whom are persons who obtain a living by begging. On Thursday evening (last week) the deceased came to the door, and begged to be allowed to warm himself at the fire. I consented; and when he came in he seemed exceedingly cold, and was shivering. I asked him where he had come from, and he said that he had been in the Greenwich Union. He said that he had no money nor anything to eat, and evidently was suffering from want of food. I asked him why he did not make an application for assistance at the workhouse. He replied, "I have been there, but they pushed me away from the door." I then gave him a little gruel in a basin, but he was so weak that he dropped it on the hearth. I looked at him again, and said to my wife, "This man is dying." He was then placed in bed, and seemed to get better. I asked him his name, and he said that his name was John Tracy, of county Kildare. Whilst he was in bed he had a cup of cocoa and a piece of bread. He got up on Friday and went out, but returned, having made a second application to St. George's Workhouse. He again went to bed, and at three o'clock on Saturday morning I found he was getting worse. I therefore sent for a surgeon, but he died before assistance arrived.

Mr. W. Randall, surgeon, of Blackman-street, said that, from his experience in such cases, he thought death had been caused by want.

Mary Ann Julia O'Brien was next called, and corroborated the evidence of the first witness respecting the deceased being pushed away from the workhouse door. When he came back the second time, he said, "I am in want, and can eat a little food if I could get it." I then purchased him a turnip, and boiled it for him, which he ate. He had three-halfpence when he came back on Friday, which he had obtained by begging. The deceased came back and complained that, when he applied, they pushed him out, and he fell to the ground.

William Caslake and John Smead Lockhart, the two relieving officers, were next called, and, after seeing the body, they positively swore they had no recollection of the deceased having made an application. If he had, they certainly would have relieved him.

The Jury returned a verdict, "That the deceased died a natural death, accelerated by want."

Singular Death.—On Wednesday Mr. Mills held an inquest at the Middlesex Hospital on the body of Owen Murray, an Irish labourer, formerly living at 11, Russell-place. It appeared that the deceased, while dining on Sunday week, swallowed a piece of bone of considerable size, and, suffering much from the accident, became a patient at Middlesex Hospital. The bone was found to be fixed in the larynx, and on Monday last the inflammation and oppression of breathing increased, and an operation was recommended, but this he refused to undergo, and died the same night. In consequence of injurious accusations made by some Irish friends of the deceased against the hospital, the Governors thought it advisable to prove to the Jury that the operation might be performed with perfect safety, and a patient was brought in who had met with a similar accident, and having submitted to the operation was now doing well, respiration being carried on through a silver tube inserted into the larynx through an incision. The Jury returned a verdict "that the deceased died from suffocation," caused as above described.

Uplift the voice of melody, your choicest numbers bring,
Of grace divine the song shall be, and mercy's flowing spring;
We'll celebrate the mighty love of Him who, thron'd on high,
Descended from that throne above, to suffer and to die.

Uplift the voice of melody, to hail the glorious morn
That saw, in Beth'lem's manger lie, the wondrous Virgin-born;
We'll follow in the shining train of that seraphic band
Whose voices bore, in choral strain, the tidings through the land.

3.

Uplift the voice of melody, "to us a Son is given,"
Shout 'Peace, good will, and victory, the bonds of sin are riven;'
He comes, the Sun of Righteousness, with healing on his wings;
He comes, a ransom'd world to bless, to reign the King of kings!

Uplift the voice of melody, Hosanna to the Lord!
Let earth, let ocean, and let sky, take up the joyous word.
Hail, Christians, hail the glorious day that gave the Saviour birth!
To Him your grateful homage pay, Immanuel, God on earth!

LITERATURE.

Lucretia; or, the Children of Night. By the Author of "Rienzi," etc.

(Concluded from page 378.)

The point at which our notice ceased last week is a halt in the narrative, of which we must take advantage to bring our quotations to a close; and merely glance at the action of the story from this stage, whence it takes new ground.

After the death of Sir Miles, Lucretia, with her portion of £10,000, consoles herself with the loss of the Laughton estate in the hope of securing Mainwaring in marriage; but, the fierce nature of the Daughter of Night had merely captivated Mainwaring's understanding; his affections had been bestowed on her half-sister, Susan. An interview with Lucretia, after this has been revealed, is intensely written:—

"'My uncle was right,' she spake, as she surveyed the lovers—her own sister and her own betrothed—'there is neither courage nor honour in the base-born! He, the schemer, too, is right. All hollow—all false! Rise, sir,' she then added to Mainwaring, with her most imperious tone: 'Do you not hear your Susan weep: do you fear in my presence to console her? Coward to her as forsworn to me. Go, sir, you are free!' 'Hear me,' faltered Mainwaring, attempting to seize her hand; 'I do not ask you to forgive; but——' 'Forgive, sir,' interrupted Lucretia, rearing her head, and with a look of freezing and unspeakable majesty, 'There is only one person here who needs a pardon; but her fault is inexpiable: it is the woman who stooped—beneath her!' With these words, hurled from her with a scorn which crushed, while it galled, she mechanically drew round her form her black mantle: her eye glanced on the deep mourning of the garment, and her memory recalled all that love had cost her; but she added no other reproach. Slowly she turned away: passing Susan, who lay senseless in Mrs. Fielden's arms, she paused and kissed her forehead. 'When she recovers, Madam,' she said to Mrs. Fielden, who was moved and astonished by this softness, 'say that Lucretia Clavering uttered a vow, when she kissed the brow of William Mainwaring's future wife.'"

Susan and William are, in due time, united; and, after a vain effort to win the hand of Vernon (who weds an early love), whom she despises, Lucretia is married to her wily preceptor, Dalibard; and, just after the peace of Amiens, they remove to Paris. Here Dalibard finds employment under Buonaparte, as an agent of the palace police, and facilitates the betrayal and capture of Georges Cadoudal, the chief of the Chouan Conspiracy. Honours and rewards are his portion, but he is still needy: he removes a rich cousin, but is disappointed of his wealth: he then plots the removal of Lucretia, so that he may secure the half of her fortune, and wed his cousin's widow, whom he had wooed. These dark projects are shadowed forth by Gabriel Varney, who has a Satanic hatred for his father Dalibard: the boy and Lucretia are confirmed in their belief by finding a manuscript treatise on poisoning among Dalibard's papers. We had well nigh forgotten to mention a characteristic sketch of Gabriel's uncle, a roué painter, one of the most vivid chapters in the work.

A climax of unnatural horror now ensues: by the connivance of Gabriel and Lucretia, Dalibard is betrayed to one of his old accomplices in the spy system, and by him he is assassinated. After his death, Lucretia secures the poison treatises, and a poisoned ring, with which to carry on her diabolical share in the plot. It would be scarcely possible to convey to the reader any proximate idea of the criminal dye of this portion of the narrative: it is sickly and stagy morbid and melodramatic. "The First Part of the tragedy ends. Let fall the curtain. When next it rises, years will have passed away, graves uncounted will have wrought fresh hollows in our merry sepulchre—sweet earth! Take a sand from the shore, take a drop from the ocean, less than sand-grain, and drop in man's planet one Death and one Crime. On the map, trace all oceans, and search out every shore, more seas, more than lands, in God's balance shall weigh one Death and one Crime!"

The Second Part opens somewhat more healthily: the century has advanced some thirty years; "the rush of the deluge has ebbed back, the old landmarks have reappeared; the dynasties of Napoleon, willed into life, have crumbled to the dust; the plough has passed over Waterloo; autumn after autumn the harvests have glittered on that grave of an empire." Charles Vernon sleeps in the vault of the St. Johns, and Laughton descends to his son, now in his twenty-first year. Susan and Mainwaring, too, have died, leaving a lovely daughter, Helen. Lucretia reappears, paralytic and crippled, but still busy in thoughts and deeds of darkness. The boy Gabriel has grown in sensuality as in stature; "that uncurbed dominion of the senses to which his boyhood had abandoned itself found a willing slave in the man." Two more characters are now introduced—a street crossing-sweeper, and one John Ardworth, a law-student and a newspaper writer. On the night of the Coronation of William the Fourth, (1831,) Helen and young St. John meet in the crowd in St. James's-street, and fall in love at first sight. Beck, the crossing-sweeper, is employed by St. John, and ultimately taken into his service; his probation introducing us to some repulsive scenes of Jack Sheppardism, or "felon literature." Ardworth, too, is much noticed by St. John; but he is a most unreal creation; his oddity resembles stark madness! The young owner of Laughton, by aid of Beck, traces Helen to the house of Lucretia, her aunt, in a dull corner of Old Brompton. The wooing has little that is remarkable in it; and so, we pass it, merely noticing that during the interval, Percival St. John meets Gabriel, of whose pitchy nature, the ingenuous youth is scarcely sensible. There are several scenes, too, at Madame Dalibard's, (Lucretia,) in which the reader sympathises with the too susceptible St. John

As the tale nears the end, the plot thickens. Lucretia marries a dissenting tradesman at Liverpool, becomes disgusted with his hypocrisy and vulgarity, and poisons him off the scene. The offspring of this ill-assorted union, a boy, had been spirited out of the way by Ardworth, father to the young man just mentioned; he left the country soon afterward, and had not since been heard of. To seek out this son's identity, Lucretia employs Gabriel, who commissions one Grabman, a thieves' attorney; though Lucretia herself fancies young Ardworth to be her long-lost child. Her next plot is to accomplish the vow she made when she kissed her sister Susan's forehead; and, to revenge herself upon the Vernons, she resolves to remove Helen and Percy by poison; so that Ardworth, her fancied son, and whom she could mould to her will, may succeed to the estate.

Meanwhile, Gabriel Varney, who attaches himself to Percy St John, persuades him to invite Lucretia, with Helen and Varney, to Laughton; and here, under the old roof-tree, meet the serpent, her imp, and their victims, in the absence of Percy's mother, who alone is fully cognizant of Lucretia's early history. Poor Helen's health is not improved by the change: indeed, the wicked aunt is nightly sapping her system by poisonous potations. This process is, however, too slow for Varney: he presses her immediate death, as well to save himself from the consequences of forgery, as to satisfy Lucretia, who, at length, becomes the ministrant of death. though paralysed and crippled, in the dead of night, when, as she believes, every human eye that can watch her is sealed in sleep, she steals to Helen's chamber, and infuses the tasteless and colourless Aqua di Tufania in the morning draught meant to bring strength and healing. At length, the vile consummation approaches: Helen bending over the haggard brow of Lucretia, said in her ear, in the voice of command, "'Let me kiss you this night!' and her lips pressed that brow: the murderess shuddered, and closed her eyes; when she opened them, the angel visitor was gone." Night deepened and deepened into those hours from the first of which we number the morn, though night still is at her full. Moonbeam and starbeam came through the casements, "slyly and fairy like, as on that night, when the murderer was young and crimeless—in deed, if not in thought—that night, when, in the book of leech-craft, she meted out the hours in which a human life might still interpose between her passion and its end."

The crisis is at hand. Varney and Lucretia meet in a tapestried chamber, the impetuous villain reproaches the wicked woman with cowardice; Lucretia then produces a casket of poisons, which Varney burns, except a solution which he secretes on his person, and a large opal ring, made on the principle of that employed by Cæsar Borgia. This poison-treasure Lucretia places on her finger, adding, in case of detection, "It may be a refuge from the gibbet." Varney quits the room: at this moment, Lucretia looks up, and sees Beck, gliding from behind the tapestry, whence he had witnessed the fearful interview: "their eyes met—his were fascinated as the bird's by the snake's; Beck struck her to the ground; but she clung to him; she placed her hand upon the wrist of his lifted arm, and he felt a sharp pain, as if the nails had fastened into the flesh; at length, he threw the fiend to the ground, opened the door, sprang forward, and escaped. No thought had he of tarrying in that House of Pelops, those human shambles, of denouncing Murder in its lair; to fly, to reach his master, warn, and shield him—that was the sole thought which crossed his confused, bewildered brain." Lucretia recovers, Varney re-enters, and she relates to him what has just passed, urging him to secrete Beck for a few hours, adding, as she points to the fatal ring, "I have done the rest." Beck, however, has started on horseback, and is followed by Varney; the groom meets on the road Captain Greville, a guardian friend of St. John's, accompanied by Walter Ardworth, to whom Braddell, Lucretia's second husband, had intrusted the child; with them Beck returns to the Hall, and at the same moment, St. John arrives from London; whilst Varney has galloped on in the chances of safety or the gibbet.

The parties at the Hall are now confronted: Beck accuses Lucretia of the murder of her niece: she replies, but with scorn and defiance: at length she says to Ardworth:—

"'Where is my son? You say he is within these walls; call him forth to protect his mother! Give me at least my son—my son!' Her last words were drowned by a fresh burst of fury from her denouncer. In all the coarsest invectives his education could supply—in all the hideous vulgarities of his untutored dialect—in that uncurbed licentiousness of tone, look, and manner, which passion, once aroused, gives to the dregs and scum of the populace—Beck poured forth his frightful charges—his frantic execration. In vain Captain Greville strove to check him. In vain Walter Ardworth sought to draw him from the room. But, while the poor wretch, maddening not more with the consciousness of crime, than with the excitement of the poison in his blood, thus raved and stormed, a terrible suspicion crossed Walter Ardworth; mechanically, as his grasp was on the accuser's arm, he bared the sleeve, and on the wrist were the dark blue letters, burned into the skin—witnessing his identity with the lost Vincent Bradwell. 'Hold, hold!' he exclaimed then. 'Hold, unhappy man! it is your mother you denounce.' Lucretia sprang up erect—her eyes seemed starting from her head; she caught at the arm pointed towards her in wrath and menace—and there, amidst those letters that proclaimed her son, was the small puncture surmounted by a livid circle, that announced her victim. In the same instant she discovered her child in the man who was dooming her to the scaffold, and knew herself his murderess." He falls, and dies horribly; and, "in a wild laugh, fled for ever, till the Judgment-day, from the blackened ruins of her lost soul, the reason of the murderess-mother!" The laugh is heard by Helen, who, within a few minutes, dies without a pang.

At nightfall, Varney returns to the Hall: on the inquest, no facts are discovered that can trace Helen's death to any but a natural cause; and Beck's slight puncture in the wrist is unsuspiciously attributed to the prick of a rusty nail.

Varney being freed of suspicion by the verdict, quits Laughton, taking with him the form, for the mind was gone, of Lucretia Dalibard; but, he leaves his fearful companion at a madhouse, somewhat out of the main road; and Varney himself, soon after his return to London, is transported for the forgery to which we have already adverted, being handed over to the law by Grabman, the thieves' attorney, who has been foiled of the reward on Beck's discovery.

Lucretia exists, unknown and uncared for, in her living dissection-hall, a victim to cruel treatment; "her form undergoes all the change which the shape suffers when the mind deserts it; that prodigious vitality which belonged to the temperament, still survives it: no sign of decay is yet visible, Death, as if spurning the carcase, stands afar off." Of the other characters we need only mention that Ardworth rises to eminence in the law, and the closest brotherhood exists between him and Percival, who finds his fittest sphere in a narrow but intense circle of individual sympathy and charitable purpose.

Of the probable tendency of this work it is impossible to speak in commendatory terms, and at the same time discharge our duty to the reader. It is throughout a painful exhibition of flagrant guilt and moral turpitude; attractive, be it granted, to him who wooes terror to delight him, but harrowing and repulsive to the well-regulated mind. Of all the author's productions, this is, to our thinking, the most unequal work: the first volume is, in all respects, the best, reminding us of the novelist's most finished manner, and his powerful insight into the master-springs of human action. The second volume either overflows with fadé common-place, or reeks with festering vice, and dark pictures of humanity, at which many a kindly nature will shudder with disgust. The third volume is of more artistic construction than its immediate predecessor, and more intensely written: the climax is a terrific scene of guilt, illustrating one of the author's positions:—

> Our Acts our Angels are—or good or ill;
> The fatal shadows that walk by us still. —Fletcher

Yet, what can be expected of a tragedy in which the leading actors are such incarnations of wickedness as Dalibard, Lucretia, and Gabriel, three of the blackest "Children of Night" that ever haunted the brain of intellectual man? Of the poisoning machinery we need say but little; it may find its admirers among those who love to sup upon horrors, but we do not envy them their dreams. Still, as in most of Sir Bulwer Lytton's prose works, "Lucretia" displays, in the incidental scenes, an extensive sympathy with middle-class society—its every-day common-sense and error; and the passages in illustration of these are among the most life-like portions of the narrative.

It is but fair to acknowledge that in our notice of this work, the plan has admitted but a glance at its worst characteristics; or, rather, it shows the intensity of the plot, without any of its bright reliefs. Interspersed with its details of crime, are some exquisite passages, which prove the writer's opposite power—of ennobling humanity, by depicting some of its brightest phases. Still, these glintings are less forcible than the darker scenes: the novelist, like the Roman poet, is evidently more at home in painting from Hades, than from the "locos lætos" of Elysium or Earth. The brilliant thoughts and poetic imageries are by no means few, nor far between; but they only make us the more regret that the staple of the story has so few redeeming points of virtuous action.

BOOKS FOR CHRISTMAS.

A shoal of pleasant little books "for the season" has appeared within the last few days, in anticipation of generously disposed relatives and friends. These several works exhibit, more or less, a decided improvement in tone and treatment; and the writers appear to have "stolen a march" upon the children's books of other days. This department of our literature has, however, long been on the advance; and of good old Newbury's cheap books, with their golden-shot covers, little remains to remind us, unless it be traced in the act drop-scene at the Adelphi Theatre, which, by the way, very much resembles one of the antiquated bindings. Many years since, Sir Walter Scott applied his vigorous and tasteful mind to the exaltation of books for children; and, he not only condemned the practice of writing down to their capacities, but set the example of reform by producing some volumes of a much higher, yet equally attractive character. However, the volumes before us are not precisely of the class thus raised by "the Author of Waverley:" they combine, rather, the amusing lore of the Christmas books of old with the superior intelligence of our own day: they exercise the imagination and fancy of young folks, without making them think and talk as grown children; and, by teaching kindly duties in "ways of pleasantness," they sow the seed of many a generous virtue

First on our list is "The Good Genius that Turned Everything into Gold; or, The Queen Bee and the Magic Dress: A Christmas Fairy Tale; by the Brothers Mayhew. with Illustrations by George Cruikshank." (Bogue.) This is an admirable specimen of the onward spirit we have just referred to. The design is excellent—to exemplify the Magic of Virtue, or, rather, to show the romance of reality; and, by removing the intermediate events, and bringing the effects into close connection with their causes, to give a fairy character to that which is of every-day occurrence. All this is admirably worked out, both as regards literary construction, and artistical illustration. The story opens with Silvio, the woodman, in despair at the loss of his hut, which a flood has just swept away. "A Bee goes singing past him—merry as though it had taken a flower-cup too much;" the Woodman is about to borrow some of the Bee's honey—"the golden deposits from its little savings-bank;" he halts, resolving not to make the poor thing as houseless and destitute as himself, but to use honesty as the honey of his meal. This prudent resolve calls up the Fairy Bee, a tiny winged human figure, yet decidedly a Bee—the Good Genius—who reproves the despairing Silvio; he relates the loss of his hut to the Queen Bee, who, in return for sparing her hive, proffers herself as his Good Genius, to supply him with whatever he desires, on condition that he always solicits her aid in the fields at sunrise, and in the same rough dress that he then wears. Silvio, at first, merely desires to have his hut restored: her Fairyship is astonished at his modesty in refusing money, and chuckles with "you gentlemen of clay are funny people—you always aspire to very little at first, but, as you mount the ladder, you are sure to look down upon what you formerly looked up to as the height of happiness." This is the moral of the tale. Finally, the fairy Bee reveals herself as "the blessed Spirit of patient Industry." From this rapid outline of the tale, the reader will perceive there to be in it much pith, point, and purpose: how cleverly, and agreeably too, the machinery moves, the volume itself alone can tell. It is assisted by occasional apologues, somewhat too frequent, perhaps; though their antiquated dress sets off such descriptive bits as the following:—"The rising breeze of Sun-down began to make the trees shiver again, and the bright eye of Day was now fast getting bloodshot with the coming cold of Night, while the shadows of things had no longer the jolly plumpness of Noon, but were long, and thin, and miserable-looking, as though they were nipped and pinched up with the growing chilliness of the evening air." Again: "Aurora had just begun to light her fire in the grate of the East, and the old sun was still snug under the blankets of the horizon, when Silvio was roused from his slumbers by the early morning cries of the birds, who seemed to be shouting at the top of their voices, 'All a blowing, all a blowing! sweet spring flowers!' while, every now and then, a hook-nosed old crow went croaking by, as if it were crying, 'Clo! clo! clo!' to such of the feathered tribes as had recently moulted." This is in a vein of Homeric burlesque, and will delight readers of all growths! In short, there is a novelty and freshness throughout the Tale which will render it extremely popular, and achieve for its very suggestive writers instant position and fame. The Illustrations, by Cruikshank, are in his best vein.

"Christmas and Christmas Carols" (Sharpe) is an illustrated reprint of some of our most cherished Carols for this season of religious joy. It is prefaced by an interesting memoir on the Carol, in which we are reminded: "Bishop Taylor, in his Great Exemplar, fancifully remarks that the first Christmas Carol was the Hymn of the Angels to the Shepherds in the plains of Bethlehem—'Glory to God in the highest, on earth peace, good-will to men.'" This was introduced, at an early period, into the services of our Church; and was followed by other hymns of holy joy; and it is stated by the celebrated ritualist, Durandus, that anciently Bishops, on Christmas-day, sang "carols among their clergy" in the cathedrals. In a Latin poem, written about the middle of the fifteenth century, and soon after translated into English, the following allusion to the practice of caroling in church at Christmas occurs:

> A wooden child is on the altar set,
> About the which both boys and girls do dance and trimly jet;
> And carols sing in praise of CHRIST, and, for to help them here,
> The organs answer every verse, with sweet and solemn cheer"

Nor was the Christmas Carol, in these times, confined to the Church offices; for they have, doubtless, been sung in our villages and towns for many centuries; "and, on the blessed night, every one kept watch, like the shepherds, while minstrels chanted Christmas Carols." These ditties gladdened the festivals of Royalty, as well as the lowly board of the poor; for we read that when King Henry VII. kept his Christmas at Greenwich, immediately after his Majesty's first course, the dean and those of the King's chapel "sang a carall." This homage of the Sovereign to the "King of Kings," must have been an impressive scene. We must, however, leave this brochure, with a commendation of its judicious selection of Carols, which, by the way, is liberally illustrated with effective engravings; and is, altogether, a very acceptable offering.

"Irish Diamonds." By John Smith, with illustrations by "Phiz." (Chapman and Hall.) This is, likewise, a volume "for the season," though its contents may be best adapted for after-dinner practice. It professes to contain "a Theory of Irish Wit and Blunders, combined with other kindred subjects," and, in addition to its logical merit, the exemplars are very entertaining, occasionally familiar to be sure, which is but a testimonial of their worth, for poor wit, like bad wine, will not keep. The volume is profusely embellished by that clever delineator of Irish humour, "Phiz"

"My Own Annual, a Gift Book for Boys and Girls. Edited by Mark Merriwell (Chapman and Hall)," is a collection of tales, sketches of travel, curiosities of natural history, narrative and descriptive, neatly written or compiled, and profusely illustrated with wood cuts, of clever design and engraving. There is just enough of the playful, alternating with the informing, to be both amusing and useful to young readers.

"Picture Story Books, by Great Authors and Great Painters."—(Chapman and Hall)—Here is a little batch of four—1st. "Genius Goodfellow and the Woodcutter's Dog, By Charles Nodier."—2. "Good Lady Bertha's Honey-Broth, by Alexandre Dumas."—3. "Bean Flower and Pea Blossom, by Charles Nodier; and the Life of Punchinello, from Feuillet."—The several books are embellished with a host of cuts, designed by Tony Johannot and Bertall; and the majority of them have abundance of the vis comica, just the sort of attraction for our holiday groupes. To the French we are indebted for many of the most popular fairy tales in our nursery répertoire; and the above story-books can scarcely fail of being graceful contributions to the stock. They are produced in a tasteful style.

"Burns's Illustrated Catalogue" is a small quarto, containing specimen-pages of the engravings, letter-press, &c., of books issued by the publishers whose name it bears. As an assemblage of chaste design, and exquisite engraving, and masterly printing, this volume will be treasured by "collectors."

THE NATIONAL GALLERY

The National Gallery has been re-opened, after its usual vacation, with two additions of considerable importance, made by purchase. The first is a large "Boar-hunt in the Prado," by Velasquez. The second is an excellent small picture, by Annibal Caracci, which we have engraved.

"The Temptation of St. Anthony" has been successively in the Borghese Palace, and the two collections of Lord Radstock and Lord Dartmouth, from the last of whom it has been purchased. "The Temptation of St. Anthony" is a subject which has been frequently handled by the painters of the Dutch and Flemish schools, who have taxed their invention to produce the most hideous forms, and in endeavouring to carry out a lofty conception, have sunk to the ludicrous and the absurd. In the work before us, Caracci has avoided this extravagance, and his composition is full of poetic feeling, if not sublimity. The picture hangs next to the same Artist's splendid picture of "Christ appearing to Peter after his Resurrection."

THE TEMPTATION OF ST. ANTHONY.

BY ANNIBAL CARACCI.

Queen of the Arts, as once of Arms,
  Fair Italy! in thee we find
Still the ennobling, deathless charms
  Which throne the majesty of mind.
Still captives to thy triumph-car,
  Our thoughts wend towards the Capitol,
Where Genius, like the shepherds star,
  Shone o'er the cradle of the soul.

E'en from the depth of darkness, light
  Beam'd forth from thee. Thy poet's pen
And painter's pencil, glory-dight,
  Gain'd homage from the minds of men.
Oh! call them not unworthy arts,
  E'en in their pristine dwelling rude,
Which awed the fierce barbarian hearts
  That made God's Earth a solitude.

Saint Anthony, thy patron Saint,
  Fair Italy! was sore perplex'd;
With dire temptations was "acquaint"—
  Dire as thy "Adriatic vex'd"—
Bravely he overcame them all;
  The Virgin Alp among the rest:
And hence Italia's blessings fall
  Upon the good Saint's cowl or crest.

Nor yet unlauded be your name,
  Caracci, of the heavenly hues!
Brothers, yet rivals still in fame,
  Worthy the tribute of the Muse.
If music charms the savage breast,
  The pencil claims the like control,
Then be their mission ever blest,
  Far as the freeborn billows roll.

Earthquake in Wales.—An earthquake is stated to have been felt on Monday se'nnight at Amlwch. It was attended with a very slight tremor, and a noise like the rolling of carriages, ending in a whizzing sound. It took an horizontal direction over the west part of the town. The cattle in the neighbourhood where the shock was felt seemed terrified and ran to and fro. This phenomenon was preceded and succeeded by appearances which indicated an electrical state of the atmosphere. A variety of meteors were witnessed in the early part of the week, one in particular, which was stationary for two minutes, and ran its course due north.

CHURCH UNIVERSITIES, &c.

CAMBRIDGE. Dec. 12.

St. John's College.—The Rev. Frederick Calder, B.A., has just been elected to the Head Mastership of the Grammar School of Chesterfield, in Derbyshire.

Promotion.—The Rev. William Gabbett has been appointed to the incumbency of St. George's, Sutton, Macclesfield, vacant by the promotion of the Rev. John Burnet, LL.B., to the Vicarage of Bradford.

Dec. 16.

Crosse Scholarship.—The vacant scholarship has just been awarded to Edgar Huxtable, of St. John's College.

Jesus College.—Arthur Westmoreland, M.A., has just been elected a Foundation Fellow of this society.

ORDINATION.

The Lord Bishop of Durham held a general Ordination at his chapel, within Auckland Castle, on Sunday last, the 13th inst., when the following gentlemen were admitted into holy orders:—

Deacons.—Charles Henry Ford, B.A., University College, Durham; Charles Edmond Tinley, B.A., University College, Oxford; John Alfred Lamb Airey, B.A., Pembroke College, Cambridge.

Priests.—Rev. George Hayton, M.A., University College, Durham; Rev. Josiah Downing, B.A., Corpus Christi College, Cambridge; Rev. Hopkins Badnall, B.A., University College, Durham; Rev. William Sawers, B.A., Trinity College, Cambridge; Rev. John George Edwards, B.A., Trinity College, Cambridge; Rev. Francis Henry Maude, St. Bee's Theological Institution, Cumberland; Rev. Joseph Bleaymire Steel, B.A., Exeter College, Oxford; Rev. Walter Featherstonhaugh, M.A., University College, Durham.

The Weather in the Country.—A vast quantity of snow has fallen in various parts of the provinces, particularly in the north and north-west, as well as part of the south of England, and also in Scotland. In many parts between Carlisle and Edinburgh, the snow lies to the depth of eight or nine feet. The Moors of Westmoreland and Cumberland are quite impassable; and in the neighbourhood of the city of Durham, and other parts of the county, the snow has drifted to the depth of about eight feet, and in the vicinity of Margate, Ramsgate, Dover, Canterbury, &c., to the depth of nearly three feet. At Swansea, Abergavenny, Carnarvon, &c., the snow is many feet deep. Many men are employed on the various lines and roads in order to clear away the snow; but, from the constant drifting of snow, the work has proved comparatively abortive. In consequence, a very general detention of the mails has occurred on the railways as well as on the ordinary roads.

Metropolitan Improvements.—On Tuesday several houses, situated in Upper St. Martin's-lane, on the east side, were disposed of by auction, by direction of the Mercers' Company, for the purpose of being taken down, to carry out the improvements contemplated by the Commissioners of Woods and Forests. The whole of the houses from the corner of Long-acre to Great St. Andrew-street are to be cleared away, when, instead of the present curve of buildings, a straight line of lofty houses, with shops, will be erected at the expense of the Company.

Cheapness of Poultry and Game in the Metropolis.—Notwithstanding the high price of provisions generally, poultry and game is now selling in London at unusually low prices. Pheasants are being sold at 4s. a brace; hares at 1s. 6d. each; geese at 3s. each; and fowls at 3s. a couple. On Wednesday there was a large arrival in London of live ducks and geese for the poultry markets at Christmas.

DESTRUCTION OF FLIXTON HALL BY FIRE.

We regret to record the entire destruction of the fine old "ancestral home," situate at a short distance from Bungay, in Suffolk. The details of the catastrophe are as follow:—

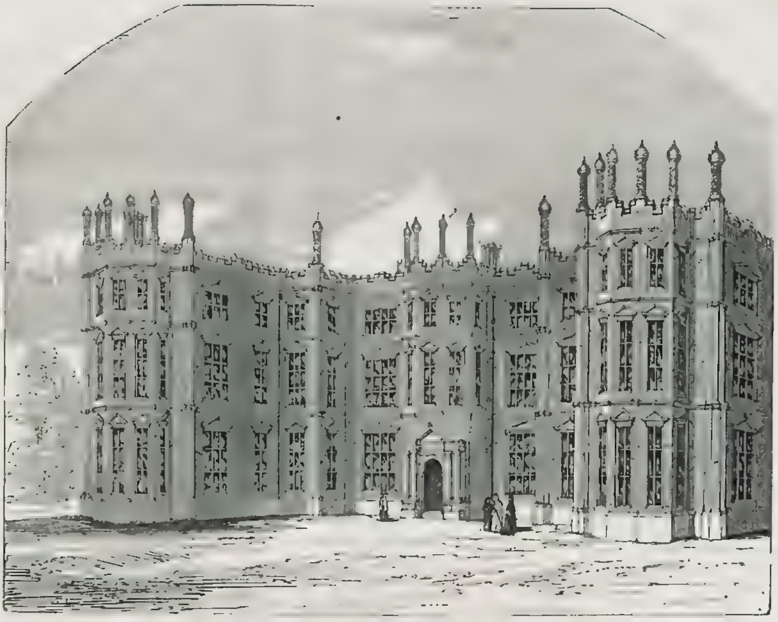
At about two o'clock [illegible]unday morning, the ringing of the church bells and [illegible] cry of "Fire!" aroused the inhabitants of Bungay, and, upon the locality being ascertained, one of the town engines and the powerful one of the silk-mills at Ditchingham, were, after a short delay in procuring horses, despatched, followed by hundreds of persons, who were quickly joined at the scene of the fire by an engine from Harleston; but so rapid had been the progress of the flames, and so entirely had they obtained the ascendancy, that comparatively nothing could be saved; and the house, with its furniture (some of which was very costly), its pictures, fine old china, &c., fell a sacrifice to the flames. The fire was not subdued till late on Sunday evening.

Another account states:—Late on Saturday night a dreadful fire broke out at Flixton-Hall, the residence of Sir Robert Shafto Adair. It appears that about twelve o'clock at night, a boy was passing along the road adjoining the parks when his attention was called to a great body of flame issuing from the window, of the Hall. He immediately gave an alarm, and aroused the servants. Shortly afterwards, the engines arrived and began to play on the burning pile, but not to much effect, as the fire had got such a hold as to defy all their efforts to stop it. The mansion was destroyed, with all its valuable and ancient pictures (one worth 1,000 guineas), and costly furniture. Nothing was saved from the flames but a few bolsters and pillows. The family were absent, and there were only six domestics in the house at the time

A messenger was despatched to Norwich, in order to communicate, per telegraph, the intelligence to Sir Shafto Adair, in London; and, in the evening, Mr. A. S. Adair, the elder son, arrived.

The bare walls are standing, the whole being completely gutted. The Hall has been under extensive repair the last half-year, and a great number of hands have been employed: many of their tools were consumed. The loss cannot at present be estimated, but it is thought that £40,000 will not cover the damage.

Flixton is stated to have been built about the year 1615, and continued to be the residence of the ancient family of Tasborough, from the site of its erection to the middle of the present century, when it was purchased by the late William Adair, father of the present owner, created a Baronet in 1838. The building has been attributed to Inigo Jones; but it has the earlier characteristics of shafts, like the ornamented chimneys of the Elizabethan style, at the bayed projections of the wings and centre. The whole edifice had a vast number of windows, all of them pedimented. The doorway is arched, and flanked by coupled columns, supporting a pediment. The pillars are placed on pedestals (ornamented with lozenges), elevated on the base. The building is battlemented; and the corners of the wings have buttresses, rising similar to chimney-shafts. The whole appearance is, or rather was, noble; and the building was a good specimen of the mixed style prevalent in the seventeenth century, but not a highly enriched one,—not so highly, at least, as many of the old halls to be met with in Suffolk and Norfolk. We have engraved he principal or northern front.



FLIXTON HALL, SUFFOLK, DESTROYED BY FIRE, ON SUNDAY LAST.

Of the artistical treasures of the mansion we find the following account in Raw's Pocket-book, of some years since:—

"In the hall are busts of the Right Hon. C. J. Fox, Lord Keppel, and General Wolfe. In the staircase, above the door entering the saloon, is a fine bust of Inigo Jones, who built the house. The saloon contains thirty-four paintings, by various masters, among which are the following:—A Madonna and Child; Saint Peter and the Angel; Fruit and Flowers, by Van Os; Saint Mark's, at Venice, by Canaletti; Landscapes, by Tilemans; Sea Pieces, by Vandervelde, &c. The library contains a choice collection of books; a portrait of W. Adair, Esq., with his groom and two horses; a portrait of the Duke of Bolton's famous horse Sweepstakes: both this and the saloon are excellent rooms. In an adjoining bedroom is a portrait of General Huss, of Elling House; a Turkish Lady; a Battle Piece; Joseph and Potiphar's Wife, &c., all very finely painted. In the other bed-rooms are the following paintings:—St. John the Baptist's head; St. Agnes; Mark Anthony and Cleopatra; a Sleeping Venus; Lucretia, &c. In the dining-room is a portrait of the present proprietor of this mansion, whose pleasant countenance confirms the public report of his politeness and urbanity. In the drawing-room are judiciously collected together the portraits of the late Duke of Richmond, his father, his mother, and sister, by Sir Joshua Reynolds; the late Duke of Cumberland; Sir Charles Saunders, by Sir Joshua Reynolds; Lord Anson, Keppel, Lord Albemarle, General Hughson, Lord George Lennox, General Napier, &c."

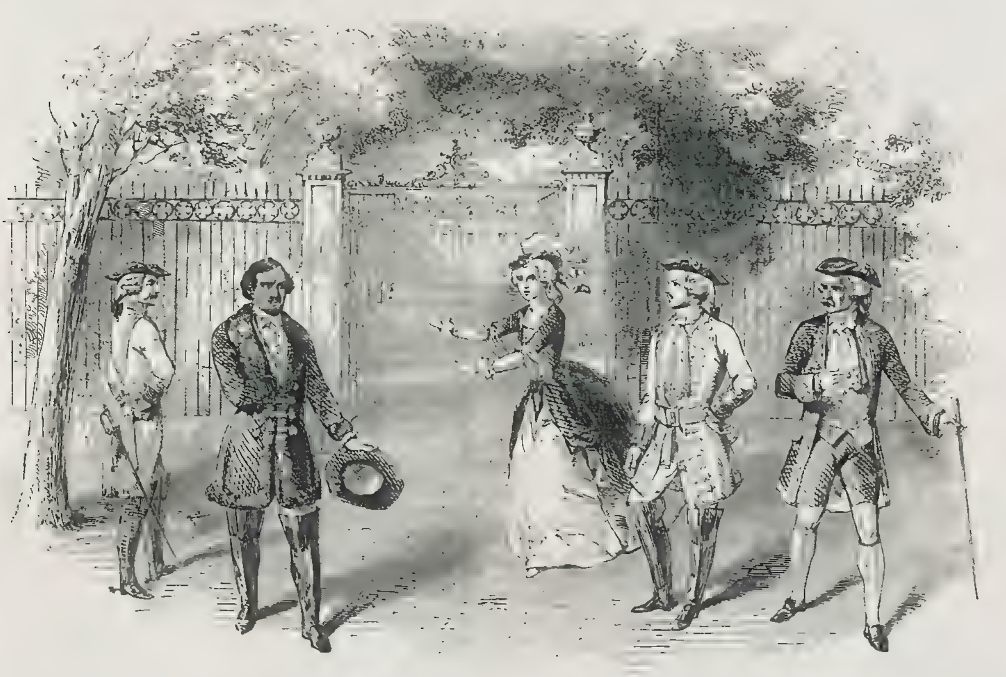
MUSIC.

DRURY LANE THEATRE

Balfe's opera of "The Bondman," with Mr. Bunn's libretto, the production of which we could but briefly refer to in our last week's publication, has been performed every night with signal success. Unanimity seems to prevail for once amongst the critics as to the merits of this new work: it is universally regarded as Balfe's best composition, and as Bunn's best poem. On the story, founded as it is on the well-known "Chevalier de St. Georges," rendered so popular by the fine acting of Lafont at the French Plays, it is unnecessary to dwell. The author has adhered closely to the original piece, only changing the names, and making the dénouement pass in the park, instead of in the Chevalier's chamber, thereby enabling Grieve to display some charming dioramic effects of sunrise.

In the first act, there is the exhibition of the varied accomplishments of the Chevalier, called Ardenford the Bondman (Mr. Harrison), by which he charms the Creole widow, Madame Corinne (Miss Romer), and excites the envy of Count Floreville (Mr. Rafter), to whom she is betrothed. There is the duel with the jealous Innkeeper (Mr. S. Jones), the Chevalier using the soup-ladle against the sword—there is the shooting of the cap, and fixing it as a sign-board —there is the arrest of the Chevalier by a lettre de cachet of the Marquis of Vernon (Weiss), the Count's father—and the trick by which the Count is removed to the Bastille, instead of Ardenford. In the second act is the discovery of the Widow that the Mulatto Chevalier is Camille, a St. Domingo slave, who had escaped from the colony, after having been ignominiously struck by her mother. Madame Corinne has always loved Camille, and gives him the act of emancipation, on identifying him, but the Count, having discovered that he is a slave, denounces him; the Chevalier is, however, enabled to demand satisfaction for the outrage by displaying Corinne's generous gift of freedom. In the third act, are the preparations for the duel à mort, which is happily prevented by the timely discovery that Camille is the Marquis's son, and consequently the Count's half-brother, and all ends happily, after a most exciting drama, which has been mounted by Mr. Bunn, with that careful attention to the details, and recklessness of outlay, which characterise the mise en scène at this establishment.

Miss Romer has four superb dresses, and looks remarkably well in the powdered wig. Mr. Harrison's figure is not well adapted for the costumes of the time of Louis the Sixteenth; and we think he was wrong in not having, like Lafont, the powdered hair, instead of a black wig; but tender tenors are susceptible creatures, and perhaps we are wrong. As an actor, Mr. Harrison came out in a manner to astonish his most ardent admirers. He had evidently taken much pains with the part, and by his vigour he conveyed a very accurate notion of the Indianic temperament of the Chevalier, not suppressed by his courtly education. In polish and finesse, of course, something might be gained by a study of Lafont; but on the whole it was a very animated piece of acting. Miss Romer is most charming in her delineation of the Widow Corinne. Mr. Rafter's representation of the coxcomb Count had some good points. Weiss evinced more stage ease in his assumption of the father; and Harley's Valet, Mal-à-propos, is a first-rate sketch, which always enlivens the audience.



S[illegible] FROM MR. BA[illegible] OPERA OF THE "BONDMAN," AT DRURY LANE THEATRE—THE DUEL.

The music is destined to as much popularity as the "Bohemian Girl." It is, however, far superior to the latter production. Mr. Balfe has been most felicitous in his themes, has less laid himself open to the charge of plagiarism, and has evinced more orchestral powers than in any former opera. The opening Hunting Chorus, with its various reprises, is vigorously written, and the hunting chorus in the last act, "Through Wood and through Forest," although of the old form, is nicely harmonised. The unaccompanied quartet, "There is a Destiny," in the last act, for two tenors and two basses, is likely to be enrolled in the libraries of all glee clubs. The Quintet and Finale is well constructed. The concerted piece terminating the second act is, however, the most effective in the entire opera. It is broad in its proportions, with rich harmonies, unisonous effects, and fine sequences, and the whole has a vivid dramatic colouring, worthy of any composer, and highly descriptive of the stage situations and their conflicting passions. The overture is indifferent It is in the symphonic form, but bears all the marks of haste. The ballads will come in due course to the organs. The encores nightly, are for Miss Romer, in the "Child of the Sun," the theme of which is skilfully used by the composer in subsequent periods of the opera. Mr. Rafter's air, "On Zephyr's wings" has a most elegant accompaniment. Mr. Harrison's ballad, "They say there is some distant land," is, perhaps, the weakest in the score. In the second act, there are two safe encores every night—the first is Weiss, in a capital buffo air, "There is nothing so perplexing," and the second is Miss Romer, in a most lovely ballad, "It is not form, it is not face," destined to find its way into every drawing-room, and sang with impassioned feeling. The great duo between Miss Romer and Mr. Harrison, "The colour which had left thy cheek," excites the most rapturous plaudits; and the air "Love in language," sung by Miss Romer, is quite a gem. In the third act, she has a romance. "Go, memory, go," and there is a duo of intense passion between Weiss and Harrison. After three hearings of "The Bondman," we feel more and more persuaded of its manifold beauties. It is now in good working order, and Mr. Schira conducts the orchestra with zeal and intelligence. If he would study to sustain the voices a little more, the opera would gain. Mr. Tully has carefully drilled the choruses.

CONCERTS.

Society of British Musicians—At the fourth Concert, on Monday last, at Erat's Harp Saloon, Mozart's beautiful Quartet in C, No. 6, for two violins, tenor and violoncello, was admirably executed by Messrs. E. W. Thomas, Watson, Hill, and Lucas. The same players performed a MS. Quartet in B flat, by Mr. C. E Horsley, a clever but not a brilliant piece of writing. A MS. Sonata in G, for pianoforte and violoncello, composed by Mrs. Reinagle, late Miss Orger, and nicely interpreted by herself and Mr. Lucas, is an additional proof of this accomplished pianist's skill in instrumental composition, of the classical school. Spohr's grand Trio in F, for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, splendidly rendered by Messrs. H. B. Richards, E. W. Thomas, and Lucas, was a great treat. Mr. Richards is one of our best English players, and as a composer has already gained distinction, although but young in the profession. We are glad to learn that he is to write a Ballet Opera for Drury-Lane Theatre. The vocal gleanings were Mr. C. E. Stephens's Canzonet, "If that high world," sung by Miss P. A. Robinson; Miss Kate Loder's song, "The Winter, it is Past," in which that intelligent vocalist, Miss Bassano, was encored; Mr. Macfarren's song, "As Mines of Countless Treasure," sung by Miss Bassano; Mr. Loder's song, from the popular Opera of "The Night Dancers;" "Believe Me, Honest Friends," sung by Mr. Bodda, and the Rossinean Duo, "Anna tu Piangi," sung by Miss Bassano and Mr. Bodda. Mr. Gattie was the Director, and Mr. R Barnett the Accompanyist. The fifth Concert will be on the 28th inst.

Mr. James Howe and Mr. F. Cuisset's Vocal Concert—The programme of this very attractive Concert, given on Monday last, at Crosby Hall, contained an admirable selection of Madrigals, Glees, and Choruses, by John Barnett, Benet, Wilbye, Stevens, Rooke, Webbe, Goss, &c., executed by a full chorus of "The Gentlemen of the Abbey Glee Club," and from Westminster Abbey. The solo singers were Miss Cubitt, the Misses Williams, Messrs. Lockey, Hobbs, Lyon, Kench, Hill, J Howe, Cuisset, W. and J. Coward, Barnby, Hodson, Master Gurney, &c. The Misses Williams were encored in an elegant Duo by Charles Glover, "The Fairy Dance;" and in Horn's duet, "Merrily Trip." Messrs. W. L. Phillips, Guest, and Edgar, were applauded in one of Corelli's trios, executed on two violoncellos and contra-basso. Mr. Sedgwick performed a concertina solo with great ability. The conductors were Mr. Turle, Mr. W. L. Phillips, and Mr. J. Howe.

Dempster's Original Ballad Soirees.—On Wednesday night this vocalist, who is a native of this country, but has been singing for ten years in America with great success, gave his first Musical Entertainment in London, at the Princess' Concert Room, in Castle-street. Mr. Dempster has a tenor voice, with an unpleasant nasal twang. His style is by no means refined, but he has feeling. In his compositions he has largely borrowed from the Irish Melodies. He was encored in the "Blind Boy," the words, by Miss Gould, being pretty. We do not think Mr. Dempster has sufficient power to command the attention and secure the suffrages of an auditory by his single exertions, but as a ballad-singer at miscellaneous concerts he would be welcome.

MUSICAL CHIT-CHAT.

Mr. Wallace's new opera for Drury Lane Theatre will be produced in the course of the ensuing month. Our Vienna letters announce that Mr. Pratten, an English flute player, has met with great success in that capital. At the first Philharmonic Concert, Beethoven's Choral Symphony was performed, and Weber's "Oberon" overture, the latter being encored. Füch's new opera of "Guttenberg" was to have been produced on the 1st inst. Mdme. Schumann (the celebrated Clara Weck) had arrived in Vienna, and was to give a Concert on the 10th. She is regarded as the best classical pianiste in Germany. Our Parisian advices announce that Gardoni, the Italian tenor, who withdrew from the French Grand Opera, because he was allotted the second part in Rossini's "Robert Bruce," Bettini having the first, appeared on Thursday week, in Donizetti's opera of "L'Elisir d'Amore." His first act was a failure, owing, it was stated, to his trepidation; but, in the second, he sang better, and was applauded. He is regarded as an agreeable, but not a great tenor, and in no way, as the journals remark, to be compared with Mario in the same part. M. Leon Pillet, the Académie Director, has brought on action against M. Vatel, the Director of the Italiens, for a breach of the Government regulations, prohibiting managers of the three lyrical theatres in Paris from taking away each other's performers. M. Vatel pleads that Gardoni's contract was informal, and that M Pillet has stolen the Italian répertoire by the production of "Otello," "Lucia," &c. "Robert Bruce" has been again postponed, owing to Madame Stiltz's indisposition, and to the necessity of making some changes in the pasticcio. Madame Viardot Garcia, after a brilliant success in Berlin—quite rivalling Jenny Lind—has returned to Paris.

On Monday next the second of the Sacred Concerts will be given at Crosby Hall, and on Wednesday Handel's "Messiah" will be repeated by the Sacred Harmonic Society, at Exeter Hall, with Madame Caradori Allan, Miss Hawes, Messrs. Manvers and Phillips. This Oratorio was well executed on Monday last, at the Eastern Institution. Mr. Wilson closes his month's campaign at Crosby Hall on Tuesday next. Mr. Allcroft's spirited Promenade Concerts at the Lyceum terminated on Tuesday last. Coleman's Casino de Venise and Bal Ridotto, at the National Baths, Holborn, were opened on Thursday night, of which we shall report progress next week, as also of Rodwell's new opera, at the Princess' Theatre, "The Seven Maids of Munich," sustained by Miss S. Flower, Miss Marshall, Messrs. Allen, Leffler, Compton, Walton, &c. Loder's opera of "The Night Dancers" continues to draw good houses, although the Giselle is very inefficiently sustained by the substitute for Madame Albertazzi, whose health, we regret to learn, is in a declining state. A prima donna for the Princess' is now much wanted, as Miss S. Flower's voice is a contralto. As Mdlle. Nau is included in the cast of "Robert Bruce," in Paris, it is doubtful when she can arrive. The appointment of Mr. Loder as Musical Director and Conductor has been a judicious step on the part of Mr. Maddox. Since the above was in type, we learn that Miss Bassano, a pupil of the Royal Academy of Music, who has sung with success in Italy, has been engaged to appear in a new Opera, as the Prima Donna of the Princess' Theatre.

THE THEATRES.

HAYMARKET.

The farce of "Story Telling; or, 'Novel' Effects," which was to have been played last week, was performed entire, on Wednesday evening, for the first time. The plot is very slight, and not very remarkable for novel incident. Doctor Hardenburg (Mr. Farren) is a physician attached to botanical studies, and also to his ward Theresa (Miss Telbin), who is also his niece. She is engaged to be married to him, but has a young officer lover, Frederick (Mr. Caulfield), who, as one of the visiters to a botanical garden which the Doctor has thrown open to the public, bribes the young lady's waiting-maid Rose (Mrs. Humby), to carry letters to her; and also avails himself of the services of a drummer, Raps (Mr. Buckstone). The Doctor has a sturdy honest servant, Grab (Mr. Rogers), who lets him into the secret. On being taxed with the attachment, Theresa does not confess the truth, but still declares that she is in love with her aged guardian. Doctor Hardenburg, however, finds a letter containing her real sentiments, which the maid pretends to be a portion of a novel; but being a worthy, benevolent man, he gives her up to her younger admirer. There is very little, indeed, it will be seen, in this; the only new point was, that at the end Raps refuses to marry Rose, to whom he has promised marriage to aid his master's views, for the reason that he has a wife already living. We do not often find an instance of the comic man of a piece behaving in such an ungallant manner to the lady's maid. The farce was very well played, but there was not a great opportunity, for any of the performers to make much of their characters. We are, however, bound to record its success. The applause was mild, certainly; but, at the same time, we heard no less favourable sounds.

The Christmas piece here is an extravaganza from the pen of Mr. Planché, founded on the old fairy tale of "The Invisible Prince." Mr. Bourcicault has a five act comedy ready for production, which, we believe, will take precedence of Mr. Jerrold's.

LYCEUM.

Mr. Allcroft brought his concert season to a close on Wednesday evening, finishing with a Bal Masqué termed a "Neapolitan," one which was calculated to give strangers a singular notion of the amusements usually followed by the inhabitants of Naples. It was, however, a very lively affair; and but for the annoying intrusions of two or three dull persons, apparently hired to be funny and fearfully failing in their intentions, would have been exceedingly good. Very tolerable order was, however, preserved, looking to the mass of persons packed together in a comparatively limited arena; and the masters of the ceremonies did all they could to arrange the dances to the satisfaction of the visitors. M. Laurent, from the Casino, conducted the band with great spirit; and the audience portion of the house was filled with spectators.

As soon as the company had departed the workmen commenced restoring the theatre to its original state. It will open on Monday evening with "The Battle of Life," and not this evening, Mr. Dickens having wished that a day or two should intervene between the publication of the book and the production of the play, in order that some portion at least of the audience might have read the original.

ST. JAMES'S.

On Tuesday evening, the original Ethiopian Serenaders, whose success has given birth to so many imitators, re-appeared at this house, after a long tour in the provinces; in the course of which they had the honour of appearing before her Majesty and Prince Albert, at Arundel Castle. They have increased the number of their band to six, and have now three banjos. The programme consisted of all the old favourite songs, which were warmly applauded. "Buffalo Gals," and "Old Dan Tucker," were encored: and the same compliment was paid to a new song "My Skiff is on the Shore," admirably sung by one of the company. Our friend "Bones" has lost none of his activity. His indignation when the "Buffalo Gals" would not come out this evening—his fright during the Phantom Chorus—and his delight at hearing news of Old Dan Tucker, were inimitable. He was called upon to repeat his duet with Mr. Stanwood on the accordion. Much fun was created by a card being thrown from a private box with a request for a particular song written on it, which they pretended to be unable to read, and passed from one to the other in most amusing assumption of ignorance. The performance concluded with the Railroad Overture, in which the Tambourine was so remarkably excited, that the marvel was how he was ever quieted again.

The house was filled to overflowing. Every box was occupied, and it was with some little difficulty we were enabled to peep over the heads of a luckier portion of the audience in the slips.

FRENCH PLAYS.—ST. JAMES'S.

There was no performance at this theatre on Wednesday evening, much to the disappointment of the habitués, who were looking forward to see Mdlle. Brohan as Jean, in Scribe's very clever comedy of "Bertrand et Raton." The indisposition of the lady was the cause of the house being closed; but the piece was announced for representation last evening. We shall speak of it next week at length. It is the first time it has been performed on these boards, although the English version of it, "The Minister and the Mercer," has long been familiar to playgoers. The engagement of Mdlle. Brohan terminates before Christmas. We recommend our readers, before she leaves, to witness her very clever and agreeable performance.

SONG FOR WINTER.

BY C. WEBSTER JENNINGS.

Oh! dreary doth the wintry blast come o'er yon snow-capp'd hill;
Close shut the windows—bar the door—keep out the blighting chill;
And let the song resound the hall, and winter mirth begin
The more of clouds there are without, the less of clouds within;
And let the festive board be spread, leave summer's languid face,
And join the dance with airy tread, with merry winter's pace;
Or throng around the blazing hearth, as done in olden time,
When hypocrites were scarcely known, and laughing was no crime.

I'll have no neighbours' deeds called o'er—no scandal is my guest
But let us think, whate'er they've done, they did it for the best,
And let the merry loud round-game fill up that want and dearth
And all be youth and happiness, and innocence and mirth.
And let us know the really good—as light comes with the day,
By all that's cheering, gay, and glad, rejoicing in his way;
And, by examples pure and true, shine as in olden time.
When hypocrites were scarcely known, and laughing was no crime.

And let us ne'er, amidst our joy, forget the poor must share,
For God has placed them all around, to be within our care;
Not only to direct them straight along the path of life,
But, feed and clothe and warm them too, amidst cold winter's strife.
For shall the man who reaps our corn, when summer's sun is high,
Be all neglected by us now, to see his earnings die?
Or shall we tell him future things to hope for better there,
While hungry children round him cling, and drive to wild despair?

No! they shall share while bread remains, their children clad shall be,
And fuel to defy the snow, and light their cot of glee;
Oppression shall not enter there—that man no sorrow bear—
And all his benefactors' names shall sound at evening prayer.
Then let the festive board be spread, far, far, and wide around,
And let those most in need of all amidst our feasts be found;
Or throng around the blazing hearth, as done in olden time,
When hypocrites were scarcely known, and laughing was no crime.

COUNTRY NEWS.

Representation of Bath.—A letter has been received from Lord Ashley declining to become a candidate, at the next dissolution or vacancy, for that city

Election for Norwich.—Joseph Hume, Esq., M.P., has been named as a candidate for Norwich, in conjunction with Mr. J. H. Gurney.

Monument to Thomas Clarkson. On Monday a meeting took place at the Shirehall, Woodbridge, Suffolk, to take into consideration the propriety of erecting a monument to the memory of the late Thomas Clarkson Esq. in Playford Church. Robert Newton Shawe, Esq., as Chairman, stated that he had received communications from upwards of seventy individuals, anxious to promote the object in view. The Rev. Webster proposed that a monument be erected outside the church. This was seconded by Mr. Taylor, and carried by a large majority.

Staffordshire Models. -We have just seen a very novel Jug, designed and modelled by Mr. H. Baggeley, of Tontine street, Hanley, which occupied the young self-taught artist nearly ten months. The Jug is of sexagonal form, and each side bears a portrait of one of "the Distin Family," and the handle is composed of their favourite instruments -the Saxe-horns. The colour of the stoneware is rich gold, deeper inside; and the Jug is made in fifteen different sizes—from one pint to ten quarts. The latter size has a massive appearance; the figures are cleverly modelled; and the artist bids fair to become as distinguished in his art as those whose skill he has commemorated by his genius.

Distress in Liverpool. -Throughout the last fortnight the arrivals of vessels in the port of Liverpool have been very few, owing to the prevalence of easterly winds and the number of ships wind-bound in foreign ports. On one or two days not a single vessel from abroad has entered the Mersey, an occurrence of great rarity. The consequence has been great scarcity of employment amongst those who depend for their support on the proceeds of their labour at the docks. Large bodies of porters, dock labourers, and the men usually employed by lumpers have been entirely destitute of occupation, and deprived of their usual resources at a time when the inclemency of the weather renders them less able than ever to bear up against privation.

Shocking Accident on the Bolton Railway.—On Wednesday morning, as the express train, which leaves Fleetwood at nine o'clock, was on its way to Manchester, in passing through a deep cutting at Clifton, half-way between Bolton and Manchester, the engine got off the line, and was the cause of a very fatal occurrence. The ground was exceedingly hard, and covered in places with frozen snow, so that the wheels of the engine, instead of sinking into it, and bringing the train to a speedy stand-still, passed over it some fifteen or twenty yards before the wheels got clear of the rails, and the engine then seems to have ascended the sloping bank of the cutting, to the height of about four or five feet, along which it ran for about forty yards further, and then fell over upon the rails. The engine-driver, Jos. Allen, was killed on the spot. Thomas Tinsley, the stoker, jumped off, but, unfortunately, on the side of the rails; and the wheels of a succeeding carriage passed over him, cutting off a portion of one foot, and the other leg at the calf. None of the passengers were seriously hurt, though many received very severe contusions. No cause could be assigned for the train getting off the line.

Death of Mr. John Bellamy.—Mr. John Bellamy, many years housekeeper to the House of Commons, died on Thursday morning, at his house in Woburn-square, aged 75.

A Quack Doctor Committed for Manslaughter.—On Friday (last week) an adjourned inquest was held at Hull, on the body of Mrs. Cox, wife of a tobacco-merchant. Being afflicted with a fungus tumour on her wrist, her medical advisers determined to amputate her arm to save her life. She was advised to consult a farmer named Cotton, who professed to cure everything, and had a large practice in all ranks. He rubbed red powder on the tumour and inflamed parts, promising not only to save her arm, but cure the tumour. She died in a few days, and a post-mortem examination took place. It appeared she had died from the application of arsenic, which had poisoned the whole system. The Jury found Cotton guilty of Manslaughter, and he was committed to York Castle

Accident to the Earl of Lauderdale.—We regret to state that his Lordship, while out with a shooting party on the 9th inst., at Drumore, on the lands of the Earl of Selkirk, near St. Mary's Isle (Scotland), unfortunately met with an untoward accident. After firing, he was in the act of reloading, when, from small portions of wadding having been left in the gun, or some other cause unknown, the powder flask exploded, and was blown into pieces. His Lordship's hand escaped injury; but his eyes and face were severely scorched. He is, however, convalescent.

Awfully Sudden Deaths.—Mr. Wilkinson, the well-known indigo broker in the City, died suddenly at his house at Greenwich, on Tuesday. Mr. Wilkinson retired to rest at twelve o'clock on Monday night, apparently in the best health and spirits, and was found dead in his bed at nine o'clock next morning. ——On Wednesday morning, as Mr. William Wright, of Mill-hill, florist, was about to rise from his bed, he was suddenly seized with an apoplectic fit, and died instantly, without uttering a word. The deceased was highly respected among a numerous circle of friends in the neighbourhood of Hendon. He was fifty-six years of age, and on the night previously was in the enjoyment of vigorous health.——Another melancholy instance occurred on Wednesday afternoon, at the residence of S. Ker David, Esq., the Member for Downpatrick, No. 11, Upper Grosvenor-street, Grosvenor-square. It appears that some portion of the above gentleman's family, who had just arrived by the North Eastern Railway, engaged a cab to convey them and their luggage to the above street. On arriving there, the driver, whose name was Thomas Taylor, [illegible] Praed-street, Paddington, was requested to carry part of the luggage upstairs, which he readily did. He shouldered a very large portmanteau, and was proceeding upstairs with his burden. On arriving at the drawing-room door, he was suddenly heard to exclaim, "May God help me," and immediately fell to the floor, and instantly expired.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We have to acknowledge, with thanks, the receipt of original Problems from "C. R. L——e," Mr. Kuiper, "S. B.," "T. R. M.," "Philo-Chess," "The Rev. J. H. S.," "Sphinx," Mr. Horwitz, "C. F.," "A. L——n," and Mr. Kling.

"W. H. A." Try it once more.

"C. F. S."—1st. Some very pretty positions have been constructed, of late, upon the principle of permitting White to Castle, as one of his moves; but, we confess, it appears to us that Castling, in a Problem, is not strictly admissible.—2nd. The dictum of such a writer as you mention goes for nothing among good players.—3rd. Cigar-smoking is allowed at the London Chess Club.—4th. We do not know the subscription to the Finsbury Chess Club.

"A. M. Z."—A person having advanced a Pawn to its 8th sq, is bound to exchange it for some piece before another move is made; and his adversary can refuse to play until the exchange is made.

"E. A." -You can Castle but once in each game.

"A Foreigner."—The Volumes of the Illustrated London News for last year, and the current one, contain the whole of the Chess articles which have been published since this department of the paper has been under its present management.

"S. B."—We doubt if Philidor's powers in actual play were ever fairly tested. The games of his recorded were against opponents much below the best second-rate players of the present day, and hence it becomes extremely difficult to make the comparison you require. If we are to be satisfied with the opinions of his contemporaries, Philidor was the greatest player that ever lived; but if he is judged by the games he has bequeathed us, we can hardly think him entitled to rank even upon an equality with La Bourdonnais.

"R. F."—1. A looker-on has no right to interfere until the game is over. 2. There is no penalty for calling checkmate wrongfully.

"D. P. B."—All the games in the three matches named are to be found in Vol. VII. of "The Chess-Player's Chronicle." The Economic Chess-Board now selling was invented by Dr. Roget.

"X. F."—The magnitude of the work in question is an obstacle to its appearance at present. It may not, however, be uninteresting to Amateurs to state that a complete, standard, Text Book for Chess Players of every denomination is now preparing by Mr. Staunton, and will be published by Mr. Henry Bohn early in the coming year. This work is intended to contain the most comprehensive analysis of all the variations on the openings by Bilguer, Heydebrant, Calvi, Jaenisch, Lewis, Silberschmidt, &c. &c., which has ever been given.

"C. F."—The utmost possible vigilance is exerted to prevent mistakes in our collection of Enigmas, and we doubt if an error can be found in any one of the ninety odd already published · look again attentively at No. 89.

"Juvenis." It shall be examined.

"Harry Hotspur."—If you take up a piece, you must play it; but while you retain your hold of it, you can move it to any square you choose. The 90th Enigma is quite right: do not give it up yet. You can mate with a Bishop and Knight.

14. P takes P	B takes K B P (ch)

* These notes are by one of the Players*

(a) We consider this to be by far the strongest method of carrying on the attack known as Capt. Evans's gambit; the possibility of the second player bringing out his K Kt being now precluded. In place of this move, however, Castling is recommended by all the great authorities.

(b) If Black cannot safely take the Q B P, it goes far to support the opinion which we have just expressed

(c) It is very difficult to say whether this move or that of Kt to Q's R's 4th is preferable: there are disagreeable attendants upon either course of play.

(d) It would never answer Black's purpose to have one of his adversary's Pawns established at his own K's 3rd sq, which is the only other alternative

(e) Hazardous again; but the threatened advance of Q's P must be attended to at whatever risk. *

(f) He might also have driven the Black towards the corner by checking with first one Bishop and then the other, but in that case it is highly probable his sable majesty would, ere long, have found snug quarters, although the journey would be performed in rather an undignified manner.

(g) Had he taken the B with K, Black would have checked with Q at Kt 3rd, regaining the piece with a winning position

(h) His best move; had he taken the B with R, R would have taken B, checking, and have won the game with ease.

(i) Black has still the advantage of one miserable Pawn, but the position is such that he cannot possibly win the game against good play

---

* Both players, however, overlooked the fact that White might still have played on his Q's Pawn, and, if Black took it with the Kt, have taken K B P with his Kt, and obtained a winning position.—(Ed. of I. L. N.)

15. R P takes P	Q Kt P one	29. K to R 2nd	Q to K R 4th (ch)

And the game is drawn by a perpetual check.

(a) This is done by way of precaution, but it seems a lost move, as, at a subsequent opportunity, it prevents the Rook being played to this square.

(b) Well played, with the view at once of opening check and defending K B P.

(c) It might have been continued thus:—

	28. Q to Q 8th (ch)
29. K to R 2nd	B takes R
30. Q takes B	Q takes Kt

And then the first play can draw by perpetual check.

(a) The Bishop, in the opening, should always be played to Q R 4th.

(b) Bad. This weakens the attack, as it gives his adversary time. Either Q P two or Q to Q Kt 3rd should have been played.

(c) Q to Q R 4th?

(d) R takes R would have saved the Pawn, thus

R to K sq

(e) Had he played B to K 2nd it would have been sadly hampered, for a time, at least.

(f) K Kt P two?

(g) He ought first to have checked at Q Kt 8th, in order to remove the King as far as possible from the point of action.

(h) With the desperate hope, if he took it, of getting a Stalemate.

St. James's, Westminster.—A handsome testimonial is about to be presented to the Rev. G. T. Andrews, in token of the great esteem of the parishioners towards him. It was, at first, intended to present the rev. gentleman with a service of plate; this, however, he begged to decline. The parishioners therefore agreed to present him with a valuable collection of books, elegantly bound and highly embellished, in a handsome oak book-case, with an inscription in Old English letters; a library chair, and a handsome gold watch, manufactured by Vullamy; and the several articles are now in preparation.

Colosseum.—A new arrangement and division of prices has been made at the above establishment, so that the million can now visit it in parts, for one shilling each, during the holidays. This is a judicious alteration on the part of the proprietors, cheap amusement being the order of the day.

Westminster-bridge.—A meeting of the inhabitants of Lambeth was held on Monday evening, at the New Inn, Bridge-road, to consider the proposed erection of a bridge at Charing-cross; B. Hawes, jun., Esq., M.P., in the chair. The Chairman said that there had been no manifestation of public feeling in favour of the proposed new bridge to Charing-cross, although the money for erecting it, amounting to upwards of £2,000,000, would be taken from the public purse The new bridge had not been sanctioned by the Government, further than that a public department had consented to give certain notices prior to the introduction of the bill. He understood the architect of the new Houses of Parliament thought the present bridge an eye-sore; but, could it not be repaired and beautified, or rebuilt on the existing site? There were many reasons for retaining it: first of all, on the ground of economy. All the approaches to the present bridge were the property of the Bridge Commissioners. In the next place, a bridge lower down, as was proposed, must be longer and larger, and all the approaches would have to be bought. But was it just to existing interests to build a bridge elsewhere? There were at present two private bridges close to the site of the new bridge—Waterloo and Hungerford-bridges the first of which did not pay a farthing to the subscribers, and the other paid but very badly. He pledged himself to oppose the bill in every stage, and he did not believe that five gentlemen would be found in Parliament to sanction such an unnecessary waste of public money.—Mr. Edwards charged the honourable gentleman with being a member of the "Select Committee on Westminster-bridge and the New Palace," which had sanctioned the erection of a new bridge, and he was therefore inconsistent in presiding over a meeting, the object of which was to prevent it.—The Chairman stated that, although he was a member of the Committee, he did not vote in favour of the erection of the proposed new bridge.—Mr. Wilkinson stated that the report of the Committee was decidedly in favour of the existing site.—A series of resolutions condemnatory of the erection of a new bridge at Charing-cross, and the removal of Westminster-bridge, was then unanimously adopted.—Mr. Grissell stated that, as frequent reference had been made to Mr. Barry, the architect of the new Houses of Parliament, he begged to say that gentleman had had nothing to do with the proposal of a new bridge to Charing-cross, and he had reason to believe that he was in favour of the present structure.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

IMPORTANT POINT RESPECTING LETTERS OF ALLOTMENT.

In the Court of Exchequer, on Wednesday, a case was tried, Vollans v. Fletcher, in which the Chief Baron gave an important decision regarding letters of allotment.

Mr. Martin and Mr. Hoggins were counsel for the plaintiff, who brought the action to recover the sum of £21 from the defendant, as the chairman of the committee of management for the Birmingham, West Bromwich, Wednesbury, and Walsall Junction Railway Company, under the following circumstances:—

The plaintiff, it appears, is a solicitor residing at Hull, and, having made the usual application for shares in this railway, in the autumn of last year, received a letter in reply from the secretary acting under the managing committee, which acquainted him that the committee had allotted him ten shares, and required him to pay the deposit of two guineas per share to the bankers of the Company, whose receipt, together with the letter of allotment, would afterwards be exchanged for scrip. His letter was dated October 29; but, though the plaintiff duly paid his deposit, it did not appear that he had ever carried the case much further, as he did not apply for his scrip. He, however, did apply for his deposit in December, when the scheme was abandoned; and being told that the Company could not return it in full, he brought this action, which was assumed to a certain point to resemble the case against Mr Spottiswoode, in which the Court of Exchequer held that the defendant, as a committeeman of a railway company, was liable to refund the full deposit to the allottee.

Mr. Crowder, however (with whom was Mr. Ball), on the part of the defendant, took an objection to the production of the letter of allotment, for want of a stamp, treating it as an agreement in conjunction with the letter of application, which, he further submitted, ought to have been also given in evidence.

The Chief Baron, inclining to the objection, held it fatal, and the plaintiff was thereupon nonsuited, with leave to move to enter a verdict for the plaintiff if the Court should think this ruling erroneous.

LIBEL UPON THE SOCIETY OF BRITISH ARTISTS.

In the Court of Queen's Bench, on Monday, an action for libel was tried Hurlstone v. Clayton.

Sir F. Thesiger appeared for the plaintiff, and stated that it was an action against the publisher of the Spectator to recover damages for a libel published in that paper of the 11th of April last, upon the Society of British Artists, of which the plaintiff was the president. The article in question appeared at the time of the opening of the society's exhibition for this year, and assumed the form of a criticism upon that exhibition. If, he said, the article had confined itself to mere criticism, then, however severe and unjust to the exhibition, no action at law would have been brought; but this publication went much further. It charged the members of the society with having been guilty of little less than forgery. That part of the article which was purely critical was written with great acerbity, and in a spirit which was not then for the first time exhibited, for the articles of the preceding years had been written in the same style of ill-feeling. [The learned counsel read the criticisms of three preceding years.] The particular accusation on which this action was founded was in the following terms: "The last manœuvre of the managers is of a piece with the whole course of their proceedings. A petition for a charter is presented by them to the Queen, the pretence being that the society intends to establish a school of art!! And they have actually had the audacity to append, in the form of signatures to this memorial, the names of any distinguished persons who have given donations towards erecting the gallery, or who have bought pictures out of its exhibition. When such practices as these are resorted to in order to promote the personal interests of a clique of inferior painters, and give them a factitious predominance over other artists, to the injury of the art itself, and of the public as well as of individuals, it behoves those who are aware of the attempt to denounce it."

Evidence having been called to make out the case for the plaintiff,

Mr. M. D. Hill, Q C., for the defendant, admitted that the writer had fallen into an error, which it had been attempted to atone for by an apology, offered to the solicitor of the institution. The apology was the same day promised as speedily as the editor could insert it; a retractation of the libel was published accordingly in the ensuing number, published on the 18th of April, stating that the editor was bound to admit the statement in the article was devoid of truth, and that he took the earliest opportunity of retracting the statement, and regretted its insertion. The learned counsel said that most persons would have thought this apology sufficient, independently of the paragraph itself being omitted in the evening edition of the paper of the same day, to make room for the later intelligence, respecting the day's markets. The action, however, had been continued. He trusted that the Jury would consider it a case in which mere nominal damages would suffice.

Evidence was adduced to prove that Mr. Rintoul, the editor, on hearing the article was unfounded, gave orders that no more of that edition should be sold.

After Sir Frederick Thesiger had replied,

Lord Denman summed up the evidence, remarking, that although an apology had been made, it might have been more satisfactory to the institution, had the editor stated that he was convinced and satisfied of the inaccuracy of the statement contained in the offensive article. He left to the Jury to determine what ought to be the amount of the damages the plaintiff should, under the whole of the circumstances, recover.

The Jury found a verdict for the plaintiff damages £100.

The Shortest Day. Monday next, the 21st (St. Thomas's day) is not this year the shortest day, but the 22d. Upon the 21st the sun rises at 6 minutes past 8, and sets at 51 minutes past 3—on the 22nd at seven minutes past 8 and sets at 51 minutes past 3; consequently, the 22d is one minute shorter than the 21st. The winter quarter also commences this year on the 22nd.

Death of the Right Hon. Thomas Grenville.—This venerable and distinguished statesman, whose name is so familiarly associated with some of the most important occurrences of our history, expired at seven o'clock on Thursday evening, at the advanced age of ninety-one. He had resided for some time at his town mansion, in Hamilton-place, and up to a week since was in the enjoyment of tolerably good health; but an ordinary attack of influenza was too much for one so old, and after a few changes the complaint fast approached to a fatal termination, and carried him off as above stated. His last moments were perfectly calm, and he resigned his spirit as if falling into a slumber.

THE MARKETS.

Corn Exchange (Friday).—The present week's arrival of English wheat having been very trifling the show of samples of that article here to-day was unusually small. All descriptions commanded a very steady trade, at fully Monday's quotations. The demand for free foreign wheat for shipment to Ireland was extensive, at a further advance in prices of from 2s to 3s per quarter. Barley was in short supply, and the best malting parcels produced 1s per quarter more money. The supply of malt was mostly cleared off, at a slight improvement in value. All other kinds of spring corn was in good request, and the terms dearer

Tea. This market is very quiet. Scarcely any business is doing, at late rates.

Sugar.—West India sugar is in good request; but all other qualities command very little attention. Refined goods steady, at 62s to 62s 6d for brown, and 63s to 63s 6d for standard lumps.

Coffee.—We have very few transactions to report in this article. In prices, no material alteration can be noticed

Rice.—Most kinds are only in moderate request, at about stationary prices.

Provisions.—Owing to the prevailing cold weather, Dutch butter is selling readily, at further advanced rates. The best qualities are producing 100s to 106s, and the middling and inferior sorts, 74s to 90s per cwt. Fine parcels of Irish butter move off freely, other kinds slowly, at late rates. Sligo and Tralee, 80s to 84s; Waterford, 84s to 88s; Limerick, 86s to 90s; Carlow and Clonmel, 94s to 98s; Cork, 90s to 94s; and Carrick, 94s to 97s per cwt. On board, or for delivery, next to nothing is doing. English butter is in fair request, at 98s to 102s for the best Dorset, and 94s to 96s per cwt for Devon. Bacon is in good request, and 1s to 2s per cwt dearer. Prime sizeable Waterford, 58s to 60s; heavy, 54s to 58s; Limerick sizeable, 56s to 60s; and heavy, 54s to 56s per cwt. Lard 1s to 2s higher, and the value of all other kinds of provisions has an upward tendency.

Tallow.—This market is firm, at a rise of from 3d to 6d. per cwt. P Y.C. on the spot is 48s 3d to 48s 6d. For early delivery, 48s 3d has been paid. Town Tallow steady, at 48s to 48s 6d per cwt. net cash.

Hops (Friday).—There is very little business doing here in any kind of hops, the supply of which is large, and previous rates are with difficulty supported. Sussex pockets, 72s to 90s; Weald of Kent ditto, 80s to 92s; Mid and East Kent ditto, 88s to 126s Mid Kent bags, 80s to 98s; East Kent ditto, 84s to 117s per cw.

Smithfield (Friday).—For the time of year, our market was tolerably well, but not to say heavily, supplied with beasts, the general quality of which was by no means first-rate. Prime Herefords, Devons, runts, and Scots, sold readily, at Monday's quotations; but all other kinds of beef were a dull inquiry. The numbers of sheep were not large; yet the mutton trade was inactive, at unaltered currencies. There were on sale 150 beasts, 820 sheep, and 1 calf from abroad. Calves were in good supply, and heavy demand, at late rates. The pork trade was tolerably steady, at our quotations. Milch cows were very dull, at from £16 to £18 each, including their small calf

Per 8lb. to sink the offals:—Coarse and inferior beasts, 3s 6d to 3s 8d; second quality ditto, 3s 8d to 3s 10d; prime large oxen, 4s 0d to 4s 2d; prime Scots, &c., 4s 4d to 4s 6d; coarse and inferior sheep, 3s 10d to 4s 0d; second quality ditto, 4s 2d to 4s 4d; prime coarse-woolled ditto, 4s 6d to 4s 8d, prime South Down ditto, 4s 10d to 5s 2d; large coarse calves, 3s 8d to 4s 2d prime small ditto, 4s 4d to 4s 8d; large hogs, 3s 8d to 4s 4d; neat small porkers 4s 6d to 4s 8d. Suckling calves, 18s to 29s; and quarter old store pigs, 16s to 19s each. Beasts, 1236; cows, 140, sheep, 3963, calves, 190; pigs, 250.

Newgate and Leadenhall (Friday).—The general demand was very steady, at full prices.

Robert Herbert.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

The English Market opened flatly on Monday, at a slight depression on Saturday's prices. Consols quoted 93⅞, buyers; but soon receded to 93⅝, sellers; some speculative sales having been made upon the state of the American Exchanges. The position of affairs in Mexico also furnished another reason for heaviness. This downward tendency still further influenced prices on Tuesday to ⅝, and bargains were done at 93½ to ⅝ for the opening. A slight revival afterwards occurred, and on Wednesday the opening prices were 93⅝ to ¾. The improved appearance of the French Money Market gave a fresh impetus soon afterwards, and 93⅞ was quoted. Soon afterwards it became known that the Government broker had concluded his purchases on account of the Savings Banks, and 93⅝ to ¾ was the closing quotation

Some anticipation existing on Thursday, that at the weekly meeting of the Directors of the Bank of England, the rate of interest would be altered, prices were stationary on that day. No change, however, having been notified, quotations stood at closing 93¾ ⅞. Notwithstanding this, prices cannot be said to be firm, a general feeling existing that money is likely to become tighter, as the year progresses to a close, and perhaps more so at the commencement of the New Year

Exchequer Bills have only varied about one shilling during the week, closing at 10 to 13 pm. The subjoined list shows the closing prices:—Bank Stock, 207, Three per Cent. Reduced Annuities, 94; New Three-and-a-Quarter per Cent. Annuities, 95⅞; India Bonds, 22 pm.; South Sea New Annuities, 93⅞; Consols for Opening, 93⅞; Exchequer Bills, 13 pm.

Prices opened heavily on Monday, in the Foreign Market, and continued without any improvement until Wednesday. Mexican, which, on the Tuesday, had receded about ½ per cent., rallied on Wednesday, and advanced nearly three-quarters per cent. Although no business was done in Spanish, it became generally understood on that day that the agents were in possession of the necessary funds for paying the dividends on the Three per Cents. The settlement for the half-monthly account passed off without difficulty. Mexican, however, declined on Thursday, when the news of the fall of Tampico became known, and Spanish has been scarcely dealt in. Portuguese receded has been heavy, declining on Tuesday about ½ per cent., and has since been still further depresed. The following list of quotations will show the little animation existing in the market at the close of the week:—Mexican, 5 per Cent., 1846, 23⅞; Ditto, Account, 24; Portuguese Bonds, Account, 37½; Venezuela Bonds, 2 per Cent., 40; Dutch, 2½ per Cent., 60⅞

The Share Market has varied but little for some days past, sales continuing to predominate. As the spring of the ensuing year approaches, so calls must necessarily increase, and the holders of Scrip will then be tested as to their ability to pay. That numbers hold shares in bonâ fide new lines, who cannot meet the first call, much less any future demands, there cannot exist a doubt. The tendency of the market, therefore, will, in all probability, continue to be downward, unless some unforeseen cause operate to the contrary. With regard to French Shares, the slight improvement that has occurred in them within the last few days, is to be regarded rather as the result of a vigorous support afforded to the French Market, than any other reason. Calls approach, and the French public cannot pay, under the existing state of things, whatever the English holders may do. At the close of the week business was very limited, as the subjoined list of bonâ fide bargains will evidence:—Aberdeen, 24½; Birmingham and Oxford Junction, 9⅝; Bristol and Exeter New, 7; Caledonian, 23⅞; Ditto Half Shares, 2½; Eastern Counties, 22⅞; Ditto New, 7½ pm; Ditto, York Extension, 3½; East Lincolnshire, 2⅞; Edinburgh and Glasgow, Quarter Shares, 20; Ely and Huntingdon, 13⅞; Goole, Doncaster, &c., 2½; Great North of England, 237; Ditto New, 54½; Great Western New, 6; Hull and Selby, 107; Ipswich and Bury St. Edm., 10; Leeds and Bradford, 75; Manchester and Newcastle Junction, 2½; London, Brighton, and South Coast, [illegible]; Ditto Consolidated Eighths, 14; Ditto Guarant. Five per Cent., 10½; London and North Western, 194½, Ditto, ditto, New, 14½; Ditto Fifths, 18⅞; Ditto £10 (M and B) C., 8; London and South Western Tenths, 5½; Ditto Scrip, 5½; Ditto, ditto, 4⅞; London and York, 2⅞: Ditto Extension, 2; Lynn and Ely, 16⅞; Manchester and Leeds, Quarters, 6½; Ditto Fifths, 10⅝; Ditto Sixteenths, 7½; Ditto Extension, ½ pm.; Manchester, Buxton, and Matlock, ½ pm.; Midland, 127; Ditto New, 31½; Newcastle and Berwick, 34⅝; Newry, Warrenpoint, and Rostrevor, 8; Norfolk Half Shares, 12; Northern Counties Union, 1½; North British, 37½; Ditto Half Shares, 15½, Ditto Quarters, 3⅞; Ditto Extension, 1⅞; Ditto Thirds, 4; North Stafford, 8½, Portsmouth Direct, 4½; Preston and Wyre, 30; Ditto Half Shares, 8½; Royston and Hitchen, ½; Scottish Midland, 15; Shrewsbury and Birmingham, 4⅞; Ditto, Class B, 2⅞; South Wales, 3½; Vale of Neath, 1½; West Riding Union, 1⅞ pm; York and Newcastle, 38; Ditto, New, 12⅞; York and North Midland, 95; Ditto, Selby, 79½; Ditto, Extension, 38½; Ditto, Preference, 12½; Ditto East and West Riding Extension, 17½; Demerara, 3½, Northern of France Constituted, 10⅞; Orleans and Vierzon, 13½; Orleans and Bordeaux, 8⅝; Paris and Lyons Constituted, 5½ x Int; Paris and Strasbourg Constituted, 4½.

Saturday Morning.—The English Funds were firm yesterday in consequence of the Directors of the Bank of England not making any change in the rate of discount. Consols for opening 93⅞ The Foreign Market was dull at mere nominal quotations. Shares were in better demand, without any material alteration in prices. Aberdeens, Scottish Midlands, and the Northern lines generally quoted, were, however, a point worse.

OPENING OF THE LANCASTER AND CARLISLE RAILWAY, ON TUESDAY LAST.

Tuesday last was the day appointed or the opening or this new line of Railway. Accordingly, the Castle Station, at Lancaster, by eleven o'clock, was a scene of unusual bustle and excitement; and numbers of individuals, in spite of the severity of the weather, were grouped in the old church-yard, and on the terrace of the Castle, to view the public ceremony, by the Directors of the Lancaster and Carlisle Railway, throwing open to the distant cities of the north those advantages which their more southern neighbours have long enjoyed. The necessary arrangements being completed, the Directors' train, consisting of six first-class carriages, and three second-class carriages, moved slowly from the Castle Station, across two high embankments, to the Lune Viaduct, a work of extreme difficulty, consisting of eight stone and brick arches, of fifty-three feet span. As a specimen of strength and lightness, this structure is not surpassed on the Line; and its three laminated timber arches give it a highly ornamental appearance from the town: the whole was completed in about twelve months.

Hest Bank comes next, a small bathing village on the borders of Morecambe Bay, which lies on a wide expanse of sandy desert for many a mile, bounded by the hills of Westmorland. The train then proceeded at a more rapid rate through some deep cuttings, past Carnforth and Holme Stations, to Milnthorp Station, along an embankment of great length. This station is very substantial, and will be the best, in point of accommodation, on the Line. Beyond Sedgwick, after passing an embankment, and through some heavy rock cutting, the train stopped at Oxenholme Station, within two miles of Kendal, at the junction of the Kendal and Windermere Railways. A fine view of the town of Kendal was enjoyed from this station: the winter sunlit up the church spires, and blue roofs of the white houses which lay in the vale beneath; whilst, far beyond, rose the white-capped mountains of the west—the giants of the Lake.

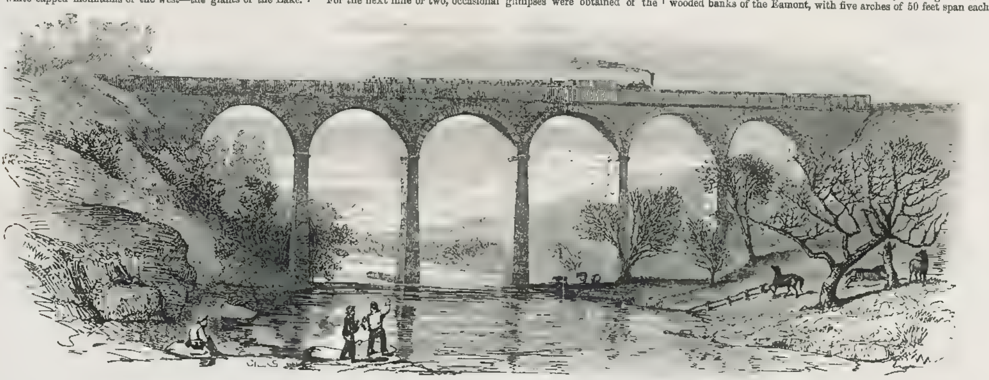
LANCASTER STATION.

After a few minutes' delay, the whistle of the engine gave notice of starting; and the precaution was here taken of sending a pilot engine a few hundred yards a head.

For the next mile or two, occasional glimpses were obtained of the town of Kendal, and its old Castle; the train then passed round Hay Fell, and away over Docker Garths Viaduct, commonly called Fiddler's Gill, a work of beauty and greatness (the middle arch being about 80 feet high); and then, past Lowgill Station, over an embankment 90 feet high, to the proposed junction of the North Western Railway; and onward, round the base of Dillicar Fell, at an elevation of 200 feet from the river, which lies at the foot of the embankment; a large amphitheatre of hills rises on every side, and the path seems at an end; but the skill of the Engineers (Messrs. Locke and Errington) carried this line over many a place deemed impracticable—round the foot of hills, across rivers, over vallies, &c.

Crossing Brown Beck by a Viaduct of red freestone, and the river Berbeck by another large viaduct, the rise to the summit at Shap commences. The cutting here is the deepest, hardest, and most expensive on the line, and varies from 50 to 61 feet in depth. The works were first commenced here in June, 1844. The summit at Shap is 900 feet above the level of the sea. Around, is a region of bare hills and cheerless scenes, making quick travelling a comfort. But Clifton Moor Station is passed, and the train passes over the river Lowther, by the Lowther Viaduct, a noble work, and next in importance to the bridge across the Lune. It is unrivalled for boldness and beauty of proportion; and consists of 7 semicircular arches of 60 feet span, supported on piers, 8 feet in thickness at the top, and increasing to 13 feet 6 inches at the base. Its total length is about 500 feet. The scenery here is a perfect contrast to the region passed. Lowther Park, with its thick and massive woods—the clear winding river, 100 feet below—the stern grandeur of the distant mountains, just tinted with the last farewell rays of the setting sun—formed a beautiful picture.

A short mile from here is Eamont Viaduct, crossing the dark and wooded banks of the Eamont, with five arches of 50 feet span each, and 70 feet high. An embankment beyond commands a fine view of Brougham Hall, the residence of Lord Brougham; its stately park and large pleasure-grounds looked gloomily with their winter's clothing. At Penrith, the train was met by another from Carlisle; and, after gazing for a short time at the ruins of its old Castle, they each proceeded onward to Carlisle. The county, for some miles, is flat and uninteresting, with the exception of Borrock Lodge, which stands on the borders of a vale of remarkable loveliness. A high embankment passes Wreay Hall and village, noted for the beauty of its Chapel. Further on is Newbiggin Bridge—a neat wooden erection, built for the convenience of the proprietor of Newbiggin Hall, H. A. Aglionby, Esq.



LOWTHER VIADUCT.

The train reached Carlisle between four and five o'clock. A splendid dinner was served in the Athenæum, to the Directors and their friends; the confectionery and most of the table ornaments having been forwarded from Liverpool.

A trial trip, from Carlisle to Lancaster, was made yesterday week. The Directors in the train, we learn from the Carlisle Journal, were Mr. John Dixon and Mr. G. H. Head, who were joined at Penrith by Mr. E. W. Hasel (Chairman of the Directors), Mr. H. Howard, of Greystoke Castle, and Lieutenant-Colonel Maclean. They were accompanied by Mr. T. C. Heysham, Mr. P. Dixon, Mr. Steel, of the Carlisle Journal, Mr. Larmer, Resident Engineer, Mr. Collister, Resident Engineer of the Caledonian Railway, Mr. Mould, Mr. Hemberow, Mr. Green, and two or three other gentlemen connected with the works. The train consisted of the engine, tender, and three carriages. It proceeded at the rate of upwards of 30 miles an hour, and would have reached Penrith (18 miles) in about 35 minutes, but for a slight accident when about two miles from that place. It caused a delay, however, of upwards of an hour, when the train again proceeded on its way—reaching Lancaster (70 miles) in about three hours of actual travelling—the Directors having stopped at several places to inspect the works.

In the evening, the Directors, engineers, and friends, dined together at the King's Arms Inn, and next morning, were joined at breakfast by Captain Coddington, the Government Inspector, who had just arrived from London. A little after eight o'clock, they started with a train of four carriages on the return to Carlisle. The day was excessively cold, with rain, sleet, snow, and frost, by turns. At times, the rails presented the appearance of long lines of ice, and were extremely slippery. The difficulty on such a day was the ascent of the great incline on Shap Fells, one of the severest gradients on any railway in England: the whole party watched this with no little interest; and it must have been highly satisfactory to both Engineers and Directors, when Captain Coddington, who stood upon the engine and timed its progress, announced that the ascent had been made, notwithstanding the unfavourable state of the rails, at the rate of 20 miles an hour—although the engine was an old one, and not of the most powerful class. All the heavy works—the bridges, viaducts, cuttings, and embankments—were minutely inspected by Captain Coddington, who expressed himself, at the end of the journey, as highly pleased with the whole of the works, declaring that the public might travel upon the Line with the most perfect safety; and, immediately afterwards, gave the Directors a certificate to that effect. We may mention here, that the Line is double throughout, with the exception of about two miles, near Lowther. This portion will be made double in a month, or less. The Line is remarkably easy nearly throughout—the exception being a short distance where it has been recently ballasted; and it passes through a country which can scarcely be surpassed for picturesque beauty and wildness of scenery.

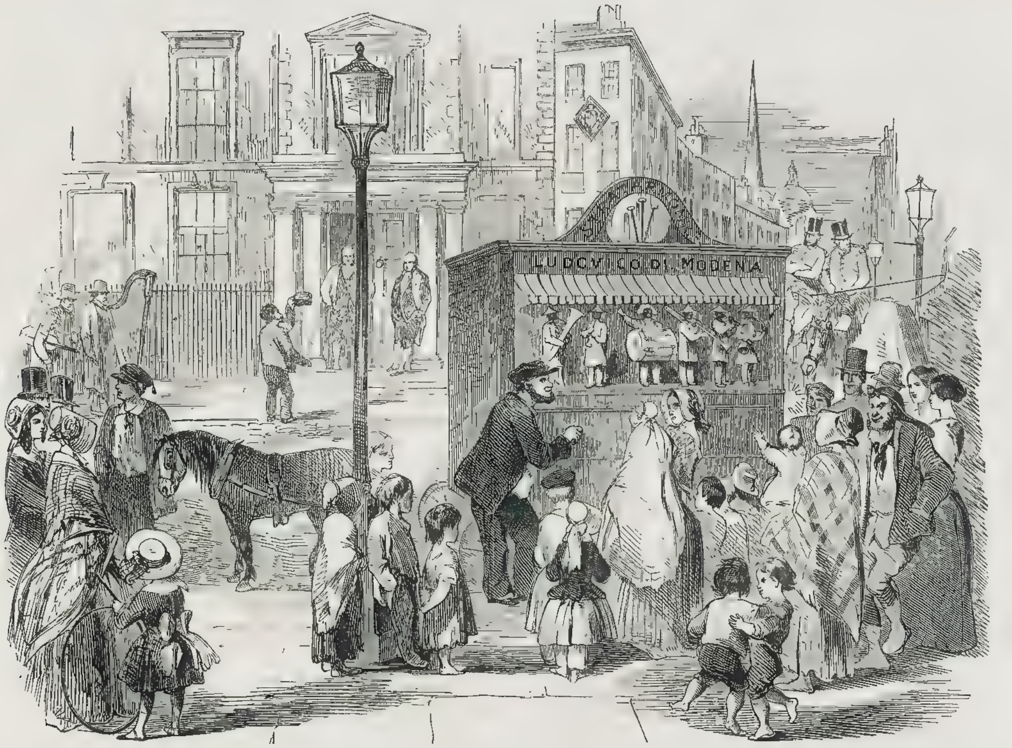
EAMONT VIADUCT.

The "Shannon" Steam-packet. The ship's frame, below her water bearing, appears to have suffered so little, that it is contemplated to take her to Dublin (where her proprietors possess an extensive repairing establishment) for complete renovation, after giving her a temporary repair here. It is difficult to estimate the entire cost of these repairs, but they cannot fall much short of £1000. Her cabin furniture is partly destroyed, and the remainder injured. The damage to the cargo will, it is feared, range from £10,000 to £15,000. There are about thirty tons of washed goods totally destroyed, comprising tea, tobacco, coffee, rice, peas, vetch seed, fruits, hops, pimento, perfumery, military clothing, stationery, envelopes, elegantly bound English and foreign books, &c. About ninety casks of brandy and wine for Dublin are saved, and seven boxes, containing 2 cwt. each of specie, have been safely lodged in the charge of Mr. Morris, manager of the Plymouth branch of the Bank of England. A large portion of the specie consisted of fourpenny-pieces, destined for Ireland, to pay labourers and others on the railway works.

The Duration of Married Life.—The tables of the mean joint lifetime of men and women show that in this country husbands and wives married at the age of 25 live, on an average, 27 years together, the widows living rather more than 10 years (10 4) after their husbands' deaths, and the widowers nearly nine years (9 3) after their wives' deaths. Where the husband is 40 and the wife 30, the mean term of married life is 21 years, the widows living thirteen years after their husbands, and the widowers five years after the deaths of their wives. The tables furnish ready answers to a great number of questions of this kind, and others in which two lives are concerned.—Registrar-General's Report.

Parricide in France.—A youth of 19, named Chevillon, and a boy of 15, named Guy, were a few days ago tried at Versailles, by the Court of Assize of the Seine-et-Oise, the first for parricide, and the second for complicity in the murder. The evidence proved that Chevillon had stolen 200 francs from his father's bed-room, and while he was helpless in bed from illness, he had lighted a charcoal fire, by which his father was suffocated. The young parricide had spent the greater part of the money with his friend in debauchery. The jury found Chevillon guilty of parricide, but with extenuating circumstances; and he was sentenced to twenty years' imprisonment with hard labour. Guy was acquitted.

The Smithfield Club Cattle Show.—This exhibition was finally closed on Saturday evening, having been visited during the four days by little short of 100,000 persons. Saturday is usually selected by the aristocracy as the day for making their inspection of the Cattle Show. Amongst those who visited it were the Duke of Richmond, the Duke of Buckingham, Earl Spencer, the Earl of Leicester, Viscount Torrington, the Earl of Egremont, Lord Portman, the Earl of Warwick, Mr. Pusey, M P, Colonel Sibthorp, M.P., Mr. T. Duncombe, M.P., Earl Radnor, Sir R. Price, Bart., M.P., several of the Foreign Ministers, &c. Although the competition for the purchase of the cattle has not been so spirited as that which has been exhibited on previous occasions, still nearly the whole of the animals which have obtained prizes in the respective classes have been disposed of. The Club, as usual, offered a splendid silver medal as a premium to the butcher who shall purchase the largest amount of stock in the respective classes; and if the number of placards which bear his name are to be accounted any criterion, Mr. T. Slater, of Kensington, will be again the successful competitor. It is a remarkable fact that more ladies have visited the Show this year than on any previous occasion, but the implement galleries appeared a source of far greater attraction to the fair visitors than the live stock. The removal of the stock commenced at twelve on Sunday night, and by four o'clock on Monday afternoon the yard was entirely cleared.



LONDON STREET MUSIC.—THE MONSTER ORGAN.

STREET MUSIC.

Of all the itinerant musicians who perambulate the great metropolis, the organ-grinder holds the most conspicuous position. How many suicides have been committed under his melancholy influence has not yet been clearly ascertained; but the effects of the orgue de Barbarie on the nervous system have been well known since Hogarth gave to the world his "Enraged Musician." It has been asked whether a Balfe, Benedict, or Wallace could be indicted for murder, if, during the writing of a finale, any one of the illustrious triad of composers should kill a Savoyard under the organic provocation. If the French system of law, admitting "extenuating circumstances," existed, doubtless the Coroner's verdict would be "Justifiable Homicide." As if the ordinary organ were not enough for any one's ears, here comes a Monster Street Organ to add to our daily torture. Our artist has resolved that our eyes shall be saluted with its aspect as well as our ears. Look at it and tremble, amateurs and artists! It is from the prolific manufactory of Gavioli, of Modena; and it cost, as the grinder-in-chief assured us, upwards of £150. Here is the march of Street Music; a locomotive Brummagem organ, drawn by a real horse, and exacting two men to develop its orchestral resources. And how hard do the automatons labour in their vocation: gaze on that Prospère Ophicleide! What are Chipp's drums compared with the mechanical artist? How well does the Italian maker comprehend public taste; he gives us plenty of parchment and brass. Ask the "Conductor"—we mean the living one—to display the organic riches of the interior, and how will you revel in reversing cylinders—beating Little's new double-action printing machine hollow; the difference being, that in the latter there is a myriad of tapes, and in the Monster Organ a shoal of needles. The Great Organ is a street "swell" of the first magnitude—a wholesale dispenser of Rossinian and Bellinian melodies, the hearing of which will cause our modern composers to borrow the strains involuntarily in their forthcoming operas.

THE EXTINCT IRISH DEER.

A very interesting discovery has lately been made in Ireland, of some Fossil Bones, which, according to a Correspondent of the Dublin Evening Post, is convincing proof that "the splendid and magnificent animal, the Giant Deer of Ireland, was domesticated by man for his use and food, and driven by him in company with other cattle, to be killed or slaughtered in the same way or manner as the butchers of the present day do, by breaking in the frontal bone of the face by some heavy or sharp instrument."

These remains were found in Loch Gûr, a moderately-sized lake, having an island in the middle, near Limerick. They consist of various skulls and bones, among which are those of oxen, pigs, goats, the red deer, and the extinct Irish deer; and it is believed, for the first time in Ireland, the reindeer, &c.; but none of sheep—a singular fact; and going, in the opinion of a writer in the Farmer's Gazette, far towards furnishing an inference, that, at the period when these deposits were formed, the sheep had not become domesticated in Ireland. The quantity of the remains of goats deserves attention, the name of the lake, "Loch Gûr" (or Gour), signifying, in Irish, "Lake of the Goats."

Among the heads of oxen, are some chiefly remarkable on account of their prodigious size; others on account of their singularity of formation; but that which more immediately interested us was, that we found several skulls of a short-horned breed of cattle, similar in size and form to those animals which are now so highly prized in Ireland, on account of their superiority over other varieties, but which are imported from England.

"Here, then" (continues the Farmer's Gazette), "in this vast depository of bones, we discover sufficient evidence to prove that we, in olden time, possessed the true short-horned variety of cattle, if we can judge by the skeleton heads, which we are now compelled to import from the sister country; and we are almost authorised to infer, that it was to Ireland that England herself was originally indebted for the stock from which the "pure" short-horns are descended. The discovery of these remains demonstrates another and a particularly interesting fact, viz:—that the Irish giant Deer, sometimes improperly termed the Irish Elk, was co-existent with these short-horned cattle, was itself a domesticated animal, and was itself killed for human use; for we have to add the extraordinary fact that, amongst other fragments, we found the remains of several giant Deer, and, amongst others, two female skulls fractured on the frontals in precisely the same manner as those of the cattle We have the more pleasure in mentioning this fact from the circumstance that it confirms, in the most unanswerable manner, the positions advanced in Mr. Richardson's clever pamphlet on the fossil deer—positions in which Mr. Richardson stood alone at the time of their publication, and had to endure the opposition of some of the most celebrated savans of the day. Amongst others, we may mention Professor Owen, who maintained that not only was the giant deer not contemporary with man, but that he was created some thousands of years prior to the existence of man upon the surface of this globe. Mr. Richardson published his pamphlet in reply to the views advocated by Professor Owen, and whatever doubt might then have existed, as to which side the truth lay upon, we think that this remarkable discovery is amply sufficient to establish the correctness of Mr. Richardson's views, and to set this disputed question at rest perhaps for ever."

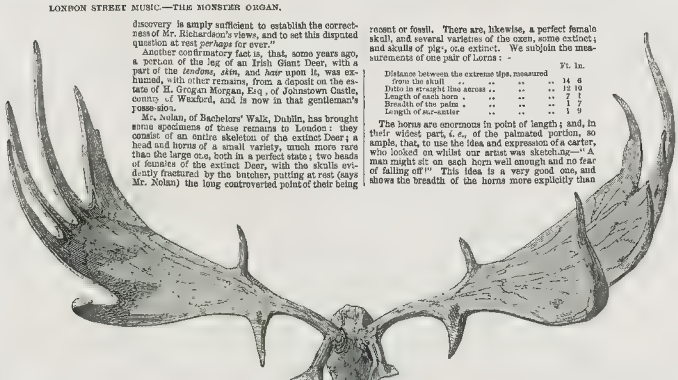
Another confirmatory fact is, that, some years ago, a portion of the leg of an Irish Giant Deer, with a part of the tendons, skin, and hair upon it, was exhumed, with other remains, from a deposit on the estate of H. Grogan Morgan, Esq., of Johnstown Castle, county of Wexford, and is now in that gentleman's possession.

Mr. Nolan, of Bachelors' Walk, Dublin, has brought some specimens of these remains to London: they consist of an entire skeleton of the extinct Deer; a head and horns of a small variety, much more rare than the large one, both in a perfect state; two heads of females of the extinct Deer, with the skulls evidently fractured by the butcher, putting at rest (says Mr. Nolan) the long controverted point of their being recent or fossil. There are, likewise, a perfect female skull, and several varieties of the oxen, some extinct; and skulls of pigs, one extinct. We subjoin the measurements of one pair of horns:—

	Ft.	In.
Distance between the extreme tips, measured from the skull	14	6
Ditto in straight line across	12	10
Length of each horn	7	1
Breadth of the palm	1	7
Length of sur-antler	1	9

The horns are enormous in point of length; and, in their widest part, i. e., of the palmated portion, so ample, that, to use the idea and expression of a carter, who looked on whilst our artist was sketching—"A man might sit on each horn well enough and no fear of falling off!" This idea is a very good one, and shows the breadth of the horns more explicitly than any other which could be employed, as it at once suggests the familiar object of the seat of a chair by which to compare them.

With respect to the skulls we have figured, the female is a very good specimen, and undoubtedly of a female, but the supposed female is a skull about which Mr. Nolan and Professor Owen are at variance. Mr. Nolan maintains it is of a female deer, from its having no horns, or apparent roots of horns, and that the hole in the forehead was caused by a blow from a poleaxe. Professor Owen considers it to be of a male deer, or, as generally called, Irish Elk, and supports his opinion by the great thickness of the skull across the forehead, and its great width as compared to the other skull, and adds that it was never killed by a blow from a poleaxe, but that the horns have been wrenched or knocked from the skull by those who found it. The fracture would appear old, as the bone is so thoroughly impregnated with the colouring matter from the bog as to be dark throughout, and so could not easily be detected. Again, the outward form of the skull is in many points quite unlike the one acknowledged to be female, and, Professor Owen having measured it, found the skull of the doubtful one to be much larger round the forehead, and near where the horns should be, than it could possibly be, in proportion, were it only the skull of a large female.



SKULL AND HORNS OF THE EXTINCT IRISH DEER.

With respect to the skull of the bull, its chief features are the short HORNS, showing, as we have already stated, that originally there was a short-horned breed in Ireland.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

WINTER SPORT IN THE METROPOLIS.

> They sweep,
> On thousand skates, a thousand different ways,
> In circling poise, swift as the winds.—THOMSON.

A few days ago we had once more a visit from good old English Christmas time, and the season set in seasonably—"frosty, but kindly." 'Tis true, as Dryden sings—

> Now the business of the field is o'er;

but, so constant and so instant are the changes in our skiey influences, that, even as we write, Old Hyems may be making preparation for doffing "his icy crown," and donning "an odorous chaplet of sweet summer buds." To be sure, the presence of violets is not the most propitious thing in the world for the fortunes of the chase, but anything is better than frost, its annihilator. Well, hyperborean wreaths fell upon the capital at the commencement of the week, and very soon a considerable crust covered the surface of its waters. Cotemporary with this facility for "a day well spent" in a healthy, bracing exercise, were grim and ominous preparations to avert or remedy its casualties. Towards every piece of superficially applicable water, "in or about town," you saw companies of men, in Nautilus jackets and buoyant hopes, hastening, armed with every contrivance in existence, to rescue people from liquid graves, or to resuscitate those who might be at issue with untimely ends. "Vixere fortes ante Agamemnona," says the scholiast—and since, many "valorous and sage," rejoins the modern bard; but we question whether the doughtiest of them all would have set out on a skating expedition, accompanied by a posse of the Humane Society's dragsmen.

Let us with these jovial adventurers. Lo! they enter one of the Royal Parks. What goodly groups surround us! See, there is a tent for unsoffocating the lieges gratis—and there a good Samaritan on Skates, dispensing brandy-balls at the rate of fifty miles an hour: the philanthropist, like Sir Boyle Roche's bird, is in ever so many places at one time! Is it not miraculous that anything in silk attire, or "stark mad in white linen," can stand the cold considerably below zero? Sweet ladies! keep moving—never mind those cavaliers in moustachios and attractive attitudes: we assure ye what Shakspeare says about the folly of supposing a fire may be borne conveniently in the hand, "by thinking of the frosty Caucasus"—is equally applicable the other way……Perhaps it may be owing to the late genial winters—or it may be that the Polka or Valse à Deux Temps has crippled the rising generation—but the fact is, Young England don't skate well: not within a hundred per cent. of its forefathers. You scarcely saw an artist in any of the show-off places, and when one was to be found, circumbendibusing in a Pas de Zephyr, stern foremost, it was long odds he was some fellow all consonants from the North Pole. Like everything else, there is a genteel locality for taking ice as well as a vulgar—but it's fit to confess, go where ye would the snobs had it hollow. A less distinguished party than that assembled in the afternoon in the inclosure of St. James's Park, it would be hard to imagine—out of Kentucky. The Serpentine was no better off; and as for the Regent's Park—but what could ye expect from the next of kin to Primrose Hill? We wish better luck to the sport of skating for sport we pronounce it—aye! and an ancient one, too—as old as Fitz-Stephen in its domestication on the banks of the Thames. In his time it was thus practised:—

"Two started a great way off opposite to each other, and when they met, they lifted up their poles and struck each other, when one or both fell." This may have been old fashioned fun, but it's very like new-fashioned assault and battery. We wish well to skating when less a type of war. It's a wholesome manly exercise, and in that character we would see it continue long and merrily an English national pastime. . . . .

TATTERSALL'S.

Monday.—If the frost has for the present put an end to training, it has not checked the disposition to speculate; and it will be seen below that business was not only comprehensive, but in some instances heavy. The prices, however, agreed so closely with those last quoted, that we may confine ourselves to the business actually done; premising that the horses most in favour were Epirote, Planet, Glentilt, Wanota, and Red Hart.

NOTICE!

RE-ISSUE, IN TEN MONTHLY PARTS, PRICE FIVE SHILLINGS EACH, OF BURKE'S

HISTORY OF THE LANDED GENTRY OF ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND IRELAND.

Part I. will appear with the Magazines, on the 1st of January, 1847.

Mr. COLBURN begs to announce that, on the 1st of January, 1847, he will commence the Re-Publication of the above Important Work, in TEN MONTHLY PARTS, price 5s. each.

This work furnishes such a mass of authentic information in regard to all the principal families in the kingdom as has never before been brought together. It relates to the Untitled Families of Rank as the Peerage and Baronetage does to the Titled, and forms, in fact, a Peerage of the Untitled Aristocracy. It embraces the whole of the Landed Interest, and is indispensable to the library of every gentleman.

* * * Orders received by all Booksellers.

HENRY COLBURN, Publisher, 13, Great Marlborough-street.

NOTICE

OF A CHEAP RE-ISSUE OF THE

NELSON LETTERS AND DISPATCHES.

EDITED BY SIR HARRIS NICOLAS, G.C.M.G.,

IN FOURTEEN MONTHLY PARTS, PRICE ONLY FIVE SHILLINGS EACH.

The First of which will appear with the Magazines on the 1st of January, 1847.

With the object of obtaining for this truly National Work a widely extended circulation Mr. Colburn has resolved to re-issue it in FOURTEEN MONTHLY PARTS, at only 5s. each, commencing on the 1st of January, 1847. An opportunity will thus be afforded for every private, as well as public, library to become possessed of this unique monument to the memory of the greatest Naval Hero that ever existed. The Nelson Letters (observes the Globe) will hereafter be the Manual of the Sailor, as the sister service has found a guide in the Dispatches of the Duke of Wellington. They will range side by side. Englishmen will associate their heroic deeds, and point their sons to these kindred works as the best memorials of their lives.

Orders received by all Booksellers.

Address, KING and SHEATH, 264, Regent-street.

IF NOT IMMEDIATELY WANTED THEY WILL PAY FOR KEEPING. Purchase quickly the Great Bargains at DISON'S, whose whole Stock is reduced to such extremely low prices as cannot fail to realise cash the instant they are seen. Buy, therefore, while you can, Lace of every kind, Dresses, Scarfs, Squares, Veils, Capes, Collars, Sleeves, Cuffs, Cambric Pocket Handkerchiefs, of Dison, No. 237, Regent-street, whose Stock must be sold off before he commences alterations. N.B. A few Infants' Robes, Frocks, and Caps, at a third of their value.

THE FIRST MAN who hinted at the revival of Gifts at Christmas and New Year was DISON, of 237, Regent-street, since which imitators in every branch have sprung up. He has now an extra claim to givers' notice by the economical, as well as useful and ornamental. A Lace Dress, a Lace Cape, Muslin and Lace Collars, Berthes, Veils, Infants' Robes and Caps, Cambric Pocket Handkerchiefs, enclosed in chaste enamelled scented boxes, are among the many appropriate Christmas, New Year's, and Birth-day Presents, at Dison's, No. 237, Regent-street, whose whole Stock is selling off at an immense reduction, to prepare for alterations.

LESSONS in MILLINERY and DRESS MAKING.—MRS. HOWELL, of 304, Regent-street, two doors from Margaret-street, Sole Inventress of Teaching the Art of Dress-making in a Series of Lessons, undertakes to convey to persons of the meanest capacity a correct knowledge of Cutting, Fitting, and Executing in the most Finished Style, in Six Lessons, for One Guinea. The correctness of this mode can be fully substantiated by reference to pupils.—Apprentices and Improvers Wanted.—Millinery Rooms. Paper Models.

IMPORTANT TO LADIES.—THE NORWICH COMPANY'S CELEBRATED 3 and 6 CORD, SEWING, and NETTING COTTON.—The attention of Ladies is particularly requested to this novel Article, as being of the most beautiful fabric and uniform texture of any yet produced; it is wound on elegant reels, in lengths of 100, 200, and 300 yards. The 6 Cord is more especially adapted for Ladies who are desirous of being accomplished in that elegant and useful art, "Netting." To be had of all the most respectable Silk-mercers, Linendrapers, and Haberdashers in the Kingdom; and wholesale of the Proprietors, Messrs. J. L. BARBER and Co., Norwich, and of their Agent in London, Mr. W. W. TRIPP, 39, Friday-street, Cheapside.—N.B. Merchants and Shippers supplied on the most liberal terms.

ELEGANT PICTURE-FRAMES, &c.—SUBSCRIBERS to the ART-UNION are respectfully informed that WM. FOLLIT, 63, Fleet-street, has designed a chastely ornamented frame, expressly for the beautiful Engraving, "JEPTHA'S DAUGHTER." Those who have not obtained the Print, are solicited to forward their orders to receive the same to WM. [illegible] superb looking [illegible] and Picture Frames [illegible] restored. FOLLIT'S [illegible] 63, Fleet-street.

MUSICAL BOXES of high quality, the mechanism beautifully finished, playing upwards of 750 airs, overtures, &c. A catalogue of the music, with the price of the boxes, is now published, and may be had, gratis, on application, or will be sent, post-paid, if applied for by a paid letter.—T. COX SAVORY and Co., Goldsmiths, &c., 47, Cornhill (seven doors from Gracechurch-street), London.

THE BEST ENGLISH WATCHES.—A. B. SAVORY and SONS, Watchmakers, No. 9, Cornhill, London, opposite the Bank, request the attention of purchasers to their stock of London-made PATENT LEVER WATCHES, which are manufactured by themselves, in their own house. In silver cases, with the detached escapement, and jewelled; the prices are four guineas and a half, six, and eight guineas each; or in gold cases, 10, 12, 14, and 16 guineas each. The very large stock offered for selection includes every description, enabling a customer to select that which is more particularly adapted to his own use.

DEFORMITIES of the SPINE, &c.—Mr. COLES'S PATENT ORTHOPÆDIC SOFA is adapted for the treatment of every variety of Distortion of the Spine and Chest. It contains, under the semblance of an ordinary sofa, the prone couch, and six varieties of exercises, calculated for restoring muscular energy, and for the due extension of contracted parts. It can be effectively employed at home, or at school, and without quitting the superintendence of the family surgeon. An Illustrated Guide to it is published, price 1s., by HOULSTON and STONEMAN, 65, Paternoster-row.

KŒNIG'S CORNET A-PISTONS.—HERR KŒNIG begs leave to call the attention of his patrons and the public to the following facts. Having frequently received communications from parties expressing great dissatisfaction at Instruments (Cornet-à-pistons) said to have been approved of by him, he was induced to examine several of the said Instruments, and, in nearly every instance, found them extremely defective both in Tone and Manufacture. HERR KŒNIG, therefore, deems it imperative on him in order distinctly to state (in order to prevent the disappointments complained of above), that the only Instruments examined and approved by him, are those sold at JULLIEN'S ROYAL CONSERVATORY of MUSIC, 214, Regent-street.

SEND EIGHT POSTAGE STAMPS, and by return, and post-free, you will get a handsome TEA-SPOON, of C. WATSON'S SOLID ALBATA PLATE, which is rapidly superseding Silver for all domestic uses. It is equally sweet and handsome as Silver itself. This is the only solid substitute now sold, and, unlike Plated Goods of any kind, there is nothing to wear off, so that the more you rub and clean it, the better it will continue to look, though in daily use for fifty years. Don't be afraid to put it to any test, and then send your order. A full catalogue of prices, with patterns of every other article manufactured from this beautiful Metal, will be enclosed with the sample Spoon.

Address C. WATSON, 41 and 42, Barbican, and 16, Norton Folgate, London.

Also, some superior Gordon's Golden Sherry, 36s. per Dozen. On the receipt of a post office order, or reference, will be immediately forwarded.

BARTER.—STOCK-TAKING.—It is not generally known that WINE of the first quality, in the London Docks, may be had in EXCHANGE for GOODS of any description, calculated for shipping, and in any amount, from £15 to £1000.—Apply to W. F., 26, Friday-street, Cheapside.

FOUR FIRES FOR ONE PENNY!!! by EDWARDS'S PATENT FIREWOOD.—It lights instantly, and saves money, time, and trouble. Every one should use it.—Sold by all respectable oilmen and grocers. Families in the country supplied with 500, delivered to the carrier, on receipt of a post-office order for 10s., payable to Thomas Stevenson. Manufactory, No. 18, Wharf-road, City-road.

ALL this hubbub, in two or three provincial towns, about the Tea Duties, will most likely end, as usual, in smoke. Even if there be a reduction, will the public have Tea at less than Half-a-Crown a pound? That is the price at which the EAST INDIA TEA COMPANY supply a useful Black in 6lb. bags; other sorts, 2s. 10d., 3s. 4d., and 3s. 10d. Coffees, 9d., 1s., and 1s. 3d. Offices, No. 9, Great Saint Helen's Churchyard.

REALLY SUBSTANTIAL AND HIGHLY-ACCEPTABLE PRESENTS TO OUR FRIENDS IN THE COUNTRY.

THE TEA Growers in China have of late sent us very many small Chests, or what they call Caddies, of very choice TEA, some of them containing only 5 lbs. weight, with others holding 7, 12, 20, to 30 lbs. DAKIN and COMPANY have received several hundreds, some are most beautiful, fit for the drawing room, and capable of being made into elegant work-boxes for ladies; they are beautifully constructed ornaments, are of different forms and sizes, filled with the choicest Tea, and will be shown to every person who desires to see these uncommonly convenient and truly acceptable Christmas Presents. NUMBER ONE, ST. PAUL'S CHURCHYARD.

GOOD OLD CHRISTMAS fast approaches us, and what is there in all this great Metropolis that would prove so acceptable a Christmas Present to our country friends as a little really good Tea? Our neighbours across the Channel have long prided themselves upon their choicest of wines, and have designated the finest descriptions "Première Qualité." The first gatherings of the Tea Plant are well known to be the finest—such as the richest Souchong, Cowslip Hyson, and Gunpowder. All these fragrant and rare sorts of Tea are to be had of DAKIN and COMPANY, TEA MERCHANTS, NUMBER ONE, ST. PAUL'S CHURCHYARD; and they will be found of premier quality—aye, fit for a Prince!!!

FOR CHRISTMAS PRESENTS.—BOUQUETS DE GIBIER A LA SOYER.—A tasteful and picturesque method of arranging all kinds of Game in season, with branches of laurel, holly, and other evergreens, set off with dried flowers, &c. &c., thus forming a bouquet of the most seasonable and novel effect. For Illustration, see this Paper of Saturday last, December 12th. Made only at TOWNSEND'S, POULTERER and DEALER in GAME to her Majesty and the rest of the Royal Family, 16, Charles-street, St. James's-square.

BEAUTIFUL WOMEN.—The Thorn that veils the Primrose from our view is not more invidious in Nature than superfluous Hair on the Face, Neck, or Arms of Beauty. For its removal HUBERT'S ROSEATE POWDER stands pre-eminent. Beware of Counterfeits. The Genuine has been signed G. H. HOGARD for the last forty years. Sold for the Proprietor by HOOPER, Chemist, 24, Russell-street, Covent Garden, and by most Perfumers. Price 4s.; or two in one parcel, 7s.

CHAPPED HANDS.—Those who are troubled with Chapped Hands are recommended to use the HONEY PASTE. Prepared by RIGGE, BROCKBANK, and RIGGE. Price 2s., and 3s. 6d. per Pot.

BALDNESS REMOVED and PREVENTED.—The POMMADE DEPURATIVE, invented by a Physician of the highest celebrity, will, in all instances, restore the Hair, so long as vitality remains in the bulb from which it springs. It is introduced with the greatest confidence and satisfaction, as no doubt of its renovating power exists. Manufactured and sold by RIGGE, BROCKBANK, and RIGGE, Perfumers to the Queen, 35, New Bond-street, London, and 5, East-street, Brighton. Price 2s., 4s., 6s., and 10s., per Pot.

ROYAL NURSERY.—"DELCROIX'S MACASSAR OIL," imported under the sanction of the "Lords of the Treasury," for the use of her Majesty and the Royal Nursery, is protected by two elegantly-executed correct likenesses, in embossed medallions, of her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert. It produces beautifully flowing curls, and, by the transcendant lustre it imparts, renders the hair truly enchanting. No Nursery, where personal advantages are considered important, should be without it. All Orders should be sent to Messrs. DELCROIX, 158, NEW BOND-STREET, as hairdressers (not being appointed agents), for the sake of gain, vend the most spurious trash as the genuine.

CAMPHOR SUPERSEDED.—Whereas Camphor having been found injurious to the Teeth (See "Lancet," Sept. 19th and Oct. 10th), BECK'S CIRCASSIAN DENTIFRICE is highly recommended by eminent Dentists and the Faculty as the best substitute for Camphor, and superior to anything ever prepared for beautifying and preserving the Teeth and Gums, and, at the same time, is more agreeable and economical. Sold in pots, at 1s. 1½d., 1s. 9d., and 2s. 9d., by the Proprietors, Beck and Co., 82, Westminster-bridge-road; Sanger, 150, Oxford-street; Butler, 4, Cheapside; Hannay, 63, Oxford-street, and all respectable Chemists in Town and Country.

WINDOW BLINDS. TYLOR and PACE having recently opened their new Establishment, No. 3, Queen-street, City, three doors from Cheapside, invite the attention of the public generally to their extensive assortment of every description of WINDOW BLINDS, consisting of Venetian Blinds, Painted Transparencies, Spring and Roller Blinds, Wove Wire and Patent Zinc Blinds, and Outside Shades and Sun Blinds in every variety. All departments of the manufacture being conducted on their own premises, TYLOR and PACE are enabled to supply the above at very reduced prices. Wholesale and export orders executed on the lowest terms.

GINGER BRANDY.—This most luxuriant and wholesome cordial is now come into general use, and not only pleases the palate, but is also the best remedy for all complaints of the stomach.

GINGERETTE, a trifling variation from the above, when mixed with water, is a pleasant and refreshing beverage. Price 38s. per dozen, or 3s. 6d. per bottle. Also their celebrated Pale and Brown Crown Sherrys at the same. To be had at W. YOUNG, FELL, and Co's., Cognac Brandy Distillery, Waterloo-road, Lambeth, and at all respectable licensed victuallers.

ALE—Best, Brightest, Purest. PORTER—Full, Rich, Clean Flavour. Brewed purposely for private families, after the farm-house manner, and cannot be excelled. Sold in casks of eighteen and nine gallons each, at 1s. per gallon. Drays deliver on Mondays, City, Mile-end, and Limehouse; Tuesdays, Islington, New-road, and Kentish Town; Wednesdays, Pimlico, Knightsbridge, and Kensington; Thursdays, Oxford-street, Edgeware-road, and Paddington; Fridays, Borough, Peckham, Brixton, and Wandsworth-road; Saturdays, Stoke Newington, Dalston, and Hackney.—Address, "JOHN BULL BREWERY OFFICE," 20, Philpot-lane, City.

THE STANDARD OF COGNAC, which is the BEST FOREIGN BRANDY.—The PATENT BRANDY and the GENUINE SELTERS WATER, protected by the Patent Metallic Capsule, the only sure and self-evident safeguard against adulteration, can be obtained throughout the kingdom at the respective prices undermentioned, or at 7, SMITHFIELD-BARS, and 96, ST. JOHN'S-STREET, LONDON. The Capsule embossed with the words—

"SOCIETE VIGNICOLE CHAMPENOISE, BETTS FRERES COGNAC"—Brown, 4s. 6d. per bottle, Pale, 5s. ditto.

"BETTS'S PATENT BRANDY, No. 7, Smithfield-bars," 3s. per bottle.

"BETTS, IMPORTER, NASSAU SELTERS WASSER," 10s. per dozen large bottles, 7s. small, exclusive of carriage from London.

The proposed objects of the Metropolitan and Suburban Cemeteries Society are as follow:—To provide sites for burials, east, west, north, and south of the Metropolis. To effect considerable reduction in the rate of charges. To adopt a new principle of payment, a single charge being substituted for the customary fees. To provide for the decent and respectful burial of the poorer population, by a system of arrangement perfectly novel, including buildings for the temporary reception as well as for the transit of bodies. Negotiations are now pending for the purchase of several exceedingly eligible sites, and one portion of 150 acres has been already secured. The estimates show a large annual dividend when the Society shall be in full operation, until which period 4 per cent. interest will be paid on the deposits and calls. The Committee of Management are now ready to receive applications for shares, which may be made to Messrs. Bourdillon and Son, solicitors, 30, Great Winchester-street; J. H. Stevens, Esq., architect, 6, Clement's-inn Strand [illegible] Gilbert, Esq., 74, Old Broad-street [illegible] Birmingham; Henry Tate, [illegible] Messrs. Smith and [illegible] or to the Secretary, at the office of the Society [illegible] buildings, where [illegible] further particulars may be obtained.

By Order of the Board, EDWARD HOARE, Sec.

London, November 25, 1846.

BRITISH COLLEGE of HEALTH, New-road, London.—BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF THE [illegible] of the Hygeian System of Med[illegible] UNIVERSAL MEDICINES after thirty-[illegible] faculty. James Morison, the youngest [illegible], Esq., was born at Bognie, in the county of Aberdeen, in the year 1770 [illegible] been long known as one of great affluence and respectability; and the late Member for Banffshire, John Morison, was the second brother of the subject of this brief sketch. For the remainder of the sketch see the abridged "Morisoniana," to be had of all the honorary members of the British College of Health, New-road, London.

GEOLOGY, MINERALOGY, AND CONCHOLOGY.—To facilitate the study of these interesting branches of science, Mr. TENNANT, Mineralogist to her Majesty, 149, Strand, London, arranges Elementary Collections of Shells, Minerals, and Fossils, from Two to Fifty Guineas each. He also gives private instruction on Geological Mineralogy.

ITALIAN ALABASTER, MARBLE, BRONZE, DERBY-SHIRE SPAR, and other Ornaments for the Drawing-room, Library, and Dining-room.—Mr. TENNANT, 149, Strand, London, has just received a new and elegant assortment of the above, consisting of Vases, Figures, Groups, Candlesticks, Inkstands, Inlaid Tables, Paper Weights, &c.

DANCING TAUGHT, in the most fashionable style, by Mr. WILLIS, 41, Brewer-street, Golden-square. Private Lessons in the Polka, Cellarius Valse, and Valse à Deux Temps, at all hours, to Ladies and Gentlemen of any age wishing privacy and expedition. An Evening Class on Monday and Friday. A Juvenile Class on Wednesday and Saturday. Terms may be had on application as above.

PIANOFORTES.—The cheapest house in London to purchase these first-rate instruments is at H. TOLKIEN'S, manufacturer, 28, King William-street, London-bridge. H. T. having completed his extensive alterations begs his friends to view his splendid stock of PIANOS, which is not to be equalled by any maker, and at about half the price charged by them. H. T's much admired piccolos, cash price £25. Old instruments taken in exchange.—TOLKIEN, 28, King William-street, London-bridge.

THE PANKLIBANON IRON WORKS AND GREAT WESTERN EMPORIUM for STOVE GRATES, kitchen-ranges, fenders, and fire-irons; general furnishing ironmongery, in tinned copper, iron and block-tin cooking vessels, best Sheffield plate, and table cutlery, japanned paper and iron tea trays, tea urns, ornamental iron and wirework for verandahs, lawns, &c.; brass and iron bedsteads, patent table lamps for candle or oil. Every article is warranted, and marked at the lowest prices, in plain figures, for cash.—Adjoining the Royal Bazaar, 58, Baker-street, Portman-square.

GRAVES' WATERPROOF COBLENTZ.—This WINTER OVER COAT has been pronounced, by all who have seen and worn it, to be decidedly the most gentlemanly and most comfortable of any yet produced. The unprecedented patronage which R. G. received last winter, induces him again to offer it to the notice of the Public, relying on its merits for a continuance of that unusually liberal support he then received. The same regard for superiority of Workmanship, Materials, and Moderate Charges, will be again observed. 313, High Holborn.

TROWSERS! TROWSERS!! TROWSERS!!!—A good fit in this garment can seldom be obtained.—R. GRAVES, Fashionable Trowsers' Maker and Tailor, 313, High Holborn, after many years' experience and study, is enabled to assert, without fear of contradiction, that he can fit gentlemen with this garment better than any other person in London. The characteristic of his fitting is a gentlemanly style, with perfect ease for stooping, sitting, walking, or riding. A well-assorted stock of the newest designs to select from.—R. GRAVES, 313, High Holborn.

MESSRS. NICOLL, Registered PALETOT Makers, 6th and 7th Vic., cap. 65, and TAILORS to their Royal Highnesses Prince Albert, Prince George of Cambridge, his Grace the Duke of Wellington, &c., respectfully beg to announce that the same moderate prices are still maintained; and that the Fashionable Winter Over-coat, the Paletot, is made of Llama Cloth, of a substance as suitable for the coming season as that which has been so highly patronised for both its useful qualities and gentlemanly appearance during the late summer months.—To be had only, in London, at 114, Regent-street, and 22, Cornhill, and of the recognised agents in the country.

BERDOE'S WATERPROOF OVER-COATS FOR THE WINTER. An extensive and superior assortment of first-rate Outside Garments, adapted to every purpose, and guaranteed to exclude any rain whatever; also of Berdoe's new and universally admired PALLIUM, may now be inspected both at his West End and City Establishments. The established reputation for efficiency and respectability of W. B.'s well-known Garments, obtained by ten years' extensive trial, renders (it is presumed) commendation now unnecessary. At both establishments the business will continue to be conducted upon the principles of supplying, at equitable and satisfactory charges, such articles only, as will ensure permanent satisfaction and future confidence. W. BERDOE, Tailor and Over-Coat Maker, 69, Cornhill, north side, and 96, New Bond-street, near Oxford-street, (recently opened.)

LOSS OF THE AMERICAN STEAMER "ATLANTIC."

A FRIGHTFUL disaster took place on the coast near Boston, United States, on the 26th ult., by the steamer Atlantic striking at midnight, on a reef near Fisher's Island. The boiler, in the first instance, burst. Soon after the steamer left Boston, the storm arose which compelled the steam-ship Great Western to anchor off Staten Island, and, at four o'clock on the following morning, the Atlantic struck, and broke in two. Numbers were crushed in the cabins amidst the falling timbers, 45 were drowned and killed, and about 30 escaped. The sole relic of the ill-fated vessel on the following day was one upright beam, upon which hung a bell tolled by the sea. An English family named Walton were among the lost.

The storm which proved fatal to this noble specimen of steam-ship building, commenced with a strong easterly wind, attended with snow and sleet, on the morning of the 25th of November. As the day advanced, the wind increased to a gale, with rain and snow at intervals. At sunset, there was a short lull, but the wind soon after came out from the north-west, the snow fell thick and fast, and froze as it fell. Altogether, it was one of the most awful nights for the month of November ever witnessed or felt. The passengers for the Atlantic left Boston at five p.m.; and, after some delay incident to the bad condition of railroad travelling, reached Albyn's Point, where they took the steamer at twelve midnight. At that place they were joined by many passengers who were unable to proceed on the Long Island Railroad, and who adopted this as the only mode left of prosecuting their journey to New York. The Atlantic next stopped at New London, a small town situated on the river through which part of the steamer's route lies, and there received an addition to the number of her passengers, and parted with many more who dreaded the severity of the gale. She left New London at one a.m. of the 26th, and was shortly after in the open sea. The weather was now very rough, the sea running high, but the wind was still north-east, and therefore right aft, so that the speed of the boat enabled her to run ahead of the sea and make good weather of it: but she had scarcely run a distance of nine miles from the New London light, when the steam-pipe running into the steam-chest burst, and the engine was at once rendered entirely useless. This was the cause of the disaster. A horrible scene of confusion here ensued. Many persons were scalded; a part of the side of the boat was carried away in the explosion; the lights on the deck were all extinguished in a moment; and, to add to all other causes of apprehension, the boat lost her way and broached-to. For some time the helpless mass lay in the trough of the sea, the waves breaking over her every moment, and the wind changed almost instantaneously to N.W., placing the powerless steamer in the vortex of the storm. The anchors were immediately got overboard, and the steamer rode comparatively easy all night; but it could be perceived that she was dragging towards the shore. Her position at this time was about five miles S.E. of an island in Long Island Sound, known as Fisher's Island, and the wind was drifting the noble wreck slowly, but surely, upon it. This was on Thursday morning, Nov. 26. Two steamers, the New Haven and the Mohegan, made ineffectual attempts to get to her assistance, but the high sea prevented their approach.

Capt. Hanna, one of the survivors, has furnished to the Boston Reading Room the following memoranda of the disaster.

On the 26th, was within half a cable's length of the reef on Fisher's Island, at dark. Had advised Captain Dustan to cut the cables before dark, but he concluded to hold on. Was with Captain Dustan alone upon the upper saloon aft when she struck. Heard Captain Dustan say, "She has gone." Captain Hanna endeavoured to get forward, as the reef extended from the stern to midships, the bow being beyond the reef and in a better position for the purpose of getting on shore.

She was about 200 yards from the land. She struck at half-past four, about ten eet from the reef. Captain Hanna thinks that all who were in the saloon when the boat struck perished, with the exception of himself, as the sea stove her upper decks in.

Captain Hanna lowered himself rom the stern, and was thrown by the sea over the reef, and among the rocks on shore. He managed to scramble up on to the beach. He was considerably bruised, and suffered much from cold.

Very few passengers of the Long Island-trains went in this boat—Mr. Tucker, the conductor, having expressed an opinion that it would be unsafe

The following are the names of the passengers saved, so far as could be ascertained:—Capt. Geo. W. Cullum, U.S. Engineer Corps; Seabury Brewster, New York; Capt. Peter Hanna, Portland; C. C. Orr. Louisville, Kentucky; Joel R. Andrews, New London; Lieut. E. Maynard, U.S.N.; Lieut. C. S. Steward, U.S. Engineer; Charles Cadnedy, New York; Hiram Tarbox, Lisbon, Ct., Francis Herrick, Boston; Geo. W. Rogers, New London; C. C. Comstock, ditto; Thomas Truesdell, New York; Thomas Gooding, Boston; Nahum Reise, Newark, N J.; E. V. Booth, Boston; Edward Muddon, ditto; Charles Mitchell, Norwich, C. Peterson, Boston; Henry Van Wart, Birmingham, England; Varnham Marsh, New York; James Wilkinson, Boston; Nathaniel Atwood, Massachusetts; Richard Atwood, ditto; T. O. Gould, Adams' Express; W. A. Munroe, ditto, ditto; Charles Christian, New York; Henry Fieligh; Richard W. Thompson, Boston; Richard J. Bonham, Bridgeport or Ridport; John Hillard, or Williams, New York; William Edward; Robert Vine, West Newbury, Massachusetts; Jacob Walter, ditto; Richard Alvord, Orleans; Calvin Houghton, Bradford, Vt.; T. F. Baldwin, Cincinnati.

There were but three female passengers on board, including the servant of Mrs. Lewis—all lost. There were probably eight or ten deck hands, who also perished.

GRAND MILITARY FUNERAL.

On Thursday week, the remains of the late Colonel Swales, of the Royal Marines, were interred with military ceremony, at St. Nicholas's, or the Royal Garrison Chapel, at Portsmouth. The grand procession, of which we annex an Engraving, (from a sketch by Mr. R. H. C Ubsdell), was witnessed by thousands of spectators, and attended by 2000 military. At about half-past ten o'clock, the body was brought into the barrack-yard, and passed down the line in review order, the troops presenting arms, after which the order was given to reverse arms; the band playing the "Dead March." First came—

Troops, with their arms reversed.
The Royal Marines, with the colours in crape.
The Royal Marine Artillery (2nd).
Officers of the Royal Marines
The Band, with instruments bound with crape.
The Clergy, wearing their robes.
The Medical Staff.

The rear was closed by the Lieutenant-Governor, the Hon. Sir Hercules Pakenham, and Major-General Jones, R.M.

RELICS OF AN ANCIENT WRECK OFF WHITSTABLE.

Yesterday week, at a meeting of the British Archæological Association, there were exhibited some remains from a wreck off Whitstable which had occurred, it would appear, in the time of Queen Elizabeth. It was stated that the existence of the wreck had long been known; but that, recently, the Government had directed an examination to be made by means of divers, who had brought up a vast quantity of ingots of tin, stone shot, &c. The objects forwarded to the Archæological Association consisted of a specimen of the ingots, stamped with the Royal mark of a rose surmounted by a crown; a round-toed leather shoe, quite perfect; a knife marked with a double fleur-de-lis; and a silk jacket. Mr. Planché stated that the jacket was one of the dagged or pounced kind, in fashion in the time of Elizabeth; and he pointed out, in an engraving of the period, an example precisely similar to that upon the table. A discussion took place as to the purposes for which the ingots of tin were intended, and many suggestions were offered. Captain Becher and Mr. Crofton Croker stated that it was probable that much information connected with the mysterious wreck would be soon obtained. Captain Beaufort believed he had already ascertained the name of the ship, and some particulars as to her freight.

CHRISTMAS IN TWO CENTURIES.

HAVING to write on the Eve of Christmas, we do so hoping, as usual, to be read, but confessing to certain doubts on the point; for we appear in the midst of a festival period, when politics are eschewed, and business for a space suspended—a thing not quite forgotten, but still not all absorbingly remembered. With men's own affairs thus postponed, shall they give more regard to those of the nation? Certainly not. There are gentlemen paid to be dignified and dismal in Downing-street, to deal with famines and foreign marriages as they can: to receive deputations of tax-deprecating citizens with a smile, and bow them out as they came—dissatisfied. All this is their vocation; the function is of their own seeking; and if it spoils their Christmas, it is no reason, reader, why it should do the same with ours; wherefore, in our communing this week, we mean to be as unpolitical and unbusiness-like as possible.

We thought of invoking the spirit of Fun, but there are masters whom he more readily obeys; and besides he is fully engaged rehearsing the pantomimes—in which, by the way, his appearance will be a refreshing novelty. In his absence we must try what the kindred spirit Cheerfulness can do towards reconciling us to Christmas as it is, since many persons persist in underrating and holding it very cheap compared with Christmas as it was,—we forget how long ago. The "good old times' are a most extraordinary epoch, for they are never to be found; we may go back as far as we will, and they are always more remote; in the days of Elizabeth, they were probably somewhere in the reign of King John—a very happy period, according to the chronicles; it was a very merry Christmas in the year the Barons were obliged to bring the King to book, or rather to parchment, at Runnymead; yet the old Lords, we dare say, lamenting the degeneracy of the times, sighed for the age of Alfred, when the Christmas must have been exceedingly "merry" also, amid continual wars, massacres, invasions, and a deluge of ignorance, that left scarce ten men in the realm who could read! And his old Saxon nobles, over their beer and metheglim, likewise lamented the evil days their Christmas was cast among; how far they went back for the better time of all men's hope, and no man's possession, Heaven only knows; certain it is we shall not follow them. We positively decline Stonehenge and the Druids!

We are content with an antiquity less sublime; we reckon only from the Georgian Era, and date our remote ages from the Hanoverian Succession. In a century, or thereabouts, the human race has decayed sufficiently for our purpose (the proving our own degeneracy), and Christmas along with it. We will, therefore, go back to the "golden prime" of a hundred years since, and try to conjecture what was doing at Christmas, 1746, imagine what we have lost in the interval, and for what the men of 1846 have to blush in the comparison!

No abuse is too heavy for the present generation. Novelists fill their pockets by painting it as intoxicated with the love of gold, and eager to make wealth by short cuts and visionary methods. Were our sires free from the same reproach? In 1746 the nation had scarcely recovered the shock of the South Sea Bubble, which, in its bursting, strewed the land with social and moral wrecks; and many was the cold hearth at the Christmas of that year, which should have been brightened by the wealth and happiness swept away in that gigantic delusion. Till similar ruin overtakes us, we may lay claim to more prudence than our sires; if not exempt from the madness of speculation, we at least show more method in it; and, at the worst, if greater wisdom is denied us, we have had at least better luck. By so much then, at least, is our Christmas of 1846 a merrier one than its predecessor of a century ago.

And in 1746 there were other abatements of the mirth o. the present season, or what we should now find complete extinguishers of it. A rebellion had just been crushed, not without peril to the throne; there were bloody thoughts in the hearts of the vanquished, and revenge in the hands of the victors; there were heads being cut off for treason, and stuck on Temple-bar—a cannibal spectacle; and outlaws and desperate men turned robbers and made Bagshot Heath a terror to men's souls, and there were neither gas-light, nor newspapers, nor police; and carriages could be stopped in Piccadilly by highwaymen, and there were murders in the streets, and violence everywhere, and the prisons were filled with fever as well as crime; and the laws were savage, and a dozen or fifteen men hung at Tyburn in a batch was a common morning's exhibition; and journeys were so long and dangerous, people made their wills before they set out on one; and society altogether was in a reckless state, since where examples were looked for, good examples were not to be found; the Court was profligate, the Parliament corrupt. All this, and more than this, may be learned from the chronicles of the time; and, had there not been strength, energy, and a healthy nature in the mass of the people, England would never have recovered from the countless evils of that eighteenth century, through which we rose, not so much by virtue of good government as in spite of bad. Yet many was the merry Christmas spent in the midst of all, for social customs wear the longest, and are pretty much the same in all times, and under every system; moreover, by a happy provision of nature, the sense of evils, like that of death, is "most in apprehension," and many things that seem insupportable to us, were treated by our fathers quite as matters of course. Thus were we handed down to this present Christmas of 1846.

And what have we gained through the good and ill of a century? Much for which it behoves us to be thankful. Through time and struggle we have emerged to clearer views and better practice in many things: the Laws are milder, and yet life and property are more safe; authority is settled and secure, and our only domestic wars are those of words. And as for material and physical improvements, in all that ministers to the comforts and luxuries of life, a bare catalogue of them, in the reign of George the Second, would have read like a chapter from the "Arabian Nights." We have not degenerated in any one point, and we have progressed in a thousand. Our beef is fatter, our beer is better, and we consume more of both; and to them we add accompaniments Sir Roger de Coverley never heard of—things unknown to the age that had not a Fortnum and Mason. We have even plebeianised pine-apples, till they are but one remove from potatoes. Can we estimate the perils of a diner-out at Christmas, 1746? Scarcely; for we have lost the traditions of sedan chairs and swords. But safely and swift runs the Patent Hansom, under gas-lights that make the sun a superfluity; there is not a highwayman in all the suburbs, and there is (or ought to be) the Police. And how coolly do we take journies that would have cost our ancestors an awful preparation! We merely pull on our gloves, take a seat—and get out at Liverpool, or elsewhere. Railroads alone have pushed us a thousand years in advance of the last century; there is no such thing as space now; we converse across continents and kingdoms, and feasting Mayors take wine with each other from York to Newcastle, as easily as if they were at the same table. We live among improvements of all kinds: Church, Bench, Bar, and Parliament are all changed for the better; the public departments are too well watched to be anything but honest; public men are above taking bribes; and as to the motives of our Statesmen, we have seen a Prime Minister give away his salary to build Churches with, contented with power and fame. In the face of all this, have we reason to despond of the future, or sigh for the past? All is not for the best, certainly; but the tendency is towards the better, and our progress is not yet done. Perhaps, England of 1946 will look back as we do now on the past century, and wonder how men lived in our benighted age; we heartily hope they may, for it will speak of progress still; and the speculations of "all the greatness yet to be," will warrant the wish of the poet—

To pass with all our social ties
  To silence, from the paths of men,
And every hundred years to rise,
  And learn the world, and sleep again,
To sleep through terms of mighty wars,
  To wake on science grown to more,
On secrets of the brain, the stars,
  As wild as ought of fairy lore;
And all that else the years will show—
  The poet forms of stronger hours,
The vast Republics that may grow,
  The Federations, and the Powers;
Titanic forces taking birth
  In divers seasons, diverse climes;
For we are ancients of the earth,
  And in the morning of the times!

THE WEATHER.

A great change has taken place in the weather during the past week, a rapid thaw having occurred, and the frost having entirely disappeared. The following are the particulars since our former notice:—Thursday, December 17, was a very cold day, the reading of the thermometer being 33° nearly all day, at night it declined to 21½°; and such was the reading on the morning of Friday, which was a bitter cold day, the temperature not rising above 24½°, till after noon. Towards the evening the thermometer readings increased, and continued doing so all the following night. On the morning of Saturday the reading was as high as 40°, being nearly 19° higher than it was at the same time on the previous day. Rain was falling on Saturday morning. The temperature continued between 40° and 50° during Sunday and Monday, and of course the thaw was rapid. On the latter day the thermometer reading rose to 48°, and afterwards fell rapidly; so that on Tuesday morning it had sunk to 30°, a point 17° lower than it was at the same time on the previous day. During Tuesday it rose to 41°, and sank at night to 34°. Rain on the morning of Wednesday fell to the depth of a quarter of an inch, and at night some sleet fell. The barometer reading has been unusually low this week, it having been down to 28·6 inches: it has since risen, though still low, being at present about 29¼ inches. The following are the extreme thermometrical readings each day:—

Thursday, Dec. 17,	the highest reading was 34 deg.	the lowest was 29 deg.
Friday, Dec. 18,	30	21½
Saturday, Dec. 19	46	40
Sunday, Dec. 20	47	43
Monday, Dec 21	48	35
Tuesday, Dec. 22	41	29

Blackheath, Dec. 24, 1846. J. G.

Infant School.—Education for the Middle Classes.—The first examination of an infant school for the middle classes established in Upper Barnsbury-street, Islington, and conducted on the improved system of the Home and Colonial Infant and Juvenile Schools Society, Gray's Inn-road, was held on Friday week, at the British School-rooms in Denmark-street. The interest which has been awakened, notwithstanding the recent formation of the establishment, was strongly indicated by the large and highly respectable audience with which the spacious room was filled. The school, which, although it has not been in existence nine months, contains already upwards of fifty children, is, we understand, one of the first which has been opened for this purpose. The examination was conducted under the superintendence of Mr. Dunning, of the Home and Colonial Society, and Mr. Curwen, of Plaistow. These gentlemen expressed themselves much delighted with the joyous freedom of the little ones and their prompt and intelligent replies. A resolution, expressive of the confidence of the meeting in the teachers, and in the mode of teaching adapted, was moved by some of the parents, and most cordially responded to by all present. Altogether it was a most gratifying and influential meeting.

Tunnelling the Alps.—The Moniteur Belge announces that experiments have been made in order to test the efficacy of a machine just invented for the purpose of effecting a new and speedy method of boring tunnels. It is proposed to apply this machine to the construction of the great tunnel about to be commenced in connection with one of the Italian lines. The machine was placed in front of the web, and effected a bore to the depth of 18½ centimetres in thirty-five minutes. At this rate the new invention will complete upwards of five metres of bore per day, and the proposed tunnel through Mount Cenis will be finished in the space of three years. The experiments have been repeated twice before several of the first engineers of France, and with the most complete success.

One Day's Importation of Foreign Provisions.—The following is a statement of the importations of foreign provisions into Liverpool, as reported in the Customs bill of entry of Tuesday: 35,507 barrels of flour, 82,218 bushels Indian corn, 30,964 bushels wheat, 3,5[illegible]0 barrels meal, 10,618 sacks Indian corn, 2,001 sacks wheat, 1,660 tierces rice, 1 460 quarters buck wheat, 585 quarters beans, 900 quarters barley, 1,160 quarters, 197 barrels, 22 tierces, and 3 hogsheads peas, 520 barrels pork, 50 barrels beef, 1,966 boxes cheese, 50 hogsheads, 24 tierces, and 99 casks bacon, 70 barrels bread, 177 barrels and 6 packages onions, 104 firkins butter, 762 barrels, 2 tierces, and 8,196 kegs lard, 50 bags oats.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

Paris has been considerably excited this week by a rumour that Russia intends to complete the spoliation of Poland, and that Poland is about to be called New Russia, and incorporated with the empire of Russia. This report emanates from the German papers; and, whether well or ill founded, seems to divide public attention with the recent violation of the independence of Cracow.

Louis Philippe has been slightly indisposed; but was better when the last accounts left Paris.

Mr. Cobden has returned to France from Spain. He reached Perpignan on the 14th inst., on his way to England.

Considerable sensation has been created in Paris by the seizure of the National, particularly as the precise cause of the seizure does not seem to be known. The power of seizure, so unprovokedly exercised, says a Paris letter, "must suggest strange reflections to all who read the daily claims of the existing Government to the title of constitutional. The cause for this stretch of the arbitraire may appear hereafter."

Deshayes, the celebrated dancer, died a few days ago in Paris. Last season he came to visit the beloved precincts of the Opera again, and being invited to a dinner with Taglioni, Cerito, and many of the first of the light-heeled fraternity, all the memories of his glories were revived, and he had so many toasts on the subject to drink in champagne, that he grew glorious himself afterwards; and, instead of going to bed, strolled into the fields, and nearly broke his neck in a pit. However, he recovered with broken shins, and died loved and esteemed by all who knew him

Before the Bey of Tunis left Paris, he presented a sum of money to the poor. He also handed 20,000f. to Colonel Thierry, to be divided amongst the persons belonging to the King's household, who were attached to his service during his visit to Paris. He distributed several rich presents, and Captain Cheret, who was charged with the service of the palace, received the decoration of the Nichan. His Highness gave the decoration of this order, the statutes of which he has lately assimilated to those of the Legion of Honour, to about thirty persons during his stay.

The Portefeuille states that King Leopold, when his visit to Paris is concluded, will set out for London, where he will arrive about the middle of January.

The public distress in various parts of France continues to excite the attention and activity of the Government. A report of the Minister of the Interior on this subject appeared in the official journals on Sunday, accompanied by an ordonnance for extraordinary credits to the amount of 5,200,000 francs, to carry on commercial works, by means of which it was expected the population would be relieved in quarters which cannot be reached by the influence of the other and larger public works which are in progress.

The Courrier Français contains an article upon the subject of the relations between the Bank of England and the Bank of France, in the course of which it has the following absurd commentary upon the Battle of Waterloo. The Courrier says: "As soon as the Bank of France is suspected of having need of the Bank of England John Bull is unwilling that this service should be claimed on the score of reciprocity. He pretends to have all the merit of aiding us, and will not hear of having ever been obliged by us Never since Waterloo has more insolence (outrecuidance) been seen in attributing to one's self a usurped glory. Every one knows the pretension of the English to claim the victory at the Battle of Waterloo the morning after the battle. The movement of retreat on the Brussels road, the terrible charges of our Cuirassiers breaking into and sabering the English squares, careering for two hours in every direction over the high ground of Waterloo, in the midst of the English army at their wits' end—the tears of despair shed by Wellington at the sight of this frightful carnage, the most terrible that history makes mention of—the miraculous arrival of the Prussians to snatch the victory from our hands, and who alone saved the English army from the most complete destruction,—all this, we say, was forgotten the day after the battle. They not the less assume the merit of our defeat; and it is as a usurped glory that Waterloo is dear to them. Their monuments, their streets, their quays, are so many commemorations of Waterloo! They have Waterloo Bridge, Waterloo Place, and Waterloo Column! This habit of attributing to themselves a usurped glory is, indeed, one of the distinctive signs of the English character; and why, therefore, should it be astonishing that they refuse to the Bank of France the honour of having rendered a service to the Bank of England?"

The weather in Paris relaxed in severity on Saturday afternoon, when a rapid thaw, accompanied by rain, commenced. The rain continued on Sunday, the snow, which covered the roads, rapidly dissolving.

The Marseilles papers state, that the severest cold ever experienced in that town was felt there on Saturday and Sunday last. The streets were frozen, and the violence of the mistral rendered it impossible to pass from one part of the town to another."

SPAIN.

The Madrid papers are almost wholly occupied with the results of the elections. The Progressists have nominated at Seville M. Cortina; and M. Antonio Gonzales, who was President of the Council under Espartero, has also been elected. and M. Salamanca has been returned by a college in the province of Alicante. The Espagnol states that the election of M. Olozaga, who was President of the Council in 1843, when his conduct towards the Queen was discussed in the Cortes, has been the subject of a Cabinet Council. On the 16th the results of 289 nominations were known at Madrid, viz., according to the Ministerial accounts—For the Moderados, 203; for the Progressistas, 60; and for all the other Oppositionists, 26. Amongst the Opposition members is M. Pascual Madoz, formerly Vice-President of the Chamber of Deputies. M. Pidal, the Minister of the Interior, had been returned Deputy for Madrid, in opposition to the Marquis del Socorro, the Progressista candidate. There had been a scrutiny, but the result of it was, the triumph of M. Pidal, who had a majority of 91 votes over his rival.

Private letters from Madrid state that the public were dissatisfied and the Palace alarmed at the courtesy of Lord Palmerston towards the Count de Montemolin.

It appears that the weather has been excessively cold at Vittoria. On the 15th, snow fell in abundance, and the thermometer on the 13th had fallen to nine degrees of Reaumer below the freezing point, which is nearly double the maximum of cold experienced in Paris. The poor of Vittoria are, in consequence of the severe weather, in a dreadful state, and if food were not distributed to them daily they must starve.

THE CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

Cape of Good Hope papers to the 14th of October have arrived. They do not contain any further accounts of warlike operations against the Kaffirs; but a postscript of the South African Commercial Advertiser of the above date gives the following interesting facts from the Graham's Town Journal of the 3rd of October. The latter paper says:—

"The records of the past week, though they tell of the death of two more of our unfortunate fellow-colonists at the hand of the treacherous Kaffir, are, upon the whole, encouraging. Colonel Somerset has been again doing good service in the field, and with results which may well convince the colony of the zeal, gallantry, and unceasing activity of this officer.

"Overtures of peace have been made by the Gaika chiefs."

The Governor's terms in substance were—

1st. That these tribes should lay down their arms.

2nd. That they should give up all the colonial cattle.

3rd. That the country as far as the Kei should be placed under British control—those Kaffirs who remain on this side submitting to such regulations as may be made for their future government.

"Macomo, it is said, seemed disposed individually to agree to these conditions, but by the others they were entirely rejected. They stated they never heard of a conquered people being required to give up their arms—that most of the cattle were dead, and that they were tired of the war, and they were determined not to fight any more. They were under our feet, and our commandos might go to their kraals without any resistance on their part, but that to give up their guns was out of the question.

Summary of Colonel Somerset's proceedings, extracted from his despatches to his Excellency the Governor:—

"Sept. 22, 1846.

"Shot 4 of the enemy, took 4 prisoners, 15 horses, 112 head of cattle, and 3 guns, belonging to Seyolo's tribe.

"Sept. 24, 1846.

"Captured 1100 head of the Gaika cattle, and 30 horses, and shot 5 of the enemy.

"Sept. 29, 1846.

"Secured by mid-day on the 27th, 3000 head of superior cattle, mostly colonial, and a few horses.

"In these operations 22 of the enemy have fallen, but without casualty on the side of the troops."

Although the Cape papers do not supply any new facts of importance, one of the latest date contains details of results already known of a very interesting character. The conference between Colonel Johnstone and the Gaika chiefs had been broken off, the latter having refused to comply with the terms proposed by the Colonel for the termination of the war. The Kaffir chiefs were then informed that a resumption of hostilities would immediately take place; they replied that their tribes were sick and tired of warfare, and that they intended to abandon the gun for the spade—to occupy their time in the cultivation of their gardens—and that the English might come and kill them when they pleased. Singularly enough, several of the individuals who attended the conference rode horses, carried guns, and wore the military uniforms which had belonged to the Cape soldiery. Dysentery prevailed among the Kaffirs, which rendered them weak and almost helpless, among whom was Macomo, one of the principal chiefs. We regret to state that a British settler, named Williams, who had been a resident in the colony for the last twenty-six years, was cruelly butchered by the Kaffirs near the mouth of the Kowie river, while quietly and industriously pursuing his laborious occupations in the field. The Rev. Mr. Calderwood narrowly escaped a similar death; for while he was riding on the road to Fort Beaufort, with dispatches from the Governor (Sir P. Maitland), he unexpectedly came into contact with a small body of Kaffirs, when instantaneously three or four assegais were hurled at him, which happily missed the object intended; and the rev. gentleman succeeded in galloping away from the deadly fury of his enemies. A Phillipton, the Kaffirs had set fire to several houses and larger buildings, which ended in their total destruction; among the number was the chapel frequented by the Hottentots, belonging to the London Missionary Society.

THE UNITED STATES.

The packet Europe has arrived from New York, with accounts one day later than those by the Acadia, received last week. No intelligence had been received from Mexico. General Scott sailed from New York on the 30th ult., in the ship Union, for NewOrleans. The New York Herald premises that on his arrival at Matamoras and Camargo, he will assume the command of the United States forces stationed in and around those places, and organise them for a forward movement on San Luis Potosi, where he will form a junction with General Taylor.

A frightful steam-boat disaster took place on the 21st November, on the Mississippi, about seven miles below Natchez, arising out of a collision between the steamers Sultana and Maria; the former bound down the river, and the latter up. The connection-pipe of the Maria, by the force of the concussion, was broken; the chief clerk, the second engineer, and between twenty-five and thirty of the crew and passengers were scalded. The Maria sunk so suddenly, that about thirty passengers in the lower deck, not having time to escape, went down in her. The cabin passengers were all saved.

THE WEST INDIES.

The Forth steamer has brought the West India mails. The dates are, from Trinidad the 17th, Demerara and St. Kitt's the 18th, Barbadoes and Dominica the 21st, Jamaica the 23rd, and Antigua the 26th ult. The papers contain very little matter possessing anything beyond a local interest.

The Jamaica Assembly had met in session, which was opened by a speech from the Lieutenant-Governor, the Governor-General (Sir C. Grey) not having arrived in time. The Assembly had immediately proceeded to the consideration of various measures rendered necessary by the late alteration of the sugar duties.

The news from the other islands is unimportant, excepting the favourable reports generally as to the growing crops.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

THE LIABILITY OF MEMBERS OF PROVISIONAL COMMITTEES.

In the Court of Queen's Bench, on Monday, another case was tried, in which Lord Denman made some important remarks upon the subject of the liability of provisional committeemen. The case was that of Mitchell v Moore. It was an action by the plaintiff, an advertising agent, to recover a sum of £1174 from the defendant, in his character of member of the provisional committee of the Great Western Extension Atmospheric Railway Company. The sum in question was composed of £1014 spent in advertisements, and of £160 for commission for procuring their insertion. The company appeared to be got up by a Mr. Brooks, and one or two other persons. Among the gentlemen whose names were stated to be those of supporters of the railway, was that of the Hon Newton Fellowes, of Devonshire. On the 3rd of September, the defendant, who was described as a Major in the army, residing near Cavendish-square, wrote a letter, in which he said, "I have no objection to my name being put on the committee of the Great Western Extension Atmospheric Railway Company." A prospectus of the company, with the name of the defendant as one of the provisional committee, was published on the following day. How, or by whose directions, the name was printed was not proved. A meeting of the shareholders and provisional committee, was held at the Bull and Mouth on the 13th of October, and on that day the defendant was appointed on the managing committee. It appeared that the plaintiff was present at a meeting on the 18th of October.

When this claim was made upon the defendant, his attorney, Mr. Few, called on the secretary of the committee, and inquired how it was that any proceedings had been taken against the defendant. He was answered, that the defendant was a member of the provisional committee. Mr. Few said, he had withdrawn his consent to be so; but the secretary said, that if Mr. Few thought so, he was in error. Mr. Few asked, whether the defendant had not, on the 4th of September, written a letter, withdrawing, or, at least, suspending, his consent to be on the provisional committee until he could consult his friend, Mr. Newton Fellowes, on the subject? The secretary, at first, denied that any such letter had been received; but Mr. Few having recalled several circumstances to the mind of the secretary, the latter at last said, "Now you mention it, I think there was some letter suspending the consent to be on the provisional committee, but when I afterwards saw him, on the 13th October, he renewed his consent." This renewal of consent was utterly denied by the defendant, and the secretary, being examined upon the fact, adhered to the statement that the defendant had renewed his consent on the 13th of October.

Mr Crowder then addressed the Jury for the defendant, and insisted that the circumstances of this case did not show anything on the part of the defendant which could be construed into such an acting as a provisional committeeman, as could give the plaintiff the right to say that he trusted to the defendant's character and credit.

Lord Denman said that, in the present state of the law on this subject, it was a great satisfaction to him to address a full special Jury of the merchants of London, and to find, as he had had the opportunity of doing, by reading the two cases referred to, that there was not that degree of difference of opinion among the Judges which some persons had often supposed. He was disposed to say that the very question which was put in one of these cases, and on which the verdict was deemed to be satisfactory, was that which he himself had intended to put to the Jury in this case. He should take the form of that question from the case itself, and should state as the law, "that in every case the question was one of fact for the Jury, dependent on the evidence, the plaintiff being pledged to prove that the defendant has, expressly or impliedly, personally, or by his agent, duly authorised on that behalf, pledged his credit for the performance of the contract sought to be enforced." To decide that question, he agreed that it ought to be left "to the Jury to say whether the defendant, by becoming a member of the provisional committee, had authorised the plaintiff to hold him out to the world as a person who would be liable for the preliminary expenses about to be incurred? And, secondly, was his name, in fact, so held out?" In the present case, acting upon that authority, he should ask the Jurors to say whether the defendant's name had been so held out to the world, and did he, by becoming a member of the provisional committee, authorise the secretary to pledge his credit, and to make him liable for those expenses for which this action was brought? The question in the case he had quoted was more complicated with facts than it was here, for then the action was brought by attorneys for doing business which was not of the sort properly called the ordinary business of an attorney. The Jurors here would have to say whether the defendant's letter gave authority to the secretary of the company to represent him to the world as a provisional committeeman, and if so, whether he acted as such? Did he authorise the secretary to employ the party who put these advertisements into the paper? (His Lordship read the whole of the evidence, and then continued his observations.) If the party gave authority to have his name put forth as a provisional committeeman, and if that authority imported a further authority to persons to do work for the company of which he was a provisional committeeman, then it was useless to speculate how far the credit of A or of B was looked to by the particular creditor, for in that case all the provisional committeemen would be bound. It that respect it was like a partnership. If two men wrote over a shop window "Smith and Co.," though a person dealing at the house knew neither of the individuals who assumed this designation, yet the persons who acted under it would be liable. In determining this case, the Jurors would not consider what was the meaning of the words "provisional committeemen," as used now, but what was their meaning at the time this business took place. If the defendant was by his own act a member of a body then known as a provisional committee, he must be bound by the acts of that body, and it mattered nothing whether he agreed with the majority or the minority of that body, for by becoming a member of it, he bound himself by its acts. In that respect the case was different from a partnership. It was stated on behalf of the defendant, that the name which he had sent on the 3rd of September was either actually withdrawn or the use of it suspended; but the principle he had laid down was, that if once a man became a member of a body of this sort, it was no longer a mere question of individual responsibility; but the principle of authority given to hold out the name of the individual as a provisional committeeman, would at once apply, and the recalling of the name in this manner would be too late. If the Jury should think that the defendant had given authority to the secretary to print his name as a provisional committeeman, then he was liable to the whole of the account, provided they thought that, as that character was considered in 1845, he was liable to anything of this kind. But if they should be of opinion that he had not authorised the publication of his name, the verdict must be in his favour, and so it must if he had withdrawn in time, and it had then been published without his authority, for that would show that he had not given the secretary authority to order the expenditure which was the subject matter of the present action.

The Jury, after retiring for a short time, returned a verdict for the defendant.

MORE RAILWAY LITIGATION.

On Tuesday in the same Court, a case was tried, Newton and another, v. Stewart. It was an action to recover a sum of £234 for money expended and labour performed by the plaintiffs, who are advertising agents, on behalf of the directors of the Herne and Canterbury Railway, of whom the defendant was one The money was claimed in respect of the insertion in a great many newspapers, of advertisements for the company in question. The defendant, who was a gentleman of property, had been inserted in the list of provisional committeemen on the 16th of October, 1845. On the following day, the first order was given to the plaintiffs for advertising the company. This was followed by other orders on the 22d of October, the 9th and 18th of November in the same year, and the 13th of January, 1846. The name of the defendant was among those of the provisional committeemen before the first order was given, and he had taken an active share in the committee after the last order had been executed.

It was contended for the defendant, that his name had been inserted as a member of the provisional committee without his consent, and that he took no active part in the affairs of the company till just before the last order was given, and then only for the purpose of settling their affairs in a satisfactory manner. In support of this defence, Mr. Bain, a parliamentary agent, was called, who said he gave in the name of the defendant to the provisional committee of this company. When he did so, he had no authority from the defendant to do so. The defendant was a friend of his. He had no special authority. He thought he had a general authority. He had done exactly the same to several other friends of his. He had named the defendant on other companies besides this.

Lord Denman, in summing up the case to the Jury, said that, if the witness Bain had had a general authority to insert the defendant's name, then the verdict would be for the whole amount; but, otherwise, the line must be drawn from the 15th of November, as that was the day on which, by his own act, his liability commenced.

The Jury retired for about two hours, and then returned a verdict for the plaintiffs for the full amount claimed.

A Remnant of the Last Generation.—Died, at Melksham, on the 14th inst., at his nephew's, Mr. Newman, George Inn, Mr. George Harding, in his 101st year. The deceased was a native of Bradford, and was born at Barton Farm, of which his father was then the occupier. At the death of George II. he was working with his uncle, a hatter, on the Borough Walls, Bath; and was, even lately, wont to describe with much animation the gaieties which took place in that city on the accession of George III. He was twice married, but he left no descendants. Till within a few weeks of his death he retained all his faculties, and in all weathers took his daily walk.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

Death from Cold and Want. On Saturday Mr. G. J. Mills held an inquiry at the Grapes Tavern, Fulham-road, Brompton, into the circumstances attending the death of Anne Boyce, fifty-six years of age. Samuel Webber, gardener, of No. 10, Yeoman's-row, near Brompton, deposed that the deceased lodged at his house. On the morning of Wednesday last, about five o'clock, he found her lying on the floor quite dead. There was no bed in the room, but some rags. Deceased was lying on the bare floor, without any covering, in the middle of the room. Had seen deceased about half-past twelve on the previous night. When deceased came to witness's house, a week before she died, she said she had been hurried out of No. 4, in the same row, because she could not pay the rent. From the evidence of other witnesses it appeared that the deceased was a widow of a soldier in the Life Guards; that she had since his death got her living by washing and charing, that she was frequently up washing all night, and on one occasion set herself on fire while so employed; that she belonged to the parish of St George's-in-the-East, by whom she was allowed 1s. 6d. per week, which she had for the last two years received through Mr. Madden, the relieving officer for Kensington, who, on seeing her on Thursday week last, looking very bad, advised her to go into St. George's workhouse, but she refused doing so, saying she would rather die in the street than enter a workhouse. Mr. Monis, the surgeon, who had made a post mortem examination of the body, deposed to having found no cause of death. There was not a particle of food in the stomach, and from the general appearance of the body, and the history of the case, he considered death had been caused by the effects of extreme cold. The Jury returned a verdict of "Died from the effects of the intense cold, and the want of the common necessaries of life"

Boiler Explosion at Bristol.—On Saturday morning a steam-engine boiler exploded at the factory of Stothert, Hayter, and Co., civil engineers, St. Philip's, Bristol, by which two men were killed, and several others were seriously injured. The workpeople were out at breakfast, except those belonging to the engine-house, and two men who had gone thither (contrary to rule) to take their morning repast. The explosion blew away the brickwork around the fire-boxes, scattering the boiling water and steam in all directions. Escape was impossible, and all present were covered with the scalding fluid, and received the most serious injuries. One poor young man, named John Thatcher, was scalded from head to foot, and that not only externally, but the boiling water and steam forced their way into his lungs, and injured the air tubes. The Coroner's Jury returned a verdict of "Accidental Death"

Dreadful Death of a Child by Burning.—Last Sunday se'nnight, a little boy, about five years of age, named Francis M'Arthur, who resided with his grandmother, No. 2, Montfort-place, Kennington, the widow of the late Rev. John Davison, Treasurer and Prebendary of Chichester Cathedral, prompted by curiosity to investigate the contents of a vessel serving some culinary purpose, so closely approached the fire that his pinafore ignited. He attempted to suppress the flames, but without success, when, in his terror, he ran into the garden, alarming the neighbours with the cry of fire Returning into the house, still blazing, he ran up stairs to the domestic, who had gone to her room for the purpose of changing her cap, and was the only other person in the house at the time of the calamity. The girl's terror was scarcely less than that of the little sufferer. She endeavoured, she believes, as well as she could collect herself, to extinguish the flames. By this time, however, Mrs. Moore, residing next door, had, attracted by the shrieks of the child, scrambled over the wall, and proceeded to his relief. The burning clothes having been removed, the most appalling spectacle conceivable presented itself. All the lower part of the trunk was burned literally to a hard crust. The agony of the child may be conceived; reaction, it is stated, did not take place for many hours. After some days the wound sloughed fearfully, and, in the process of dressing, great part of the region of the abdomen was removed. The most extraordinary fact connected with the disaster is, that the child lingered for twelve days, when death relieved him from his sufferings.

Murder and Suicide.—On Monday morning, between ten and eleven o'clock, the bodies of a female and a little boy were discovered embedded in the mud of the Thames, nearly opposite Waterloo Dock, by two boys, who were dredging by the river side. The child was tied round the waist of the woman with a piece of rope-yarn, and her arms were both pressed around its neck. The boys gave information to Mr. Anderson, the Coroner's constable, who caused the bodies to be conveyed to the vaults of St John's Church, Waterloo-road. They were, on Tuesday morning, identified by a sister-in-law of the deceased woman; their names are Hannah Reid, aged 32; and William Reid, a remarkably handsome child, aged 11 months. The female was unmarried, and for a length of time had no settled residence. She had been in a state of the greatest poverty and destitution. There is every reason to suppose that it was an act of self-destruction on the part of the woman, and it is also thought that she did not precipitate herself and child from any of the bridges, but went into the river from one of the wharfs in the Belvidere-road. From the appearance of the bodies, it is imagined they could not have been in the water more than six or seven hours at the time they were discovered. When last seen alive, the poor woman appeared very disconsolate and unhappy, and she frequently stated that her troubles were more than she could bear. She had written a letter to the person who identified the bodies, in which she made known her intention of destroying her life, and stated that it was all owing to the treatment she had received from one of her own relatives. —Mr Carter held an inquest on the bodies on Wednesday. Ann Jones, of 30, New-street, Webber-street, Lambeth, stated that she had known the deceased about fifteen months. She had been living in the same room with witness during the last three months. She had no male protector, but had been maintained by witness as well as she could afford. Deceased had no means of supporting herself and child, but she received 1s. 6d. per week from St. Dunstan's parish. Witness saw the deceased alive last on Thursday evening (last week). She went out at seven o'clock, saying at the time that she was going to meet the father of her child, and she did not return. A month ago, had heard her say, if her circumstances did not alter, she would drown herself. Deceased also said, if she did so, she would drown her child also. Deceased said, "You don't know my feelings." Had often seen her crying, and believed that she destroyed the life of her child, and also her own life.—The Jury returned a verdict, "That Hannah Reid had wilfully murdered William Reid, and destroyed her own life, she being at the time of unsound mind"

Death from Starvation in Liverpool.—An inquest was held a few days since, at Liverpool, on the body of Martin Finnigan. Catherine Freeman, a widow residing in Lace-street, said, deceased and his wife and three children came to lodge in her cellar a fortnight ago They appeared to be in a very destitute state, and got their living by begging. The wife and children left the house on Friday morning, about nine o'clock. He went out along with them, and did not return until nine at night, when he was brought home by four men. He then appeared very ill. He was put to bed, and died about two o'clock the next morning. No surgeon saw him until after his death. During the time he was living in the cellar he had not sufficient food, and had nothing but what he procured by begging. His wife had applied at the parish-office, and had been relieved twice with bread, but the deceased had had no relief. Mr. Kilner, surgeon, when he was called, found deceased dead. On a post-mortem examination, he found that death had been caused by disease of the lungs, and the want of sufficient food combined. The want of food was the principal cause of death. The Jury returned a verdict to the effect stated—disease of the lungs, and want of sufficient food.

The Illicit Distillery under the Waterloo-Road.—In the Court of Excise, on Tuesday, John Harris, of 180, Waterloo-road, appeared to answer informations for having worked illicit stills on his premises near the Waterloo-road, the discovery of which was recently noticed in our paper. The facts of the discovery were stated by the officers, who said the defendant represented that the premises had been let to a person named Brown, and that the existence of the stills was unknown to him. The penalties were laid at £2400. The defendant was fined £600, and the whole of the seizure was condemned.

Accident on the Manchester and Leeds Railway.—On Monday morning an accident occurred on the Manchester and Leeds Railway, of a very serious character; but, fortunately, no lives were lost. It appears, that when the frost gave way, some of the rocks, through which a great portion of the line is cut, began to slip. During the night of Sunday, a large piece of stone slipped from one of these cuttings on to the line, near the mouth of the tunnel at Luddenfoot. About six o'clock in the morning a luggage train, travelling at full speed, came in contact with the rock, which threw the engine and tender off the rails. The concussion was very great, and three of the trucks were broken, and the engine and tender much injured. At the moment the concussion took place, the stoker jumped off the tender, and, falling on the rails, broke his leg. No other injury was sustained.

Frightful Accident at Pembroke Dockyard A dreadful and fatal accident occurred in Pembroke Dockyard a few days ago. A poor fellow, while oiling certain cog wheels attached to the steam-engine for setting in motion the grindstones, got entangled in them, and was twisted round them with such violence, as actually to sever his head from his body on the instant. The head remained in the machinery, while the body fell to the ground.

Fatal Accident on the Manchester and Liverpool Railway.—On Tuesday night a collision took place on this line of railway at the station near Parkside, by which one of the servants of the company was killed on the spot, and several other persons sustained injury. It appears that the man who lost his life was the breaksman in charge of a waggon train, and was what is termed "slipping" along the line, the frost preventing the wheels from properly bearing upon the rails. Of course he thus cleared the way for any train which might follow, and unfortunately, so dense is the fog stated to have been, that the passenger-train from Manchester ran into the waggon-train, and the unfortunate man was forced from his position by the violence and suddenness of the shock, and instantly killed.

The Forgery on Messrs. Rogers and Co.—One of the bills included in the robbery from the premises of Messrs. Rogers and Co. (and which has since been paid, upon indemnity, to that firm) was on Wednesday anonymously transmitted to the acceptors in a post letter. The letter intimated, that as there was no chance of the business being settled, the writer thought that the bill might as well be given up

The Late Accident on the Bolton Railway—Tinsley, the stoker, who had one leg and the foot of the other leg cut off in this accident, died in the Manchester Infirmary on Monday evening. At the inquest the Jury came to the conclusion that the deceased's death was occasioned by injuries received in consequence of the excessive speed at which Allen was driving the engine, being, in effect, a verdict of manslaughter against Allen, the deceased engineer.

Opening of the Charter House District Schools.—On Wednesday, the interesting ceremony of opening the district schools attached to the Church of St. Thomas, Charter House, Goswell-street, Saint Luke's was performed by the Lord Mayor of London, assisted by Mr. Sheriff Kennard, in the presence of a large assemblage of the inhabitants of this populous parish. His Lordship arrived shortly after three o'clock, and was received by the Rev. W. Rogers, the incumbent of St. Thomas, the Rev. T. Hackman, the Rev. T. Jackson, and the Committee.

The Match was* not "finished at Brighton." It was began and finished in London. A portion of the games were played by mutual consent in the country; and these, on the part of Mr. Harrwitz, are admitted to be the best of the whole: but the first four, and the last six, were played in London; and, of these last six, with all the assistance, encouragement, and support of friends, which M St Amant thinks were so indispensable for him, Mr. Harrwitz lost four!

It is perfectly sound, in the Scotch game, for the attacking player to advance the Queen's flank Pawns, as practised by Mr. S., in his second game with Mr. Harrwitz. 3rd. In the position given, we prefer retiring the Bishop to Q Kt 3rd; but, in either case, the game is about equal.*

"F. G. M."—The forthcoming work by Mr. Staunton will be published by Mr. H. G. Bohn, and promises to be the most complete and scientific analysis of the Openings and Ends of Games which has ever appeared.

"Subscriber," Tooting.—The King cannot, under any circumstances, place himself in check.

"The Rector."—We gave the solution in the Notices to Correspondents, Dec 12th. White's first move is R to K 6th, then R to K 4th, mating next move with the Pawn.

"G. P."—"Vaga Valley"—Thanks; but they are much too simple for our columns.

"Kassim."—When we are less pressed for time and room.

"J W. W."—When a Pawn has been advanced to the 8th sq., it must be exchanged for a piece, before another move is made.

"E. B. S."—You cannot Castle if your King is in check. The entrance-fee is three guineas.

"C. F."—The "Chess-Player's Chronicle" is announced to appear in Weekly Numbers, at 3d. each—a very necessary improvement; because it will enable the conductors to avail themselves directly of the intelligence contained in the several Foreign periodicals devoted to Chess.

Solutions by "C. F.," "Nepos," "S. P. Q. R.," "Sopracitta," "Caerphilly," and "G. A. H.," are correct.

These notes are by the Editor of the Berlin Schachzeitung.

(a) If White had played K Kt P one, Black might have replied with Q P one, a move adopted in a game between Walker and Kieseritzkij. This game was continued thus—

9. K Kt P one	Q P one
10. B takes P	Q B P one
11. B to Q Kt 3rd	Q to Q 5th

Black has now a pawn more, as at the beginning, with a very superior position.* If White, at his 10th move, take Q P with P instead of the B, Black would get a good game by K Kt to K B 4th.

(b) We consider the move of Q to her 2nd, as given in "Bilguer's Handbuch," better than this; in proof of which we refer to the following note.

(c) It would have been much better play to take the K B P with Q's Bishop. After that sacrifice, the game would have been in favour of Black. Why, we leave to the discernment of our readers.

(d) If, at his 27th move, Black had played Q Kt takes Q P, White would have played, instead of this move, Q R to K B sq.

(e) K to Q 2nd, would have made the game more difficult.

---

* The move in question has long been practised in England. It was first played here by Mr. Knight, one of our strongest amateurs, and is familiarly known as "Mr. Knight's Defence."

The following lively game was lately played at the London Chess Club. Mr. Horwitz in both cases giving his Qs Rook, which must therefore be taken from the board before the reader attempts to play over the moves.

White. (Mr. H.)	Black. (Amateur.)	White. (Mr. H.)	Black. (Amateur.)
1. K P two	K P two	14. K B P one	K Kt takes P

6. Q P two	P takes P	19 B takes Q P	Q takes R
7. Castles	Q to K B's 3rd (a)	20 B takes Q (ch)	K takes B
8. K P one	Q to Kt 3rd (b)	21 Q to her 5th (ch)	B to K 3rd
9. P takes P	Q takes Q Kt	22 Q takes Kt	R to Q B sq

11. Kt to K Kt 5th	K Kt to R 3rd	24. Q B to K Kt 5th	Q R P two
12. K B P two	Castles	25. Q to B 3rd (ch)	K to his sq
13. K R P two (c)	Q Kt P one	26. Q B P one (e)—and wins.

(a) This is not to be commended.

(b) White having no Q's Rook, this move, attacking the Kt, is not quite so bad as it would be in an even game.

(c) Now the fatal position of Black's Q becomes apparent.

(d) Taking the Q would have satisfied an ordinary player. But a master, when he sees a good move, looks for a better.

(e) Closing up his only aperture for escape.

American Flour for the Queen of England!—Notwithstanding that the flour and other bread-stuffs sent to England are of the purest quality, we learn, from the Batavia Times, that Mr. Henry Smith, an enterprising miller of that county, sent six barrels of the choicest superfine Genessee flour, manufactured at his mill in Wheatland, Monroe county, to Queen Victoria, and for which, in due time, he received from her Majesty the comfortable little sum of three thousand dollars. The flour was put up in highly finished barrels, neatly varnished, enclosed in sacks, and forwarded direct to the Queen, at London. The fortunate experiment upon the appetite of Royalty seems to have suited her Majesty's palate so nicely, that, in addition to the ample remuneration for his first adventure, he has recently received an order direct from London, for three thousand barrels more "of the same sort," which he has promptly forwarded.—New York American Sun, Nov. 30.

COUNTRY NEWS.

Dinner by Mr. Hudson, as Mayor of York.—On Thursday (last week), Mr. Hudson gave an inaugural dinner as Mayor of York. Several eminent individuals were present, including Lord G. Bentinck and the Duke of Leeds. In the course of the evening, the health of Lord G. Bentinck having been given, the noble Lord, after speaking of himself as leader of the opposition, said, "It has been remarked by the great Minister of France that railways, next to the art of printing, have been the most powerful instrument that the ingenuity of man ever devised for the civilisation of the world. And if my right hon. friend cannot claim for himself the invention which he has carried out, at least he can claim more than any other man in the world, that he has carried that invention into practice. Who is there here that does not feel the advantage which the invention of George Stephenson, carried out by George Hudson, has produced? We all remember the state of distress that cast a gloom over the entire empire in 1839 and 1840. 40 000 able-bodied labourers were in the workhouse, the revenue was falling off, and there were 1,500 000 paupers upon the poor-rate. Railways were at a discount. My right hon. friend stepped forth, and set a noble example. He roused the talent and dormant energies of his countrymen—he urged them to action—and it is in the greatest degree to his exertions that railways have been since constructed, which are daily giving employment to 200,000 labourers, at wages averaging 22s. 6d. per week. Hence the prosperity of the last few years. But that is not all. We have heard to-day what the city of York has gained in the article of coals alone. We hear much of cheap justice at every man's door, but I think, at this inclement season of the year, when winter has laid her frosty hand upon the earth, we must all feel that cheap fuel for the poor man's hearth is at present a far greater blessing than any other that can be conferred upon him; and it is to my right hon. friend that the poor of the city of York are indebted for the blessing. Where they once paid, as I have been told, 16s. 6d. a ton for their coals, before railways were established, they now pay 6s 6d. The advantage also extends to the rich; and here we are to-day from London, having breakfasted there by daylight, and been brought in daylight too, for a less sum of money than, a few years ago, it would have cost us to have paid our postboys and the turnpike-tolls on the road. But then we are told that my right hon. friend seeks nothing but his own profit. Why, who but the most niggardly-minded men can do otherwise than rejoice at the splendid fortune he has achieved? Talk of commerce or enterprise without profit. Why, profit is the aliment—profit is the very breath of enterprise and commerce. Deny to commerce and enterprise her just profit, and few years will elapse before the enterprise of England will subside; and, instead of being at the head, we shall be at the tail of all the nations of the world. I think, then, when we look at all these things, we must agree with the Minister of France that the art of printing alone surpasses the invention of which G. Stephenson is the great author"

The Election for Manchester.—On Monday night Mr. Bright was present at a large assemblage of electors in St. John's Ward, Manchester. The meeting was held at the Old Quay Tavern, Cobden-street, and the chair was taken by the Alderman of the Ward, Alexander Kay, Esq. Mr. Bright addressed the meeting for upwards of half an hour. Subsequently, no question being proposed for the honourable candidate to answer, Mr. Taylor, an elector, proposed a motion, pledging the electors to support Mr. Bright at the next election, and Mr Simpson seconded the motion. George Hadfield, Esq., supported the motion, which was carried amidst loud cheering.

North Lincolnshire Election.—Sir Montague J. Cholmeley has issued an address to the electors of North Lincolnshire, offering himself as a candidate to supply the vacancy in the representation of this county, consequent upon the succession to the peerage of Lord Worsley. Sir Montague is of Whig politics. There is no intention, we believe, on the part of the Conservatives to oppose him. The election is expected to take place on Thursday, the 31st, or the following day; but, for the reasons we have stated, it excites no interest, and will in all probability pass off in the quietest manner.

The Gun Trade at Birmingham.—A letter from Birmingham states that there is no real foundation for the exciting statements which have been made with respect to the purchase of fire-arms in that town for illegal purposes in Ireland The sale of arms (fire-locks and fowling-pieces) is little increased, considering the season of the year, and other legitimate causes of demand.

THE ROYAL SCHOOL, CUMBERLAND LODGE, WINDSOR GREAT PARK.

In presenting our readers, this week, with the accompanying Engraving, it is our pleasing duty to furnish an additional testimonial to the kind consideration for the welfare of all classes, which so eminently distinguishes our Most Gracious Sovereign and her Royal Consort.

About two years ago her Majesty expressed great anxiety that some permanent provision should be made for the education of the children belonging to those families in her Majesty's immediate service, such as game-keepers, gate-keepers, gardeners, &c.; and the project, thus happily conceived, was instantly carried into effect. That the benefits of the Royal bounty may be the more extensively enjoyed, the Institution is situated as nearly as possible in the middle of the Great Park, so as to be within easy reach of most of those for whose advantage it is intended. Seventy-five children are now receiving instruction, under the care of the master and mistress, Mr. J. G. Horner and Miss Messer; and it is hoped that, being thus brought under the influence of sound religious training, and education in its true meaning, they may not be forced

To trudge through weary life without the aid
Of intellectual implements and tools;

but may go out into the world with knowledge befitting their station—good Christians and loyal subjects

It is gratifying to state that the Queen and his Royal Highness Prince Albert have paid several visits to the Schools since their establishment in July, 1845; and on every occasion they have most condescendingly expressed themselves in terms of approbation at the general improvement manifested.

On the 9th ultimo, the Schools were inspected by J. P. K. Shuttleworth, Esq., the Secretary of the Educational Committee of the Privy Council, who was enabled to make a very satisfactory report of the state in which he found them, and we understand that that gentleman has received her Majesty's instructions to prepare a scheme for enlarging the sphere of usefulness so auspiciously commenced, by causing to be erected a large and commodious range of buildings, with suitable apparatus, in which the girls will be initiated in those branches of household economy—as washing, cooking, and baking—that shall fit them the better in after life for the discharge of duties so essential to the comforts of the cottage.

It is earnestly to be hoped that the example thus set by the first lady of the land will be emulated by the patrons of kindred institutions; and may the ti be not far distant when the whole people shall be taught and trained.

So shall licentiousness and black resolve
Be rooted out, and virtuous habits
Take their place, and genuine piety descend
Like an inheritance from age to age.

HER MAJESTY'S SCHOOLS, WINDSOR GREAT PARK.—(SEE PRECEDING PAGE.)

FLIXTON HALL, SUFFOLK.

Ast week we gave an exterior view of this fine old mansion, and an account of its recent destruction by fire; we are now enabled to add some few more particulars of its history, together with Engravings of some of the characteristic features of the interior and its furniture, from original sketches, taken about three years since, and which have not hitherto been engraved. The house, although an interesting example of its peculiar style, and an important building in itself, was little visited by the topographer or antiquary, and is but slightly noticed in county histories. This may be owing to its situation in a part of the country where little traffic occurs. It stood in a fertile and beautiful park, watered by the river Waveney, the grounds in front, and the plantations surrounding it, were of the most luxuriant character

About the time of Henry III. an Augustine Nunnery was established here, by Margery, widow of Bartholomew de Crake, and is another instance of the excellent sites chosen in old times for the building of religious houses, with wood, water, and pasture land, in convenient proximity. The name of Flixton is supposed by some to be derived from St. Felix, the first Bishop of the East Angles The Nunnery was dissolved in 1528, and intended to be given to Cardinal Wolsey but, on his declining the offer, it was granted to John Tasburgh, in the failure of whose descendants it passed into the Wyburn family, and was purchased of them by Mr. Adair, about the middle of the last century.

The period at which the late Hall was erected is not satisfactorily settled—it is called Elizabethan by some; and it certainly possesses features of the peculiar style of architecture so called; but others confidently say that it was erected in 1615, in the style called "Inigo Jones's Gothic." The truth seems to be, that Jones was employed to re-model the old house; at least, this is the traditional story; and that to his design the front of the building is owing. Originally the house was surrounded by a moat, but this had been filled up long since. The ground plan of the front, with its projecting wings, and slightly projecting doorway, forms the letter E, which was so fashionable a style of construction in the reign of Elizabeth, as a compliment to her, that it may be a reason for imagining the substructure older than Jones's time. The crocketed pinnacles were a characteristic ornament to its roof, which was perfectly flat and battlemented, and from whence an agreeable view of the surrounding fertile country was obtained. The Hall was a spacious room, filled with antique furniture and armour. The large carved fire-place was furnished with logs in the style of the past ages, and many interesting family pictures hung around the walls. A flight of stairs led from the Hall to the Saloon, the entrance door of which forms the subject of our Cut, and was elaborately carved in oak, with scroll-work foliage and figures in the style of the Renaissance, but rather more chaste in its design than usual. Above it was placed a bust of Inigo Jones, whose connection with the house, as a builder or re-modeller, we have noticed. The suite of rooms leading from the Saloon, as well as that apartment, had been so altered for modern convenience that nothing of a striking character had remained from its original state. The furniture and pictures were valuable, one painting being valued at a thousand guineas; the cabinets were also costly in construction, and of ancient workmanship. But the most remarkable piece of furniture was the folding-table here engraved, which was richly carved, and might be placed flat against a wall, or used by simply adjusting the three legs, when it was wanted. Two of the legs were immoveable, on a carved cross-bar, which turned on a pin; the third leg moved on a hinge in the centre of the table, and, being brought into its proper place, the table top was lowered upon it, and the upper part of this leg fitted into the lion's month, and secured by the pin which hung beside it. Like too many of our ancient mansions, Flixton did not possess many relics of ancient times, which modern manners dispense with; but one curious thing remained, and was treasured with care; this was the "Black Jack," or leathern jug, in which ale was dispensed in the Hall on great festivals, when the servants and tenantry were assembled. That at Flixton was one of the largest known to exist, and was capable of holding eight gallons; it is figured in our Cut of the Entrance to the Saloon, together with some few pieces of Defensive Armour, which was preserved in the late building as an ornament to the walls of the Great Hall.

CHRISTMAS MORNING. GOING TO CHURCH. DRAWN BY DODGSON.

Christmas-lore is so rife with details of Ceremonies, Sports, and Games, befitting this Great Feast, that it would be much easier to fill half our Number with such matters than to avoid relating many a thrice-told tale in mere selection. In all these characteristic celebrities there is a rude picturesqueness which is admirably suited for illustration by the pencil; and our Artists have, accordingly, chosen severa phases of the Hospitalities of Christmas—past and present—from the scene preparatory to the good cheer, to its consummation with all the pageant glories of a bygone age. How long the season of the Nativity has been observed with such fervid hospitality, it were hard to tell: thirteen centuries since, Christmas Day was forbidden to be kept as a fast, by a law which anathematized such as "did not duly honour the birth-day of Christ, according to the flesh, but pretended to honour it by fasting on that day." The practice, probably, became extinct in later times: at all events, it was not found necessary to repeat the canon; and we are not acquainted with any positive regulations specially affecting the observance of Christmas, subsequent to the above date.

CHRISTMAS PRESENTS.

(See front page)

Up to town! up to town!
Presents pour from dale and down,
Per rail and mail, wain and sail;
Haste through winter's foggy frown,
Cheese from Chedder, ham from Hants,
From kind uncles, cousins, aunts:
Looming through the distance murky,
Lo! the noble Norfolk turkey.
Oh! never man could lay embargo
On a better, braver cargo.

Up to town! up to town!
Gifts, to honour Christmas' crown,
Tumble in from boxes, bins,
Baskets, hampers, to our inns.
Victor's car, with glory varnished,
Never could be better garnished
Than with trophies like to these:
Capitol, behold thy geese.

Up to town! up to town!
Pheasant doom'd to be done brown,
Hare forewinged by clever cartridge,
Snipe and grouse, and plumpest partridge;
Venison from thy Forest, Deane.
Our Poultry is enriched, I ween—
From east to west, from north to south,
Such focus as the Bull and Mouth,
The Golden Cross, et cetera,
A nobler cargo seldom saw.

Up to town! up to town!
Land we Nature's winter gown,
Which, with us, should ever be
The garb of Christian charity.
'Tis not the presents—e'en the best—
But the true love, that warms the breast.
From absent friends—the kind, and dear—
That doubly can enhance the cheer.
Up to town! up to town!
Presents pour from dale and down.

Here we have depicted the arrival of a goodly host of Presents at the Hall, wherewith to maintain "the solid pleasures" of the season; for we moderns have kept the substance of the celebrations, though we may have dispensed with their ancient shadows; and the old carol is nearly as applicable to the provisions of our day as of a century and a half since:—

Now thrice welcome, Christmas,
Which brings us good cheer,
Minc'd pies and plum-porridge,
Good ale, and strong beer;
With pig, goose, and capon,
The best that may be,
So well doth the weather
And our stomachs agree.

It is true that we find not the "fat beeves" in the list, and "plum-porridge" is but an approach to our national pudding.

Meanwhile, improved modes of transit have, doubtless, increased the number of these periodical Presents: a basket of fish, or a barrel of oysters, is no longer likely to "waste its sweetness" in a coach-office; the railway has proved the best preventive of such domestic disappointments. Last year, too, we pictured the coach laden with poultry and game from that land of milk and honey—Norfolk and Suffolk—this year almost superseded by the Railway, opened but a short time since, just in time for the Christmas traffic. Then, the swarm of luxuries is almost incredibly swollen by poultry from the Continent, another contribution of the giant steam; and we borrow "Christmas Trees" from Germany, and rich fruits from the sunny south of France in almost interminable tasteful variety. Hence, there is no lack of maintenance of the good old English custom of "Christmas Presents."

The Picture now shifts to

CHRISTMAS IN GERMANY,

As an appropriate Illustration of which, we give an Engraving of Luther and his Family celebrating Christmas Eve according to German custom, which makes it a children's festival. The great Reformer was a man of strong domestic affections, with nothing of the asceticism of Calvin and the later Churchmen. He was fond of children and music, and we here find him in the midst of both. The Christmas Tree is lighted up; his wife is there, the fair Catherine Born (her portrait at Coburg is very beautiful, but the face has a shade of thought a little too pensive for happiness); the aged mother sits by the stove; all is an exact transcript of German middle-class life, as it exists nearly unaltered to the present time; and the hand that burnt the Pontiff's bull is running over the strings of his instrument in accord with a hymn of gratitude chanted by the voice that defied Kings and Councils, and shook St. Peter's Chair to its foundation. But the part of the picture to which we more particularly direct attention is the "Christmas Tree." It is the great feature in the Festival of Christmas Eve as kept throughout Germany, though between the north and south, the Protestant and Catholic provinces, some differences in the observance exist. It is almost a matter of surprise that so pretty a custom has not obtained a more general footing in England, especially as the lighting-up of the "Christmas Tree" was regularly practised in the family circle of the old Court, when the children of George the Third were young.

During the week before Christmas it is quite common, in the towns of Northern Germany, to see carts going about the streets, loaded with young fir trees, which are bought and prepared for the anxiously expected evening. The tree is set upright in a block of wood; on the branches are placed small wax tapers; to them are also hung bon-bons, cakes, gilded nuts, apples, ribbons, all made as gay and brilliant as possible, varying in splendour with the means of the family. Round the tree are placed the presents of toys, &c., which are to be distributed among the children. The hopes and fears, the little triumphs, and the unbounded merriment may easily be imagined.

In South Germany, Rhenish Bavaria, and the Catholic States, something of a religious character has been blended with the celebration. The children are told that the Christ-child (Christ-kindschen) brings the gifts, and some one represents it, dressed in white, with gilt crown and wings, and a long white veil ornamented with gold. The custom, however, is dying out; many thinking it irreverent, besides involving a deceit, into which the elder children are obliged to be admitted as partners. In other respects, the custom in North and South Germany is much the same. We subjoin a more lengthened account of it by Wm. Howitt:—

> In the descriptions of Christmas Eve by Richter, and by Coleridge, the Christmas Tree is by one said to be birch, in the other, yew. Possibly this may be the fact in some parts of Germany, or it may be, in one case, a mistake of the translator, in the other of the author; the Tree is generally, if not always, of fir. The poor, in their small dwellings, must find it somewhat difficult to set up the Tree and their gifts, unknown to the children. That was probably the reason that formerly it was first exhibited to the children on Christmas morning, before daylight, having been set up after they were in bed. We are told, however, that it is every year becoming more common for the poor to bring out their Tree in the evening, the children being sent out of the way on some pretext or another, while it is done. And in truth, there, as all over the world, the gifts of the poor are soon displayed. It is quite affecting to see the little simple things which the poor people will buy as Christmas gifts for their children. Little dolls, of a few kreutzers in value; some even of the mere cost of an English penny. As you pass their cottages in the evening for a fortnight afterwards, you may see, by the lights within, the little Tree, with a few apples and little figures hung on it, standing on a table, and the children around it admiring it; if there be a baby, some of them holding it up to see the precious sight. But not only the poor in their cottages have their Christmas Tree: in schools and other institutions it is set up. A prettier or more affecting sight we have seldom seen, than the celebration of Christmas Day in the Infant School at Heidelberg. Here, at three o'clock in the afternoon, were the parents and children, the patrons and friends of the School, assembled. Upwards of eighty little boys and girls, all under six years of age, were seated on low forms in the middle of the school, opposite to the master's desk, in front of which, on a raised platform, stood four tall Christmas Trees, or, as they called them, Sugar Trees, decorated with the usual appendages of cakes, apples, &c., and at their feet stood a row of tapers ready to be kindled. Besides these were various coloured engravings: an excellent one, of "Christ Blessing the Little Children;" a kind of erection of straw-work, containing stages, on one of which was a dancing bear, on another a tournament, with knights riding, with candles burning all over it. These figures revolved by means of a perpendicular spindle, having attached to its top a sort of fan, like the ventilator of a window, which was moved by the warm air ascending from the candles. There were many funny little three-legged pots, of true German fashion, set on the platform amongst the lights, a gift to the children from some one to amuse them in their school play-hours. To the right sat the spectators, many ladies and gentlemen of the place; to the left, the parents of the children. The master lit up the tapers on the trees, and the row of them at their feet, and a murmur of delight rose from the little troop of children. The blinds had all been drawn down, to exclude as much of the exterior light as possible, and the scene was very bright. The master read from his desk an address prepared for the occasion, and after the little scholars had sung a Christmas Hymn or two very prettily, they were dismissed, one by one, with their pinafores full of toys, good warm articles of clothing, and a quantity of cakes and apples, the former of which had been sent as a Christmas gift to them by a worthy baker. It was pleasant to see the delighted faces of all present; the eager looks of the parents, as their children came forward to receive their presents; and how the mothers, as they advanced towards the door, snatched them up, and carried them off, gifts and all together. Even inmates of the asylums, as if they were at home amongst their children, are treated to a Christmas Tree, and the brilliance of Christmas Eve. It is the great sacred festival of Germany, and is much more regarded than Sunday. Such are the Christmas customs of Germany.

In the "Christmas and Christmas Carols," just published by T. B. Sharpe, we find the following

LEGEND OF THE CHRISTMAS TREE.

'Tis Christmas Eve, and through the ancient town
Rest and rejoicing meet—
A little child comes wandering sadly down
The silent street.
Alone, and very sorrowful is he,
Fatherless and motherless;
He has no friend on earth a Christmas Tree
For him to dress.

With tearful gaze, he turns his steps aside,
Where gleams the light
From a tall house, and youthful figures glide
Before his sight,
As each, with festal dress, and happy brow,
Surrounds a gorgeous tree;
And there he asks, "Amid these is there now
No place for me?"

Alas! alas! no place for him is there,—
With scornful jest,
They drive him forth, into the cold night air,
To seek for rest
'Neath some more modest roof, where warmer hearts
A nook may spare,
And gladly own that sharing joy imparts
More to their share!

Hark! 'tis a burst of hearty merriment,
The child draws nigh
'Tis from a burgher's simple tenement.
With longing sigh,
He watches the glad group of faces bright,
And so for him
He thinks the Fir-tree once was decked with lights;
His eyes grow dim.

And timidly he knocks, again to tell
His piteous tale.
Alas! for him—on stony ears it fell
Without avail!
The door is closed against him, and in vain
With grief indeed,
He gazes through the latticed window-pane—
No one takes heed!

Weeping, he turns away, and passes by Both light and sound
From many a humble roof and mansion high,
Scattered around:
Then pauses meekly by the lowliest door,
Where a faint ray
Breaks through, and shows how fast the little store
Of tapers wears away.

Alas! alas! his latest hope is vain—
By word and blow
Of harsh unkindness driven forth again,
Where shall he go?
The night is dark—but the poor orphan child,
Amid his woe,
Bethinks him of the infant Saviour mild,
And kneeleth low.

In prayer to Him who is not slow to hear
He kneeleth there,
And soon he sees a little child draw near,
Exceeding fair;
With whitest raiment shining like the day,
And crown of light,
And as he moves along the darken'd way,
All becomes bright!

So to that patient wanderer came he,
And bade him raise
His wond'ring eyes where springs a glorious tree,
And offer praise
To God, who heareth the sad orphan's cry,
And sendeth aid
When earthly hope is none—and misery
Maketh afraid.

No longer sad and fearful is that child—
He turns to see,
Where stands at bidding of the infant mild
His Christmas tree!
A Wondrous tree, radiant in heavenly light—
With one glad bound,
He leaves the gloom of sorrow's bitter night—
His home is found!

Turn we now to a scene of graver aspect:—

CHRISTMAS MORNING,

with the Vicar receiving the congratulations of his parishioners at the Church; for, at this season, "every Christian should show his gratitude to the Almighty, for the inestimable benefits procured to us by the Nativity of our blessed Saviour, by an ample display of good will toward our fellow men." To be "ready to distribute" is, likewise, one of the most grateful orisons of the day; and how past generations, rich in this world's wealth, have bequeathed such goods to their posterity, the walls of yon ancient church tell in letters of gold; and how the hearts and homes of the needy are gladdened by the bounties of this day; happily, every town and hamlet will attest. A glance at the venerable church recals the glorious opening of our great poet's "Oration for the Morn of Christmas:"—

Thus is the month, and this the happy morn,
Wherein the Son of Heaven's eternal King,
Of Wedded Maid and Virgin Mother born,
Our great Redemption from above did bring;
For so our holie sages once did sing,
That he our deadlie forfeit should release,
And with his Father work us a perpetual peace.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

Election of Common Councilmen.—Monday being St. Thomas's Day, the annual election of Common Councilmen for the respective wards of the city of London took place with the usual formalities. The Corn-law question, which formed the principal subject of discussion at these meetings last year, was replaced on the present occasion by the more locally interesting dispute between the Court of Aldermen and the members of the Common Council on the subject of the Freeman's Qualification Bill. In almost every wardmote the members of the lower court took opportunity to lecture the presiding Aldermen for their unwillingness to support the bill; and at one or two meetings—Walbrook, for instance—the Aldermen objected to put resolutions on the subject placed in their hands for that purpose.

The Court of Common Council and the Court of Aldermen.—A dispute has arisen between the Court of Common Council and the Court of Aldermen, which has excited some interest in the City. At a recent Court of Common Council, the Lord Mayor refused to put a question as to the passing of "a bill for declaring the qualification of freemen of London to be elected members of the Common Council," on the ground that the Court of Common Council had no legislative power to originate laws. The Common Council say it is obvious if such be the case, that all the laws which have been made by them for ages have been originated in error; the Court of Aldermen, under the guidance of their Recorder, have slept upon their rights, and the Court of Common Council, under the guidance of the same Recorder, have been allowed to pass laws which, according to his present view, they had no power to pass. The committee of the whole Court of Common Council met last Saturday, and passed strong resolutions, expressing their determination to assert the right of the citizens to control, through the responsible members of the body, the expenditure of the City cash. A Court of Aldermen was also held on Saturday, at which the Lord Mayor presided, to take into consideration the proceedings of the members of the Court of Common Council. Several members of the Court of Aldermen condemned, some of them in severe language, the conduct of the Common Council.

Removal of Westminster-bridge.—A preliminary meeting of several of the principal inhabitants of Westminster, interested in preserving the present site for a new bridge, was held on Monday, at the King's Arms, Palace-yard, Mr. W. Page Wood, Queen's Counsel, in the chair. Great surprise was expressed by the meeting that the Commissioners of her Majesty's Woods, &c., should have authorised the erection of a new bridge on a distant site, in direct opposition to the recommendation of the Committee of the House of Commons of last Session. It was urged by several of the gentlemen present that a measure involving such ruinous loss of trade and property to so large a body of individuals on both sides of the river, could only be justified by overwhelming public necessity; that no such necessity exists; and that, therefore, it becomes the duty of all those who are interested to oppose, by every means in their power, a measure fraught with loss to hundreds, and almost ruin to many. A committee was immediately formed, for calling a public meeting, directly after Christmas, on the subject, and a requisition was forwarded to Sir De Lacy Evans to take the chair. Instructions were given to the Committee to solicit the aid of all influential parties to join in opposing the bill for the removal (by counsel, if necessary), in the Committees of the Houses of Parliament.

Metropolitan Association for Improving the Dwellings of the Poor.—The first annual meeting of this association was held on Wednesday, in Coleman-street. Mr. John W. Tottie, the deputy chairman, presided, and Lord Radnor and Viscount Ebrington were on the platform. The report presented a favourable account of the operations of the association. A piece of ground has been obtained, nearly opposite Old St. Pancras Church, for erecting suitable buildings for the accommodation of the labouring classes, to combine greatly improved accommodation with diminished rent. The buildings, it is expected, will be finished within twelve months from the present time. From the financial statement, it appeared that £7,963 had been received, and £2 094 expended.

Seasonable Bounty.—London Philanthropic Institution for Distributing Bread and Coals.—Numerous have been the donations lately received. Amongst others, R. R Wood, Esq., £20; Luke Hansard, Esq., £10 10s.; B. B. Cabbell, Esq, M P, £10 10s.; Mr. and Mrs Henry F Richardson, £15 15s.; R. J. Holford, Esq., £10 10s.; the Hon. Miss Harley, £10.

Rise in the Price of Bread.—On Tuesday a simultaneous rise in the price of bread took place throughout the metropolis; the household quality being advanced from 7d. to 8½d., and the best wheaten from 2½d. to 10½d. In the market, on Monday, flour rose 3s. per sack.

Mortality in the Metropolis.—The total number of deaths registered in the metropolitan districts during the week ending Saturday, the 19th inst., was 1262—an amount, we regret to say, considerably above the average of the last five autumns, in which the mortality stands as 1000. The deaths from violence, privation, cold, and intemperance during the week were very nearly double the autumnal average, being 46 against 27. During the same period 1,311 births were registered in the metropolis, being an excess over the mortality of only 49.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON ALMANACK,
AND PICTURESQUE CALENDAR FOR 1847

This ALMANACK is submitted to the Public by the Proprietors, with confidence of its superiority over its predecessors. The Work was commenced in 1845, with a view of furnishing a Repository of Useful Knowledge of permanent value for constant reference, in Astronomy, Astronomical Occurrences, and the Natural History of the Year

The Astronomical Department has been placed entirely under the superintendence of James Glaisher, Esq., F.R.A.S., and of the Royal Observatory at Greenwich.

On the third page of each month is a series of tableaux of Memorable Events, carrying out in a true spirit what is usually and properly introduced into our Almanack; not for occasional reference only, but to cherish respect for these landmarks of British History.

The fourth page of each month is devoted to Natural History. The whole of this portion is from the very able pen of Mrs. Loudon; and the interesting series of Illustrations to this department has been drawn and engraved by Miss Loudon, under the immediate superintendence of Mrs. Loudon.

The Calendar Illustrations are from the masterly pencil of William Harvey, and engraved in the first style of Art, by Linton, illustrative of the National Sports.

Published at the Office of the Illustrated London News, 198, Strand.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"Moderatia," Eltham.—Received.
"J. G. M" We have not room for the Dance.
"T. W.," Commercial-road, to recover a Lodger's goods, illegally seized for rent, should apply to the Police Magistrate of the district.
"A. B." had better follow the printed form of Will, to be purchased of any Law Stationer.
"Sarah," Fulham.—The —— Misses, &c.
"††."—We have not room.
"J. B.," Petworth.—Canaries may be purchased of G. Hartnall, 2, Edward-street, Soho.
"A Subscriber" is thanked for his Sketches of the York Dinner, though we have not room for their insertion.
"Fanatica per la Musica" is recommended to address his suggestion to the Proprietors of the New Speculation.
"J. W.," Granby, is entitled to the Print, and should apply for it to his News-Agent.
"Zoe" is jocose.
"A."—We have not room for the lines on Christmas.
"F. T."—The distance from Dover Harbour to Calais Harbour is about twenty-one miles; from Calais to Boulogne, by road, twenty miles.
"J. C.," Cornhill.—Mr. Green's Nassau Balloon will contain 70,000 feet of coal gas, which, at the time the balloon was constructed (in 1836) cost £70: we do not know the present cost "†" is thanked, but we have not room.
"W M.," Belfast.—Apply to the "Patent Journal," Chancery-lane.
"R. M'T." The charge of One Shilling for the Almanack is correct.
"A Correspondent."—Sleighing is an American winter pastime. The thaw must have dissolved our Correspondent's hopes for the present. Richardson's is one of the latest and best of English Dictionaries, price 18s.
"A Subscriber" is thanked; but we have not, at present, room for the Sussex Church.
"A Subscriber," Oxford, will, perhaps, favour us with a Sketch of the New Church at Nettlebed.
"An Old Cantab," "I. L. N.," and other Subscribers at Cambridge, are thanked for their hints, and are referred to our Journal of next week.
"J. O'B. S.," Gilford.—Address at the Theatre.
"G. M.," Birmingham. The words referred to by our Correspondent are French, and never were intended for Latin.
"Inquirer." In the absence of armorial bearings on the father's side, none other can be used.
"Ignoramus"—Five shillings is, we believe, the fee paid for an inquiry at the Herald's Office. The head of that institution is Sir C. G. Young, Garter King of Arms
"E. C.," Cheshunt.—The parapet of Salisbury Cathedral is coeval with the main building: it is not pierced, but solid; its face ornamented with a series of arches resting on a corbel-table of small arches. The nave, choir, aisles, and chapter-house are all alike in the parapet.
"T. B.," Islington, is thanked for the Verses; but, we have not room for them at present.
"G. D. H.," Taunton. Probably, next week.
"Hortensia," Matlock.—The omission was accidental.
"W. W. W.," Walsall.—A Description of the Earl of Rosse's Telescopes has been published at Parsonstown, and may be had, by order, of any London bookseller. See, also, No. 155 of the Illustrated London News.
"An Old Subscriber," Chichester.—See our last No.
"Henri," Beckenham.—See any School Treatise on Arithmetic.
"A. C. T."—The lines,

"Music hath charms to soothe a savage breast,
To soften rocks, or bend a knotted oak."

are from "The Mourning Bride," the only tragedy by Congreve.
"A. J.," Orpington.—Declined.
"A Correspondent."—The lines, "Monstrum horrendum," are singularly appropriate for a Steam Locomotive Engine; but we have not room for the application.
"G. S.," Warborough, is oblivious: the Church of St. Bartholomew the Great, Smithfield, was engraved in No. 34 of our Journal.
"H. W. S."—We regret that we have not space to spare.
"W. M. N.," Belfast.—An excellent Mill for grinding grain has just been introduced into this country from America. (See a late Number of the "Mechanics' Magazine.")
"Gulielmus." No. 162 contains an Engraving of Exeter Hall, during the performance of the Sacred Harmonic Society.
"A. L. Z.," Norwich.—We are not aware.
"A. D.," St. Omer, should apply at the Post Office, there.
"Leo" is thanked for the fine Portrait, which shall be engraved anon.
"A Former Burgess of Doncaster" is thanked.
"Valentine."—The designation of the military rank should be appended after the name of the officer: thus, "J. R——, Esq, Lieutenant 51st Regt."
"A Subscriber from the Commencement."—The field, whether it be a colour or a metal, always takes precedence. Long heraldic usage allows of the shades of the colours being borne. The Royal shield is "gules, red," and therefore the scarlet liveries are strictly correct
"Philo-Heraldicus."—If the Countess of A—— married for her second husband Mr. B——, her Ladyship would still retain her title. Lady Eliza Z——, on marrying Mr. F——, would be styled Lady Eliza F——.
"Cæsaromagus."—Ole Bull is alive, and is in Madrid. Tickets for the Windsor State Apartments, when the Queen is not at the Castle, may be had on application to Messrs. Ackermann, Strand.
"Valse a Deux Temps."—We do not know whether M. Jullien has taken the Surrey Theatre for his Concerts.
"A Constant Reader."—Apply to Davidson, the Publisher, Water-street, Tower-street, Blackfriars. We do not believe either in Mesmerism or Phrenology, but their study will not be a waste of time to any young man.
"J. C. P."—"Umgekehrt,"—turned round or about; "Huhneraugen," (literally hen's eyes),—corns on the foot; "Eigendunkel,"—self-conceit or presumption; "Drachenamt," (literally, the office or employment of a Dragon), must be explained by the context; probably, it is an epithet applied to denote the savageness or watchfulness of a Dragon. "Frühlingskur,"—spring medicine, a remedy sought from spring herbs or plants.
"J. P."—Received.
"R. H.," Tichborne-street.—See an account of the Schools in question in a late No. of "Chambers's Edinburgh Journal."
"A Steam-boat Vulcan" should apply to the Secretary to the Admiralty
"W. P. W.," Edinburgh.—A Printing-press of the size required, may be purchased for about £25: apply of Messrs. Harrild, Great Distaff-lane, City.
"H. M. A.," Ixworth.—The address of the Guarantee Society is 19, Birchin-lane.
"Eliza." The Kent East Indiaman was burnt and sunk in the Bay of Biscay, in 1825.
"R. B.," Ramsgate, is thanked.
"X. Y. Z."—We do not know.
"St. Geo. K."—We have not room for the long letter contradicting a report printed in another Journal.
"Xise," Goodwood. The Hawkers' annual license duty is £4.
"W. T. R.," Devonport.—We believe there to be in existence a Society for the Suppression of Capital Punishment; but we do not know the address.
"Adventures of an Author," by Timothy Caxton, L.L.D., No. 1, has been received.
"A. B.," Manchester.—The address is 24 and 25, Long Acre.
"Jno. B."—St. Marylebone Savings Bank, 76, Welbeck-street.
"W. S.," Hampstead-road, should apply to Mr. Snare, bookseller, Reading.
"A Reader since 1842," Perth.—An Act of Parliament is requisite for Change of Name. Either form will answer.
"H." will find a description of the Dublin and Kingstown Atmospheric Railway in No. 88 of our Journal.
"T P"—The beautiful Picture of "Repose," by Gainsborough, is engraved in No. 22, present Volume
"A Constant Subscriber." Hong Kong became a British possession by our Treaty with China, signed August 20, 1842.
Ineligible.—"Flowers."

SUPPLEMENT, GRATIS.—Next Week, we shall present to our Subscribers, A SUPPLEMENT, containing the Chronology of the Leading Events of the last Six Months; with Title-page and Index to Vol. IX. of the Illustrated London News.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 26, 1846.

Parliament is to assemble on Tuesday, the 19th of January—the day originally mentioned. At the Privy Council held last Saturday, it was ordered that a proclamation should be issued, convening Parliament on the day in question for the despatch of business.

We lately expressed a belief that Austria is degenerating as a Government, even from its own bad principles of policy. Its wisdom was always that of the serpent rather than the sage, but still it displayed intelligence—a clearly enough calculated adaptation of certain means to certain ends, both bad, but successful in their evil purpose. Metternich was one of the ablest statesmen of the secondary order, relying always on force and repression, discouraging talent in any sphere of action, and particularly in the service of the State, fearing the power even of a clever instrument. A dead level of mediocrity on which he, as the sole possessor of power, might stand alone, with nothing to do but command, was what he wished to create around him; and he has succeeded. An administration of thirty years has enabled him to repress all rising talent—to blight all aspiring energy; and now, as he is sinking under the pressure of age and infirmities, there is no one to take his place. The studied discouragement of ability which has been a rule of Government in Austria, has effectually deprived the Crown of statesmen and generals: what the future may produce we know not, but at present such is the case. The dungeons of Speilberg have closed over all who dared to think, and the best men in the country are exiles. High birth and great stupidity have been, and are, the qualifications for office in Austria, in the civil service as in the military. It has become a common observation that the cleverest man in an Austrian regiment is the drummer, and the dullest a general.

Such is the system, and its results are what might be expected. Metternich, in his dotage, has become a tool instead of a power, and in his name the folly of the Austrian Cabinet governs; the reign of his craft is over, and nothing better has arisen instead of it. The finances of the country are said to be in confusion; the Italian States are dissatisfied and wait but a signal to break the yoke of the uncongenial Germans; and last and worst, the Government has been overreached by Russia, who has induced it to accept the city of Cracow, and thus become ostensibly the last spoiler of Poland, while, in so doing, she is but serving the purpose of the Autocrat. The destruction of the Charter of Cracow is no real gain to Austria, is but little loss to Poland; other consequences, however, may not be so trifling; the act openly violates the Treaty of Vienna; that last settlement of the nations of Europe is dissolved; and, as so much is held together by that parchment bond, the Powers that call themselves Empires in virtue of the signatures thereto attached, had best be prepared for the consequences of their want of faith. Prussia and Austria will suffer the most hereafter; they are both "Paper States;" that is, they are Kingdoms by treaties and alliances rather than by national spirit and unity. England and France are both powers and nations; Russia has a sort of national unity in her Sclavonic race; but Austria and Prussia, on the least disturbance in Europe, would fall asunder, and races who now stand in a compelled allegiance would form new alliances according to natural affinities of language and religion. It is the peculiar tact of politicians like Metternich to disguise the weakness of their Government and impress others with the idea of its strength. There is a political credit as well as a commercial one. But it requires clever management to lull suspicion of a breaking firm; perhaps it is a matter of congratulation that Austria's talent of hypocrisy is failing her. For her flagrant breach of the Treaty of Vienna, it might reasonably be expected that some colourable defence would be given; but even the ability to get up a piece of special pleading seems wanting to the Austrian Cabinet. It is scarcely credible that Austria avows plainly and directly the doctrine that no Treaties are to be kept by any State strong enough to break them! We have long believed that the principle was more extensively acted on than avowed; but we were not prepared for so candid a confession by a Government so eminently cautious and conservative. But in the State paper which Austria has put forth as a defence of the seizure of Cracow, in reply to the French argument, that the violation of the Treaty of Vienna releases all other parties to it from its conditions, the Austrian Ministry says:—"It is neither the Conventions of Paris, nor of Vienna, nor the respect due to treaties, which has imposed any reserve on the French; if they had felt themselves strong enough to break them, they would long ago have done so, and we should not have blamed them. But these are questions of war." We may well ask, where was Metternich's cold, shrewd intellect, when this insane burst of ill-humour was suffered to go forth to the world; it is an absolute challenging France to war. Suppose she accept it, and prove her strength! It would not be long before a French General would date his despatches from head-quarters at Vienna, the power of Austria crumbled beneath the tread of his legions, the Emperor a fugitive before him, and the crazy fabric of Prussia shattered to pieces in his rear. It is not for States, three-fourths of whose power rests upon treaties, to bring contempt on their "title-deeds;" Austria has done so. It is easy to see that the influence of Metternich has ceased, or is being overruled; with much to answer for, of two things he would never have been guilty—a blunder in the first place, and, in the next, a bad defence of it.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

Theatricals at Woburn Abbey.—The Duke and Duchess of Bedford are entertaining a distinguished circle, at Woburn Abbey, comprising the Duke and Duchess of Norfolk and the Ladies Mary and Adeliza Fitzalan Howard, the Marquis of Granby, the Dowager Countess of Sefton and Ladies Molyneux, Viscount Mandeville, Viscountess Bury, Lord and Lady Charles Russell and Hon. Edward and Hon. Katherine Russell, Lord Cosmo Russell, Lord Edward F. Howard, Mr. A. and Lady C. A. Sanford, Mr. A. Stafford O'Brien, Mr S. Rogers, Mrs. and Miss Magniac, Mr. B Lyons, &c. On Saturday evening the "Theatre Royal, Woburn Abbey," as it is called, was opened for private theatricals; the performances (under the patronage of the Duchess of Norfolk) being "A Charade, in Three Parts, about Love and Fire!" The doors opened at half-past eight, and the performance commenced at nine o'clock. It was warmly applauded by a brilliant audience. The dialogue was admirable, and those assuming characters in the dramatic charade acquitted themselves exceedingly well. We are informed that Mr. A. Stafford O'Brien, M.P., was the author, and his classic acquirements are known to be of the highest order. The hospitality of the noble Duke and Duchess will be prolonged during the festive season, Lord and Lady John Russell, and a host of visitors of distinction being invited to the Abbey for Christmas.

Christmas Festivities among the Aristocracy.—Viscount and Viscountess Palmerston left Carlton-gardens, on Tuesday, for Broadlands, near Romsey, Hants, where the noble Viscount and Viscountess will receive a distinguished party, during the Christmas holidays. The Marquis and Marchioness of Ely, and a select party, intend to pass the holidays at Ely Lodge, Fermanagh.—The Duke of Cleveland is dispensing his usual hospitality at Raby Castle to a numerous circle of friends, and will keep almost open house during the holidays, taking care, however, that the poor are not forgotten in attentions to the rich.—The Marchioness of Normanby has left town, for Viscount and Viscountess Barrington's seat, Beckett House, Berks. On Monday, the Marchioness proceeds to Paris.

Lady Adelaide Fitzclarence, who has been visiting her relations, Colonel and Mrs. Wyndham, at Petworth, has gone to pass the holidays with the Right Hon. G. L. and Mrs. Dawson Damer, at Came House, Dorsetshire.

The Earl of Cardigan has been entertaining the Marquis of Blandford, Viscount Canterbury, Viscount Clifden, the Hon. J. Macdonald, and Mr. Sturt, at Deane Park, his seat in Northamptonshire. The Countess of Cardigan has returned to town, after a lengthened tour in Germany and Italy.

Distribution of the Royal Alms.—On Monday, her Majesty's Christmas bounty to poor persons above sixty years of age was distributed by the Royal Almoner, at the Almonry-office, Middle Scotland-yard. Upwards of 200 received 5s. each.

POSTSCRIPT.

Re-opening of Westminster Bridge.—On Thursday evening, the thoroughfare for carriages over this bridge, which has been closed since the 15th of August, in consequence of the dangerous state of some of the arches, was re-opened to the public. The heavy stone balustrade has been entirely removed, and a light wooden palisade, as a protection to foot passengers, substituted.

Opening of the Ipswich and Bury St. Edmund's Railway. This line of railway was opened on Thursday, for passenger traffic. It was originally intended to have taken place on Monday last; but Captain Coddington, the Government Inspector-General, having omitted to certify its opening, although he had officially inspected the works, and had verbally approved of their security, the Directors were compelled to disappoint the public until such time as the necessary proceedings were gone through. The route and character of the line has been already described by us.

Attempt to Assassinate the Archbishop of Vienna.—A letter from Vienna of the 13th says:—"The Prince Archbishop of Vienna, M. de Milde, has just had a narrow escape from assassination. In the morning of Wednesday last, while the Prelate was still in bed, his valet de chambre came into his room, and pulling open the curtains, exclaimed, "Monseigneur, Jesus Christ has appeared to me during the night, and ordered me to cut the throat of the Archbishop of Vienna." Immediately on pronouncing these words he drew a razor from his pocket and held it towards the throat of the Prelate. M. Milde, who perceived that his servant was labouring under an attack of mental alienation, had the presence of mind to say to him, "Listen, my friend; if the Saviour has really charged you to take my life, you must do it, for no one should disobey God's commands; but you must do nothing without first addressing a prayer to the Almighty. Pray, and I will resign myself to die by your hand." The domestic placed himself before a crucifix, and began a silent prayer. Whilst he was so engaged, the Prelate arose and went into an adjoining room, locking the door after him. The servant was afterwards secured, and placed in a lunatic asylum.

RUSSIA.

On Wednesday, the 9th of December, an accident which had nearly been attended with fatal results, occurred to the Emperor of Russia at Kiów, in Poland, upon the high road between St. Petersburg and Warsaw. The Emperor was on his route to Warsaw, and had arrived at the border of the large river at that place, where there is no bridge. A temporary platform had been constructed to run the Emperor's travelling carriage into the ferry-boat, when by some accident the platform gave way and broke down, and the carriage was precipitated into the water. The Emperor, with Count Orloff, who was also in the carriage, was obliged to escape from the windows and wade in the water, and as the current was running very strongly, and the river full of ice, no little danger was incurred.

So much time was lost, that the Emperor, who had arranged to be by a certain day at St. Petersburg, was obliged to renounce altogether his visit to Warsaw, and to turn back immediately to the Russian capital.

The river at Kiów is nearly half an English mile in width, and the erection of a suspension bridge, which has long been contemplated, will no doubt be now immediately decided on, especially as the Emperor was unable last year, on his journey to Warsaw, to pass the river at Kiów.

SCOTLAND.

Lamentable Distress.—In the Western Islands a population of fully 50,000 is bordering on starvation. The number of deaths from dysentery and cholera is increasing with fearful rapidity among the cottar class: and the small crofters are fast exhausting their small stores of corn. Most of them, says the Scotsman, now restrict themselves to one scanty meal per day; and the children and aged persons continue the greater part of their time in their miserable beds for the sake of warmth, and that they may require less food.

Another Accident on the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway.—On Saturday night the passenger train which left Edinburgh for Glasgow at five o'clock was suddenly stopped a few hundred yards before arrival at the Castlecary station, in consequence of the complete blocking-up of the rails by the ruins of a previous train of luggage-waggons and cattle-trucks. A passenger by the train states that he never beheld such a scene of devastation and horror. Numbers of oxen—some alive or half alive, and some quite dead—were seen lying amongst the wreck of several of the trucks, and crowds of people were busily employed in endeavouring to extricate them. The ruins of the engine, or at all events a fire of some kind, was on the bank smoking and burning, and several of the trucks lay directly across the rails. No passengers by the train were injured, and no lives lost, except those of the cattle. How the accident occurred is not known. The passenger in question, who luckily succeeded in procuring a carriage for himself and some ladies, were the only passengers that had arrived in Glasgow up to 10 o'clock on Saturday night.

IRELAND.

THE REPEAL ASSOCIATION.

At the meeting on Monday last Mr. O'Connell announced that there was no longer any hope of a reconciliation with the Young Irelanders, and he then proceeded to comment very strongly upon Mr. Smith O'Brien. Before the hon. and learned gentleman commenced his speech, however,

Mr. John O'Connell rose to report from the committee appointed to inquire the amount of money due by England to Ireland. He cited some articles from the London press to show that there was a deliberate design, on the part of England, to confiscate the property of Ireland, and hand it over probably to the London companies. The Irish landlords had often done the dirty work of England; but the ruler was about to throw away his tools. (Hear, hear.) If they did not come forward at once, their lands would be transferred in globo to those companies. The money which was already advanced, and still to be advanced, under the Labour Rate Act, would not amount to a moiety of the debt England owed to Ireland, and the Repeal Association would not consent to repay a shilling of those advances. (Cheers.)

Mr. O'Loughlin seconded the adoption of the report, which was agreed to.

Mr. O'Connell then rose, and after contradicting some statements of the local press, said that the association would henceforth have time to attend to their affairs, after the little by-battle with Young Ireland. There was an end of it and for ever. (Cheers.) The Association would work its way for the Repeal of the Union, totally regardless of the petty machinations of the Little Ireland gang in this country. He told them this—that he set them at defiance. (Here the meeting cheered lustily.) He did all he could to put an end to the dissensions—he did all boldly and manfully. He had been very much assailed by friends of his for stooping to the yoke of Young Ireland. He had been told they would triumph over him in their newspapers, and they had the bad taste to do so. He knew the Tory and Whig papers in England, and the Tory papers in Ireland, would sing songs of triumph; but all did not prevent him from making the offer of conciliation. (Cheers.) He made that sacrifice of his feelings—he made a sacrifice of his pride—but he felt that his fifty years' service in the cause of Ireland enabled him to act as he had done. (Cheers.) He offered to place the palms of his hands under their feet, to make a road for them to come back, and he had been met by an ungrateful and ungracious refusal. Mr. O'Brien had refused his proposal for a reconciliation, and added insult to injury. He (Mr. O'Connell) then read a passage from Mr. O'Brien's letter to Dr. Miley, which was to the effect that the proposal was a mere pretext. The phrase he complained of was totally untrue. (Hear, hear.) Well, his offer for conciliation was refused, and called a triumph. Why, it was he (Mr. O'Connell) that had a triumph—if any really had taken place. As well might an old dung-hill cock crow at a game cock and boast of victory because he did not succeed in vexing him. (Laughter.) They would indeed have consented to the conference on the main question—that of the legality of physical force—if the Association were handed over to Duffy and Mitchell and the other young fellows. Why, he would rather see the Association scattered to the winds, than fall under the guidance of such persons. (Cheers.) Nothing but the gross vanity of a pack of poetic writers and prose scribblers could enable them to say they had obtained a triumph over him or the Association. (Hear.) Oh! but the "Repeal rent was diminishing;" was not that accounted for by the state of the country? (Hear.) But while he had sixpence the Association should not submit to them. (Cheers.) Some doubts were expressed as to where the dissensions commenced—why they commenced with Mr. Smith O'Brien's foolish conduct in the House of Commons. Some of the English papers called him a Brummagem martyr (laughter), but he did not call him that.

DREADFUL STATE OF THE COUNTRY.

The accounts given of the state of the country by the Irish provincial journals are very affecting. A number of additional deaths from starvation are recorded, and the peasantry are said to be famishing.

Provision Riots in Tipperary—Murder.—The following communication has been addressed to the Dublin Evening Post.

"Caher, Dec. 20.—The country is in a frightful state; robberies of all descriptions, flour in particular, notwithstanding the protection of police escorts. As I write this, a company of soldiers has been called out of the barracks here to protect a quantity of flour on its way from Clonmel to Limerick and Tipperary. Last evening, about one hundred and fifty cars laden with flour, the property of several persons, accompanied by police, on the way to Tipperary, had only gone half a mile outside this town when the drivers were obliged to return back, the road being blockaded by armed men, and women with other weapons, and determined to take the flour at risk of life. I cannot enumerate or describe the quantity of robberies and the appalling distress of the people.

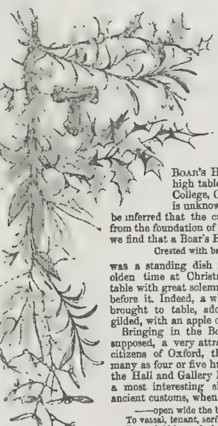
"Four o'Clock.—Dreadful Murder.—A man residing in the neighbourhood of Tipperary was barbarously robbed and murdered on Friday night. I saw the murdered man yesterday morning."

Deaths from Starvation in Mayo.—The Dublin Evening Post has the following regarding the state of Mayo:—"We have seen a letter addressed to one of the trustees of the India Poor Relief Fund, dated Castlebar, Dec. 19, in which the writer narrates the appalling fact, that thirty-one persons have died from starvation in Castlebar and the adjoining districts during the last two months."

Government Measures for the Advantage of Ireland.—An important document has been published in Ireland, addressed by the Treasury to the Board of Works. The immediate object is to increase, to the fullest possible extent that the existing law will permit, the facilities for extending Drainage and Productive Works. A supplementary minute, dated the 15th instant, refers to contemplated changes in the law, with a view of removing the impediments to improvements on entailed estates. The intention of the measure is to empower landed proprietors to sell portions of entailed estates, or enable the Government to do so in case arrears accumulate, for advances made from the Treasury for improvements.

Meeting of Landed Proprietors.—An important meeting of the landed proprietors of the county of Longford has taken place, at which the first decided step was taken for an assemblage of the Irish members of the House of Commons in Dublin early in January, to be assisted by a Committee of five gentlemen from each county, to suggest measures calculated to extricate the landed proprietors from the formidable evils that are impending. All parties, including Mr. O'Connell, Sir Percy Nugent, Mr. George Alexander Hamilton, and Mr. A. Lefroy, are described as concurring in this movement, which is likely to extend to all the other counties.

PICTURES FOR CHRISTMAS.



HE Engraving upon the annexed page depicts an olden custom, probably, of the age of Chaucer; it is commemorated in one of our earliest printed books, and is retained, yet with many innovations, to this day. Such is BRINGING IN THE BOAR'S HEAD.

The origin of the ceremony of bringing in the Boar's Head with singing to the high table in the Hall of Queen's College, Oxford, on Christmas Day, is unknown; but it may reasonably be inferred that the custom has been observed from the foundation of the College in 1340, since we find that a Boar's Head,

> Crested with bays and rosemary, was a standing dish in the Baronial Halls in olden time at Christmas, and was ushered to table with great solemnity, trumpeters sounding before it. Indeed, a whole Boar was sometimes brought to table, adorned with rosemary and gilded, with an apple or orange in its mouth.

Bringing in the Boar's Head is, as may be supposed, a very attractive scene to the good citizens of Oxford, there being sometimes as many as four or five hundred of them ranged in the Hall and Gallery looking into the Hall, and a most interesting sight it is, recalling the ancient customs, when stood

> ——open wide the baron's hall
> To vassal, tenant, serf, and all;
> Power laid his rod of rule aside,
> And Ceremony doffed his pride.
> The heir, with roses in his shoes,
> That night might village partner choose;
> The lord, underogating, share
> The vulgar game of "post and pair."
> All hailed with uncontrolled delight
> And general voice, the happy night
> That to the cottage as the crown
> Brought tidings of salvation down.
> Sir Walter Scott.

The Boar's Head, highly decorated with bay, holly, rosemary, &c., in a large pewter dish, is slowly borne into the Hall by two strong servants of the College, who hold it up as high as they can, that it may be seen by the visitors ranged on either side of the Hall. The gentleman who sings the ancient Carol, or "Boar's Head Song," (generally one of the members of the College, though, sometimes, one of the Choir of Magdalen College) immediately precedes the Boar's Head, and as he commences the song with "The Boar's Head in hand bear I," touches the dish with his right hand. Two young choristers from Magdalen College follow, to sing, conjointly with many of the junior members of Queen's College, the chorus "Caput Apri Defero," &c. The dish is carried, as before stated, to the high table, where sit the Provost, Bursar, Fellows, &c., and about which many visitors are congregated.

The Carol, consisting of a bass solo, with chorus, chanted at this old "time honoured" ceremony, is one altered from "A Caroll bryngyng in the Bore's Heed," in a collection of "Christmasse Carolles newly emprynted at London in the Flete-strete, at the sygne of the Sonne, by Wynkyn de Worde. The yere of our Lord M.D.XX," and is as follows.

THE BOAR'S HEAD SONG.

The Boar's Head in hand bear I,
Bedeck'd with bays and rosemary,
And I pray you, my masters, be merry,
Quot estis in convivio.
  Caput Apri defero
  Reddens laudes Domino.

The Boar's Head, as I understand,
Is the bravest dish in all the land,
When thus bedeck'd with a gay garland,
Let us servite cantico.
  Caput Apri defero
  Reddens laudes Domino.

Our steward hath provided this
In honour of the King of Bliss,
Which on this day to be served is
In Reginensi Atrio.
  Caput Apri defero
  Reddens laudes Domino.

The quaint original, which, in the third verse at least, we prefer to the version sung at Queen's, runs thus:—

A CAROLL, BRYNGYNG IN THE BORE'S HEED.

  Caput Apri defero
  Reddens laudes Domino.
The Bore's Heed in hand bringe I,
With garlans gay and rosemary,
I pray you all synge merely,
Qui estis in convivio.

The Bore's Heed I understande
Is the chefe servyce in this lande,
Loke where ever it be fande.
Servite cum cantico.

Be gladde lordes, both more and lasse
For this hath ordeyned our stewarde,
To chere you all this Chrismasse
The Bore's Heed with mustarde.

The air of the chant is very beautiful, and adds greatly to the effect of the scene, and were the Hall as old as the custom it would indeed be charming; but, unfortunately, the old hall was consumed by fire about 68 years since, and the present one is in the Doric style of architecture; as it is, however, the custom, being unique, is an especially interesting relic of olden manners.

KISSING UNDER THE MISLETOE.

This custom may be a relic of the age when

> Forth to the wood did merry men go
> To gather in the misletoe.

It is a scene of harmless mirth, which even "the schoolmaster" has not yet entirely whipt out of "offending Adam:"

Oh! well may the Misletoe honour'd be
By the brave and the beautiful, sage and free;
It takes not its birth from the cold Earth's yoke,
But springs from the breast of the glorious Oak.
There, planted by Heaven's own blessèd breeze,
It wreaths a fair crown for the King of the Seas.
And the Druid's old Misletoe well, I trow,
May beam on a Monarch's or Maiden's brow.

The Misletoe clings to the brave Oak tree,
An auspice propitious and benison free;
'Tis not like the Ivy, that cankers the tow'r,
But the bright flower twining round Purity's bower;
And the true Hearts of Oak which, aye gallantly brave,
The commotion of Europe as cliffs dare the wave,
Will treasure the Kiss—oh! the Kiss 'neath the bough
Which hallows the lover's fond voiceless vow.

THE THEATRES.

THE CHRISTMAS ENTERTAINMENTS.

This evening the pits and galleries of all the theatres will be in their usual state of "Boxing Night" excitement. We shall offer in our next, an account of the various entertainments: at present, we can merely state what they are to be.

Drury Lane puts forward a pantomime written by Mr. Madison Morton, whose "Gulliver" last year was so successful. It is called "Harlequin St. George and the Dragon," and the "Legend of the Champion Saint winning the hand of Sabra and overcoming the Dragon," is grotesquely followed. The plot represents Kalyba and her attendant demons, Earth, Air, Fire, and Water, surprised by the sudden arrival of the "March of Intellect," who interrupts their attempts at mischief. Almanza, King of Morocco (Mr. T. Matthews), arrives to claim the hand of the Princess Sabra (Mr. Hance), daughter of King Ptolemy (Mr. Priorson), but but before the marriage takes place, she (Sabra) is abducted by the Dragon (Mr. Wieland), whom St George (Mr. W. H. Payne) overcomes. And then the fun begins. Harlequin, Mr Howell; Clown, Mr. T. Matthews; Pantaloon, Mr. Priorson; Columbine, Miss Hicks. The scenery in the opening represents Earth, Air, and Water; this is followed by the abode of the March of Intellect, Little St. George's abode, Great St. George's abode, a representation of dawn, which changes to the Egyptian coast. We are next regaled with the view of a grand palace, the dances of the Dragon, and the grand transformation scene. The comic business commences with a curiosity shop. This is political, and alludes to the statue-tal embellishments of the new House of Lords. The second scene is elaborate; it represents corn-chandlers, with some allusions to the League and Abolition, and changes to the emblems of plenty. The third is a Siamese cottage, with some imitations of the Ethiopian Serenaders. Fourth is an ironmonger's shop, with gun-cotton and other explosive materials. The fifth is a toy-shop, with Wellington's statue. This is purchased by the infant-ry of some noble family, and they drag it away to Hyde Park Corner. The opening is very long, but, perhaps this is an advantage, as there is usually more fun in it than in the harlequinade which follows. The piece concludes with a grand Allegorical Tableau, in honour of the Duke of Wellington.

The Haymarket has a burlesque (the only one of the season), by Mr Planché, taken from the inexhaustible stores of the Countess d'Anvis, and called "The Invisible Prince:" the name of the original story being, we believe, "Prince Lutin." Leander, the hero of the drama, is a handsome young fellow, hated by an ugly dwarfish Prince, who seeks his destruction. Leander, however, obtains the protection of a powerful fairy, whose life he has saved, under the form of a snake. In return for the service rendered her, she bestows upon him a cap, by which he can render himself invisible, and also three roses—one of which will supply him with money whenever he wants it, the second will inform him whether his mistress be faithful or not, and the third will prevent his being sick. Provided with these powerful talismans, the Prince sets out on his travels, with his gallant steed, Gris-de-line; meets many strange and wonderful adventures, and falls in love with the beautiful Princess of the Island of Calm Delights. This delectable creature had been brought up in a hatred of men, secluded from the world, and only attended by young damsels, in the peaceful island, to which Leander gains access by means of his fairy cap. The handsome intruder gains the love of the Princess, overcomes his ugly rival, Prince Furibond, and eventually is united to the lovely object of his affections. The Invisible Prince will be personated by Miss P. Horton; the Princess of the Isle of Calm Delights by Miss Julia Bennett. Mr. James Bland has, of course, the part of a tyrannical, ugly Prince assigned to him. We should not believe in any burlesque at the Haymarket, in which Mr. Bland had not a good opportunity for displaying his inimitable blustering.

At the Lyceum, a pantomime will be played, for the first time since Mrs. Keeley has held the theatre. It is written by Mr. Stoqueler, the author of "Polkamania," and founded upon Roscoe's well-known juvenile poem of "The Butterfly's Ball" The dresses are exceedingly fanciful and splendid.

The Adelphi has no real Christmas entertainment; the management appearing to think, (and with some reason), that both burlesques and pantomimes have been somewhat overdone. But it has a new three-act drama, written by Mr. R. B Peake, called "Columba, or the Corsican Sister," in which all the principal members of the Adelphi company will appear. It is founded on a romantic tale, illustrative of the barbarous custom prevailing amongst the Corsicans, by which the revenging of an injury or insult committed against an individual deceased is regarded as a sacred duty by his nearest of kin; hence, to give the rembecco—that is, to reproach a person with not having avenged himself, is the most deadly insult that can be offered a Corsican. Madame Celeste plays the Corsican Sister; the other principal characters will be supported by Mrs. Yates, Miss Woolgar, Messrs. Howe, Wright, Bedford, O. Smith, Selby, Lambert, &c. "The Phantom Dancers" will be played afterwards, its attraction continuing very great.

The Princess' has a pantomime called "The Enchanted Beauty of the Golden Casket; or, Harlequin and the One-Eyed Ogre."

The Olympic pantomime is written by Mr. E. L. Blanchard, and is called 'King Alfred the Great; or, Harlequin History and the Enchanted Raven." A good notion is worked out in the opening scene—the Walhalla, or Hall of British Heroes—where the most important characters in history are grouped after the style of Madame Tussaud's exhibition, and deliver various opinions. During a consultation for a subject, Fable and Travestie appear. A contrast is suggested between Alfred the Great, of cake-roasting fame, and Alfred the Little, of velvet unimaginable notoriety. The second scene is the Court-yard of the Castle Uffington, and introduces us to Edwin, afterwards Harlequin (Cormack); and Elfrida, subsequently Columbine (Miss Ann Mott); then comes Guthrum, the Danish chief, afterwards Clown (Jefferini); with Greybald, afterwards Pantaloon (Hartland). Scene 3 represents The Druid's Cave and Blowing Stone at Kingston Lisle. King Alfred enters in fear and trembling, but is re-assured by an invisible chorus that "aid is near." Scene 4 is the Cottage, and Dame Winifred is cooking her cakes; Alfred undertakes to help her. Scene 5 is Salisbury Plain. Scene 6, The Danish Encampment at Stonehenge, with a mock concert à la Jullien. Scene 7, and the last of the introduction, the Fairy Land of Fable. Here the transformation takes place Mr. Blanchard's pieces are always filled with very fair hits at the topics of the day.

Astley's has turned the story of "The Forty Thieves" into a pantomime, which is said to have been got up at a great expense. The old melodrama has been taken as the foundation of the piece, but the robbers are represented by our most notorious highwaymen. The comic business includes a panoramic view of the Wellington Statue procession, Fairlop Fair, &c. A feature in the piece will be a magnificent revolving wheel of gas at the conclusion, occupying nearly the entire stage. The comic business will be supported by Mr. Rochez, as Clown; M. Safferini, Pantaloon; Mr. W. H. Harvey, Harlequin; and Miss Louisa Waite, Columbine. The pantomime has been written by Mr. Nelson Lee, and produced by Mr. W. D. Broadfoot.

The Surrey has an original plot for "The King of the Castle; or, Harlequin in the Land of Dreams:" Sadler's Wells puts forward "Harlequin and a Happy New Year:" the City of London turns the life of Richard the Third into a pantomime, under the name of "He with the Hump:" and the Queen's rejoices in certain passages connected with the history of Tom Tiddler

The Victoria appears to have the most sensible subject for its pantomime of any we have seen, if it is well worked out. It is called "The Birth of the Steam-Engine, or Harlequin Go-a-Head and Joe Miller and his Men," and it has an advantage in possessing Mr. T. Barry, so well known in "the ring" at Astley's and Vauxhall, as the Clown. From the programme in the bill there appears to be scope for an immense deal of fun, combined with more intention than is usually met with in pantomimic openings; and it is to end with "a dazzling and brilliant denouement, in a shower of variegated light, illuminated by the coloured radiance of myriads of revolving stars." This must be something terrifically imposing; and, as they used to say at Bartholomew Fair, "The price is threepence only *three*pence to the Gallery."

We may add, as a rider (although it is scarcely necessary to do so), that the Wellington Statue forms a prominent feature in all the pantomimes.

HAYMARKET.

Under the somewhat perplexing tittle of "The Round of Wrong" an interesting domestic drama, in two acts, the serious interest of which predominates, was produced at this theatre, last Saturday evening. It is from the practised pen of Mr. Bayle Bernard, and is very carefully constructed, although, on its first representation, there were many scenes which stood in need of liberal cutting, the feeling of ennui during their progress being, in a great measure, produced by the over-sentimental dialogue, which, although written with evident care, at times became somewhat wearisome, since the story of the piece is, as we have hinted, of a sombre nature in itself. It is as follows:—Sir Arthur Foljambe (Mr. Stuart) has, when young, formed an imprudent marriage with a girl moving in a sphere far below his own, by whom he has a daughter. Afraid of the affair coming to his father's ears, he cast off the mother and child, who, in their destitution, were received by the mother of Reuben Gwynn (Mr. Webster), a young farmer. The child, Mary Ryland (Miss Fortescue), grew up to be beloved by Reuben, and, in this position of affairs, the drama commences, Sir Arthur having succeeded to his father's estates, and Reuben being in the West Indies looking after some of the Foljambe property, leaving Mary, true and loving, at home with her mother. Sir Arthur, who has constantly watched over his daughter, seeing her beauty, thinks he may turn it to account by getting her to marry some wealthy man, by which means, also, his own fortunes, somewhat impaired, may be improved. At the same time, his pride is hurt at the bare idea of her forming an alliance with a common farmer. For this purpose he breaks the secret of her birth to Mary, and, by appealing to her feelings, and painting the inevitable ruin that awaits him if she does not give in to his plans, he succeeds in estranging her from her humble circle. In this selfish scheme he is assisted by his sister, Lady Charlotte Willoughby (Mrs. W. Clifford), his lawyer, Lichen (Mr. Rogers), and "a natural man of fashion," Ducks (Mr. Buckstone). Reuben returns from the West Indies, and is crushed by learning the truth. His entire nature is changed, and he now turns every thought of his soul towards the accomplishment of the keenest revenge on Sir Arthur

A lapse of three years is supposed to occur between the first and second acts; and when the story is again taken up, we find Mary has returned from Paris whither she had been sent; and Reuben has become comparatively wealthy, by fortunate speculations in a large mercantile house. He has not, however, been earning money for his own future comfort, but merely to assist him in carrying out his plans of revenge. An opportunity arrives: Harwood, a young medical man (Mr. Howe), is in love with Mary, but his proposals are rejected with scorn by Sir Arthur. In despair he resolves to quit England; but before he leaves, he calls on Reuben, and requests him to receive a packet he (Harwood) is expecting, and, if he finds it contain a small legacy he expects, to forward a check to him for its amount. The parcel arrives, and Reuben finds that it contains a claim upon Sir Arthur Foljambe for £19,000, due to Harwood, by legacy, from the Baronet's estate. And now Reuben sees that a mighty power is in his hands. He goes to Sir Arthur, and tells him that he must have either the money or his daughter. A stormy interview results, and in the end, the proud Baronet is forced to give up his child, seeing only ruin before him if he refuses, for payment of the sum is out of the question. Reuben is flushed with his triumph, when the thought comes across him that it is with Harwood's money he is accomplishing his wishes. His evil genius is about to drag him still deeper into the vortex of his bad passions, when Mary appears once more at his home, and by her earnest and touching appeals to his better feelings, induces him to forgive Sir Arthur. But he makes one condition—that the Baronet should give the hand of his niece to Harwood. This is done: the bond is returned to the young surgeon; and Sir Arthur Foljambe himself joins the hands of Reuben and Mary. It will be seen from this that the plot is interesting and original; but the denouement is scarcely satisfactory enough, compared with the general action of the piece. At the same time the design is clever, and we rejoice to find Mr. Bernard giving his attention and talents to this class of drama.

It was excellently performed. Mr. Webster had the chief part to sustain, and his acting was powerful and impressive. Miss Fortescue's gentle grace came out with great effect in Mary Ryland; and the other ladies and gentlemen—Mr. Buckstone especially—played with care and judgment. The piece was liberally applauded, and announced for repetition every evening, by Mr. Webster, with unqualified approbation.

FRENCH PLAYS.

"Bertrand et Raton" has been the great attraction at the St. James's Theatre during the past week, and Mr. Mitchell has produced it in admirable style. The cautious, cunning Bertrand, could scarcely be better represented than by Perlet, who knows how to give to every word its weight—to every turn its significance Cartigny, whose broad hearty style is the very reverse of Perlet's cold polish, is excellently fitted for the part of Raton; whilst the distinct, strongly-marked enunciation of Madame Grassan brings out his wife with strong effect. We will not say that we like Mademoiselle Brohan so well in the attire of a boy-apprentice as in one of her soubrettes, but she gives a nice vivacity to the part of Jean, and by persuading her to undertake it, Mr. Mitchell has given a new feature to the piece. In point of costume, the manner in which this admirable comedy has been put upon the stage, is deserving of all commendation. M. Perlet remains after Christmas, but Mademoiselle Brohan will have left London by the time this sheet is in the hands of the reader. Few actresses have made so speedy a good impression upon the audiences of the St. James's Theatre as this agreeable and talented lady. Her advent, another season, will be eagerly looked forward to.

The Colosseum.—The Prince Louis Napoleon Buonaparte, the Turkish Ambassador and suite, and the Prince and Princess Worowloski, visited the Colosseum on Wednesday evening.

MUSIC.

DRURY-LANE THEATRE.

Owing to the hoarseness of Mr. Harrison, the opera of "The Maid of Artois" was substituted for "The Bondman" on Saturday last. On Monday night, "The Bohemian Girl" was given; and on Tuesday and Wednesday, "The Maid of Artois" was repeated, being the closing nights of Madame Bishop's engagement. This unfortunate withdrawal of Balfe's most successful opera has caused the attendances to be but indifferent until half-price, as Mdlle. Fuoco's popularity up to her last appearance remained undiminished. It is a pity that the practice of understudying the leading parts in an opera is not followed at our theatres as in Paris. If Mr. King had been "up" in the character of Ardenford, no postponement of "The Bondman" would have been rendered imperative. Mr. King is improving much as a singer, and, with a little more encouragement, would take higher ground. Mr Rafter is making way rapidly. He sings the music of Thaddeus, in "The Bohemian Girl," in excellent style, having acquired more confidence by his success in "The Bondman." This opera, in fact, may be said to have been the making of Weiss and Rafter as singers and of Harrison as an actor. We may also acknowledge here, that there is a marked improvement in the conducting of Schira. If he would attend more to the sustaining of the voices, his great fault might be remedied. The orchestra has some good materials in the wind instrumentalists, but the stringed ones are very weak.

PRINCESS' THEATRE.

Under the title of "The Seven Maids of Munich, or the Ghost's Tower," the popular composer, Mr. Herbert Rodwell, has produced a very agreeable musical romance, in one act. The libretto and the music are from his pen: the former is highly amusing, the latter is pleasing and pretty, although the paternity of the themes may admit of discussion. The overture ought to have been styled, "A Set of Quadrilles." The first scene is in a café near the Lake of Como, with French officers carousing. After a chorus to the glory of La Belle France, Mr. Allen, as Frederick, sang a charming lament, "Oh! I could weep from night to morn," and was rapturously encored Next came a song from Leffler, as Bellejambe, "I will never woo by sighing," of no great merit. The entrance of seven females masked, gives rise to a romance, "Yon ruined tower," sung by Miss S Flower, which was demanded a second time. It has a pretty réfrain, and is nicely instrumented. After the departure of the masked ladies, the officers find that letters have been left for them from the "Seven Maids of Munich," daughters of Baron Brustlebach. Mr. Allen had a second ballad, "I'll still believe in thee"—simple and unaffected. In the second scene Miss S. Flower has a clever air, "The click-clack of the village mill." The "Buffa aria d'entrata" of the diplomatic Baron, who hates the French, and has moved from Munich to Como in the hopes of destroying Napoleon and his chief officers, was indifferently sung by Mr. Walton; but Mr. Rodwell must have been infected with Rossinian reminiscences when he wrote it. Uriel, the Maid (Miss Marshall), here ascertains the Baron's plot, by finding a letter from the conspirators. In the third scene, the officers serenade the "Seven Maids" from the lake; but Cornet Grosdos (Mr. Compton), who plays the trombone, is nearly drowned by the upsetting of the boat. He is dragged into the Château by the Seven Maids, "more dead than alive," and Uriel administers the brandy bottle, which, however, contains a strong dose of opium. The Seven Maids remove him in a chair to the haunted apartment in the ghost's tower, and a very ludicrous scene takes place, when the Cornet awakes to consciousness, finds himself in strange attire, and overhears all the details of the conspiracy to assassinate Napoleon and himself in particular. Compton acted this scene admirably. Finally the Baron, to save his head from the scaffold, is compelled to consent to the union of his seven daughters with the seven French officers; and when the Cornet expects to denounce the conspirators, he is mystified through Uriel's agency, by the aspect of the "Seven Maids of Munich." We wish that more one act operettas were written than is the custom at present, instead of having long and dreary three act works. Mr. Rodwell, in his time, has contributed divers attractive melodies for the million. In this instance we think he shines more as an author than as a composer.

CONCERTS.

Sacred Concerts.—The second programme on Monday night at Crosby Hall, opened with Dr. Hayes' Anthem, "O, Worship the Lord." This was followed by Neukomm's Duo, "Through the Wide Wilderness," sung by the Misses Steele and Cabitt. Mr. Locker had a heavy air by Curschman, "'Mid Wintry Storms." A fine Quartet by Bernando Sabbattini, "God be Merciful," was well rendered by Misses Ramforth and Bassano, Messrs. Francis and Novello. Mr. J. A. Novello gave Handel's "Honour and Arms" artistically. Miss Steele was encored in Preyer's Air, "Peace." A beautiful Duo, by Kallewoda, "The Future Bright," was sung by Messrs. Lockey and Novello. Miss Cubitt gave Handel's "He shall Feed his Flock;" and the first part terminated with one of Haydn's Chorusses. Miss Mounsey performed on the organ an Allegro, Andante, and Fugue, by Bach; and there were gleanings from Cherubini, Mendellsohn, Otto Nicolai, Arcadelt, Kücken, and Handel, in the second part. The third Concert will be on January 5

Sacred Harmonic Society. Handel's Oratorio of "The Messiah" was performed on Wednesday night at Exeter Hall, which was fully attended. The chorus singers feel their strength in this sublime work, and it was finely executed, Madame Caradori Allan, Miss Hawes, Mr. Manvers and Mr. Phillips being the principal vocalists.

MUSICAL CHIT-CHAT.

Mr. J. L. Hatton gave a Musical Entertainment at the Assembly Room, Rosemary Branch Tavern, Peckham, on Wednesday night; and, in addition to various songs, performed pieces on the pianoforte. Mr. Dempster repeated his Ballad Soirée on the same evening, at the Princess' Concert Room. On Tuesday night, Mr. Wilson closed his month's campaign at Crosby Hall. He departs again for the provinces after Christmas. The Cecilian Society performed Handel's "Messiah" at the Albion Hall, Moorgate, on Thursday evening, being the fifty-ninth annual performance of that oratorio by the Society. Miss Rainforth, Miss Thornton, Miss C Felton, Messrs. Leffler, Shoubridge, Butler, and Turner, were the leading vocalists. Mr. Walker conducted, Mr. Berry was the Leader, and Mr. Peck the Organist. Verdi's opera of "I Due Foscari" has been successfully produced at the Théâtre Italien in Paris; Coletti playing the Doge, Mario the Younger, Foscari, and Grisi, the wife of the latter. The work is regarded as inferior to the "Nabucco," "Ernani," "Lombardi," &c., by the same composer; but the talents of the artists carried the opera through triumphantly. Grisi was in superb voice, and never acted more efficiently. Rossini's pasticcio, "Robert Bruce," after repeated postponements, was to have been produced at the Académie Royale de Musique on Wednesday last. According to a statement in the Morning Chronicle, Jenny Lind has signed an engagement for three months at Her Majesty's Theatre, from April next, for ten performances per month, provided her contract with Drury-Lane Theatre be cancelled by Mr. Bunn; but, as the latter insists on her fulfilment, by appearing first on his stage, there appears to be no chance of Jenny Lind's début in London next year. She is now in Vienna, where she will remain until the end of February, when she will return to Berlin. Meyerbeer is in the Austrian capital, superintending the production of his "Camp of Silesia" for Jenny Lind, the censorship having made various alterations. He has composed some new pieces for her in this opera, in which she was to have made her début at Drury-Lane Theatre. Meyerbeer has generously given up the whole of his year's salary, as Musical Director of the Berlin Opera, to the band and chorus, as he had taken no part in the management, although nominally Director, owing to some misunderstanding with the authorities. The reigning Duke of Saxe Coburg's opera of "Zaïre," so triumphantly produced at Gotha, has been transferred to the Coburg stage, with equal success. Berlioz's "Damnation de Faust" was repeated for the second time at the Opera-Comique, on Sunday last. Fanny Elssler has been the star of Florence for some time past, and was lately presented with a gold diadem; she is engaged for the Royal Italian Opera, Covent-Garden, next season.

LITERATURE.

Partners for Life. A Christmas Story. By Camilla Toulmin. Orr & Co.

This admirable little book is entitled to good position among the fifteen or sixteen 'Books for Christmas," which have appeared within the past month It would scarcely be possible to point to one of these agreeable contributions which possesses a higher domestic interest, by which we mean that peculiar character of incident which is best adapted for the family circle, neither startling with its improbabilities, nor tiring with its sentimentalities, but, in the guise of a pleasant fiction, conveying a sound and useful moral In this meritorious object, Miss Toulmin has been uniformly successful; and the work now before us must add to her reputation as a sincere and earnest delineator of middle life. The sentiment of this Story is throughout healthy, the principle sound, and the narrative entertaining, without any of those excrescences which are often mistaken for pleasantry: the foibles and weak points of the characters in the tale are not spared, but they are not exposed for a better purpose than mere ridicule.

We must not let our readers into the plot of the story; and shall merely observe that the characters of the Merchants, two of the "Partners," are well drawn; there are delicate portraits of a poor governess, and an invalid boy; and a tender love-tale The dénouement is brought about on a Christmas Day, which introduces this excellent tone of reflection:—

"Beautifully and truly is it said, that 'work is worship!' And even, in like measure and in like manner, Enjoyment is Thanksgiving. Who has not felt this at Christmas Time!—when the old and new years meet, and the world pauses, as it were, to breathe amid the toil, and strife, and struggle of life; and the holy gratitude to which the Sacred Season should give birth, inclines us to be at peace with all men: and none the less that we show our gratitude in mirth, and revelry, and song, and laughter!

"Alas! sad hearts are there, even on Christmas Day; for the will cannot always exorcise the forms that rise at memory's call; and the dead, or the absent, may rule the hour that seems to belong only to the mirthful present. There are silent cares, too, which may check gladness. But, for the most part, it is a happy, merry time; and Mr. Merrythorpe was not alone in thinking there never was such a Christmas Day as that of which we are talking. Yet, morally speaking, it was a sort of April weather—smiles and tears chasing each other in rapid succession."

Altogether, this is just the work we can commend to our readers for its sympathy with actual life. The volume is illustrated with several characteristic designs by Mr. Absolon.

The Battle of Life. A Love Story. By Charles Dickens. Bradbury and Evans.

As we know this charming little volume to be already in the hands of some twenty thousand readers, we shall not detail the plot of the "Love Story" which it contains. The incident of a girl giving up her suitor to her sister, which is the staple of the tale, may be uncommon; but an instance of such generous love is fresh in our recollection. The book is, from first to last, overflowing with benevolence and affection, and kindly nature: even now, it has many thousands of grateful admirers. Like all works from the same eloquent pen, it abounds with world-knowledge and sympathising experience, quaint bits of character, and pleasant localities; in proof of which we detach a few passages.—

CLEMENCY NEWCOME

"She was about thirty years old; and had a sufficiently plump and cheerful face, though it was twisted up into an odd expression of tightness that made it comical. But the extraordinary homeliness of her gait and manner would have superseded any face in the world. To say that she had two left legs, and somebody else's arms; and that all four limbs seemed to be out of joint, and to start from perfectly wrong places when they were set in motion; is to offer the mildest outline of the reality. To say that she was perfectly content and satisfied with these arrangements, and regarded them as being no business of hers, and took her arms and legs as they came, and allowed them to dispose of themselves just as it happened, is to render faint justice to her equanimity Her dress was a prodigious pair of self-willed shoes, that never wanted to go where her feet went; blue stockings; a printed gown of many colours, and the most hideous pattern procurable for money; and a white apron. She always wore short sleeves, and always had, by some accident, grazed elbows, in which she took so lively an interest, that she was continually trying to turn them round, and get impossible views of them. In general, a little cap perched somewhere on her head; though it was rarely to be met with in the place usually occupied in other subjects, by that article of dress; but from head to foot she was scrupulously clean, and maintained a kind of dislocated tidiness. Indeed, her laudable anxiety to be tidy and compact in her own conscience, as well as in the public eye, gave rise to one of her most startling evolutions, which was to grasp herself sometimes by a sort of wooden handle (part of her clothing, and familiarly called a busk), and wrestle as it were with her garments, until they fell into a symmetrical arrangement."

FOLLY OF WAR.

"Why on this day, the great battle was fought on this ground. On this ground where we now sit, where I saw my two girls dance this morning, where the fruit has just been gathered for our eating from these trees, the roots of which are struck in Men, not earth—so many lives were lost, that within my recollection, generations afterwards, a churchyard full of bones, and dust of bones, and chips of cloven skulls, has been dug up from underneath our feet here. Yet not a hundred people in that battle knew for what they fought, or why; not a hundred of the inconsiderate rejoicers in the victory, why they rejoiced. Not half a hundred people were the better, for the gain or loss. Not half a dozen men agree to this hour on the cause or merits: and nobody, in short, ever knew anything distinct about it, but the mourners of the slain."

BRITAIN AND CLEMENCY "SIGNING."

"How he laboured under an apprehension not uncommon to persons in his degree, to whom the use of pen and ink is an event, that he couldn't append his name to a document, not of his own writing, without committing himself in some shadowy manner, or somehow signing away vague and enormous sums of money; and how he approached the deeds under protest, and by dint of the Doctor's coercion, and insisted on pausing to look at them before writing (the cramped hand, to say nothing of the phraseology, being so much Chinese to him), and also on turning them round to see whether there was anything fraudulent, underneath; and how, having signed his name, he became desolate as one who had parted with his property and rights; I want the time to tell. Also, how the blue bag containing his signature, afterwards had a mysterious interest for him, and he couldn't leave it; also, how Clemency Newcome, in an ecstasy of laughter at the idea of her own importance and dignity, brooded over the whole table with her two elbows like a spread eagle, and reposed her head upon her left arm as a preliminary to the formation of certain cabalistic characters, which required a deal of ink, and imaginary counterparts whereof she executed at the same time with her tongue. Also how, having once tasted ink, she became thirsty in that regard, as tigers are said to be after tasting another sort of fluid, and wanted to sign everything, and put her name in all kinds of places."

THE LAWYERS' OFFICES

"The offices of Messrs. Snitchey and Craggs stood convenient with an open door, down two smooth steps in the market-place: so that any angry farmer inclining towards hot water, might tumble into it at once. Their special council-chamber and hall of conference was an old back room up stairs, with a low dark ceiling, which seemed to be knitting its brows gloomily in the consideration of tangled points of law. It was furnished with some high-backed leathern chairs, garnished with great goggle-eyed brass nails, of which, every here and there, two or three had fallen out; or had been picked out, perhaps, by the wandering thumbs and forefingers of bewildered clients. There was a framed print of a great judge in it, every curl in whose dreadful wig had made a man's hair stand on end. Bales of papers filled the dusty closets, shelves, and tables; and round the wainscot there were tiers of boxes, padlocked and fireproof, with people's names painted outside, which anxious visitors felt themselves, by a cruel enchantment, obliged to spell backwards and forwards, and to make anagrams of, while they sat, seeming to listen to Snitchey and Craggs, without comprehending one word of what they said."

The late Right Hon. Thomas Grenville.—It is stated that the Hon. and Rev. George Neville Grenville, the Dean of Windsor, will come into possession of property, in consequence of the death of his late venerable relative, of the value of between £20,000 and £30,000 per annum. The Dean of Windsor took the arms and name of Grenville, in 1825, on succeeding to the property of his maternal kinsman, Lord Glastonbury

The Small Debts Act.—Tuesday night's Gazette contains a notice from the Privy Council on the subject of the "Small Debts Act," to the effect "That, after the expiration of one calendar month from the date of the publication of this notice in the London Gazette, her Majesty, with the advice of her Privy Council, will take into consideration the propriety of making orders for the purposes of the said Act, and for putting the said Act into execution in every county throughout England and Wales."

Changes in the Royal Household. We understand that some immediate changes are in contemplation in the Royal establishment. Major-General Sir Henry Wheatley has been permitted, at his advanced age, to retire from the office of Keeper of her Majesty's Privy Purse, on a most liberal pension, and the dignity of a baronet. The office of the Keeper of the Privy Purse, and that of the Treasurer of the Prince's Household, are to be united in the person of Mr. Anson. The gentleman to fill the office of Private Secretary to his Royal Highness, hitherto held by Mr. Anson, has not yet been selected.—Times.

Exchange of Compliments by Electricity.—On Thursday (last week), when the Mayor of Newcastle, James Archbold, Esq., was entertaining his friends in the Assembly Rooms, "The Health of the Lord Mayor and Corporation of the City of York" was drunk a little before ten o'clock, and a message sent over to the Gateshead Station to communicate the fact by telegraph to his Lordship, who, at the same time, had a large party in the Mansion House, at York; and, in about an hour, despite the interposing snow, an answer was received in the Assembly Rooms at Newcastle, to the effect that the civility had been reciprocated, and "The Health of the Mayor and Corporation of Newcastle" been drunk by his Lordship and his guests.

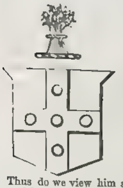
A New Smuggling Trick.—A few nights ago, a Custom-house officer, at Liverpool, apprehended a woman named Eliza Smith, a passenger on board an American vessel, on suspicion of having smuggled tobacco in her possession. Upon examining her dress, 17 lbs. of tobacco were found concealed; but the most remarkable of the expedients which had been resorted to for the purpose of deceiving the lynx eyed deputies of the Customs, was that of giving to the contraband leaf the resemblance of a loaf. A quantity of cut tobacco had been pressed into a tin, over which a thin layer of doe was spread, which, being baked, had the appearance to the eye of a veritable loaf. The quantity of tobacco which the woman had contrived to secrete in this and other modes, amounted to no less than 70 lbs.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

THE LANDGRAVE OF HESSE HOMBURG.

Philip Augustus Frederick, Sovereign Landgrave of Hesse Homburg, Field Marshal in the Austrian service, and Governor of the Federal Fortress of Mayence, was the son of the Landgrave Frederick, and the brother of the Landgrave Louis. His Serene Highness Philip was born on the 11th March, 1779, and succeeded his brother Louis the 19th January, 1839. His Serene Highness expired on the 10th instant, at Homburg-es-Monte. He had espoused, the 26th June, 1835, in morganatic, or left-handed wedlock, Antonia, Countess of Naumburg, but is succeeded in his sovereignty by his next brother, Prince Gustavus Adolphus, now reigning Landgrave of Hesse Homburg.

THE RIGHT HON. THOMAS GRENVILLE

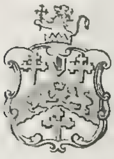


The Right Hon. Thomas Grenville, whose death has just occurred, at an extremely advanced age, was the elder son of George Grenville, Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1763, and brother of the late William Wyndham, Baron Grenville, First Lord of the Treasury. The Right Hon. Thomas Grenville was also great uncle of the present Duke of Buckingham. He was born the 31st December, 1755. He early in life displayed, like many members of his distinguished family, great intellect and promise; but his after life seems to have been one of flickering eminence, he every now and then coming forward with energy and excellence sufficient to lead him to substantial political power and fame, and then retiring into long and dignified seclusions.

Thus do we view him at divers periods of his life—at one time a graceful and fluent orator in the Commons—the supporter of Fox, and the terror of Pitt; then a diplomatist; afterwards a recluse, devoted to the study of classical literature; then a Member of Parliament, and a diplomatist again; and anon a Minister; lastly, he returns once more to private life, to share in, and to enjoy to the utmost, for nearly forty years, its most refined and rational pleasures. Literature, society, and hospitality, found Thomas Grenville a willing and a delighted votary; and the statesman that might have been, departs this life, after having abandoned worldly honours for, perhaps, the wiser, the more virtuous, and the happier course.

The offices and appointments which Mr. Grenville held may be briefly stated. He was a member of Parliament for many years, and represented there Aldborough, and afterwards Buckingham. He was chosen Plenipotentiary to arrange peace with America; but, a change of Ministry occurring, he did not go. In 1795 he went, as Minister Extraordinary, to the Court at Berlin, and suffered a memorable shipwreck in his voyage thither. In 1800 he was appointed "Chief Justice in Eyre, South of the Trent," a sinecure office, which dies with him. In 1806 he obtained the station of First Lord of the Admiralty; resigning which the following year, he finally retired into a privacy which has only terminated with his death. Mr. Grenville was never married. His demise has occurred in the 90th year of his age.

SIR GEORGE HILARO BARLOW, BART.



This venerable Baronet died a few days since. He was the fourth son of William Barlow, Esq., of Bath, and brother of the late Sir Robert Barlow, a naval officer, distinguished for his gallant capture of the Africaine, French frigate. Early in life Sir George went to the East Indies, and eventually became, at the decease of Charles, Marquis Cornwallis, in 1805, Governor-General of India. Two years before he had been created a Baronet, and, in two years after, he was appointed Governor of Fort St. George, Madras. He married, in 1789, Elizabeth, daughter of Burton Smith, Esq., of the county of Westmeath, and by her (from whom he was divorced in 1816) he has left a very large family.

M. DESHAYES.

Monsieur Deshayes, the renowned ballet-master, has died recently at Paris. He was the talented successor of those Terpsichorean men of note, Gordel and Noverre. If ballets be graceful and pleasant spectacles—and who can deny it?—M. Deshayes deserves a tribute of regret at his departure, for he was the inventor of some of the prettiest ballets of the present age, to wit, among others, of the famed one of "Benvosky." The proximate cause of poor Deshayes' death was singular. Returning home, while in London, from a jovial dinner, where Taglioni and Cerito were among the guests, he fell into a pit, and from the injuries he then sustained, he never afterwards recovered.

THE REV. JAMES M'TEAR

Mr. M'Tear, a well know clergyman, politician, and public speaker in Glasgow, was a native of Ireland, and came to Glasgow with his father, immediately after the Irish Rebellion, and when he was about nineteen years of age. Having received a good education, he commenced teaching, and proved very successful in that profession: but his inclications were strong to the ministry of the Gospel, a preacher of which he became in connection with the Relief Synod. While studying divinity at the University, an event affected to a considerable degree his prospects as a clergyman in the west of Scotland. He had been accustomed, while a teacher, to let his class-room to friendly and other societies. Under the Castlereagh Administration, one of these societies was suspected of meeting for seditious purposes; and Mr. M'Tear was apprehended and committed to prison. Though liberated in a few days, without a trial, the fact of his having been imprisoned caused him to be regarded with suspicion in some country churches in this quarter. But his character was vindicated at the time in public advertisements, by the Professors of the University, by his fellow-students, by ministers of all denominations, and by a defence by Henry (now Lord) Brougham in the House of Commons. On account of his increasing family, Mr. M'Tear resumed his profession as a teacher in Glasgow; and, though continuing to preach occasionally, he prosecuted the occupation of instruction with much success for several years, but retired from it when the advance of age impaired his activity. He died in the sixty-seventh year of his age.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

Principal Naval Aide-de-Camp to the Queen.—The appointment of Principal Aide-de-Camp to her Majesty, vacant by the decease of Admiral Lord Amelius Beauclerk, have been conferred on Vice-Admiral Sir William Parker, Bart., G.C.B., at present in command of the Channel squadron, and commander-in chief of the Mediterranean station.

The Peninsular Medal.—It is expected that the honorary medal to be conferred on the Peninsular officers will be extended to all British officers engaged in the last general war, including the arduous contest in America, where so much intrepidity and gallantry were displayed by a comparatively small arm of our troops. The following officers who shared in the glory and peril of the Peninsular war, and for which they will receive a medal decoration, are quartered in this garrison:—Colonel Mansel, Colonel Cator, Lieutenant-Colonel Cox, Lieutenant-Colonel Grierson, R.E., Major O'Leary, 55th. On half-pay in this city:—Colonel G. Mansel, 3rd Dragoon Guards, who served for six years in the Peninsula; Lieutenant-Colonel Lloyd Hodges, 61st; Captain Welsh, 5th; Captain Rose, 32nd; Lietenant Evans, 38th.—Limerick Chronicle.

Sir Walter Scott.—A letter from Madras, written by a soldier in the 15th Hussars, to his father in Drogheda, states that the health of Lieutenant-Colonel Sir Walter Scott is in a most precarious state. His medical attendants have ordered him to Europe, yet they are afraid to move him, lest he should expire before embarkation. The expected demise of this generous officer and accomplished gentleman has caused a general gloom through the presidency.

Improved Discipline of the Army.—The Daily News states that the Government is about to provide for the better training and management of the army, on a plan originated by Earl Grey, when he was at the head of the War Office. The intention is to put at once in force the law limiting the service to ten years, and to release all the soldiers who have served that term, adopting towards them similar arrangements with those adopted towards the pensioners. Like the pensioners, they are to be enrolled at their place of abode, and be subject to be called out for exercise or for service. This may take place once a year, and each reserve or retired soldier will receive two shillings a day whilst thus engaged.

Church Preferment.—The Right Hon. Lord Ward has presented the Rev. Charles Girdlestone, M.A., to the valuable rectory of Kingswinsford, Staffordshire, void by the death of Dr. Penfold.

EPITOME OF NEWS.—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

The electric telegraph on the Midland Railway has been opened for the use of the public

The statue of Mrs. Siddons is to be erected in Westminster Abbey. There is talk of moving the statue of John Philip Kemble (Flaxman's last work) from its present position in the north transept of the Abbey, to some spot in the same building where it can be seen by the side of the newly completed statue of Mrs. Siddons

A letter from Homburg-es-Mont announces the death of the Landgrave Philip of Hesse-Homburg, the reigning Prince, aged 69. He had promised his subjects a constitution, but died without carrying out his intentions. He bore the rank of Field-Marshal in the Austrian service. He is succeeded by a younger brother, Prince Augustus Adolphus Frederick, born in 1781.

The Judges have at length declared their decision, as Visitors of the Inns of Court, on the Inner Temple Bench question. It is, that Queen's Counsel have no legal right to the office of bencher, but that the mode of election pursued at the Inner Temple is improper, and ought to be abolished.

A line of telegraphs is about to be established along the coast of the Adriatic, between Venice and Trieste. The distance is 26 German miles, or about 119 English, and there will be 22 stations, the expense of which is estimated at 28,000 florins (£2800).

Sydney papers have arrived of the 19th August, from which we learn that an outbreak had taken place among the prisoners at Norfolk Island, which was not put down until four police officers were killed.

Letters from Italy announce that the union of Cracow to Austria has produced a very lively impression throughout the whole Peninsula, and appears to have aroused with new energy all the former sentiments of dislike and distrust of the Austrians. These sentiments have manifested themselves in a bolder and more significative manner than on any previous occasion.

Count Frederick Gonfalonieri, chief of the Milanese conspiracy against Austria in 1821, who was subsequently confined during 17 years within the fortress of Spielberg, in Moravia, died at Hospenthal, in the canton of Uri, on the 10th inst.

Herrings caught at Brighton in the morning are sold in the Midland Counties in the afternoon. This arises from the facilities of transit by the London and Brighton and London and North Western Railway; and such has been the effect in the reduction of prices, that the finest quality can now be had at the rate of from twenty to twenty-five for a shilling, being a reduction of nearly two hundred per cent.

Her Majesty has granted a pension of £50 a year to Margaret Turnbull, widow of the late James Turnbull, in consequence of the literary merits of her brother, the late Dr. Leyden; and a pension of £50 a year to Mrs. Fanny Gurwood, in consequence of the literary merits of her husband, the late Colonel Gurwood.

The Gazetta Official of Rio de Janeiro has been received to the 2nd of November. The Exchange had improved to 28¼, and the Home Stock Six per Cents to 83. Coffee was in good demand, but that for sugar was rather slack. From Monte Video the date was to the 20th October, but all was in statu quo. An attempt to check the slave trade had been made by the Government, and an alteration in the rate of postage on foreign periodicals had been decreed, reducing it to ½d. each on those printed in countries which did not charge more on those printed in Brazil

We learn from an Antwerp journal that the late frost occasioned many serious accidents in that city. In five days not less than 56 persons were taken to the hospitals in consequence of severe falls in the streets from the slippery state of the pavement.

The French papers mention an instance of shipwreck caused by fair weather. When the sea is agitated, it always breaks on the rocks lying at the mouth of the Charente, and sailors can thus avoid them. But one night lately the sea was so calm that, by the light of the moon, no symptom of peril could be perceived, and the English brig the Ann, proceeding from England to Charente, came right on the rocks and was wrecked. Fortunately the crew escaped.

A letter from Naples says:—"The two bronze horses sent by the Emperor of Russia to the King of Naples were inaugurated on the 5th inst., being placed near one of the entrances to the Palace, looking on the King's garden. The open space on which they stand is called Place Nicholas I. An immense crowd was present at the ceremony." The letter adds that the heat at Naples on the 6th was almost insupportable.

Prince Louis Napoleon Bonaparte intends, it is understood, to fix his permanent residence in this country.

It appears that Dr. Liszt, the founder of the Zollverein, whose death we mentioned last week, committed suicide with a pistol. Letters found upon him proved that he had long nourished the idea of suicide, and a violent flowing of blood to the head irresistibly drew him on to the desperate resolution. He recommended his family to the care of his friends. His affairs, however, are in excellent order. He was 54 years of age."

Several deaths are reported to have occurred from want, in Belgium. The Journal de Gand, of the 19th inst., states that on that day a band, consisting of fifteen individuals, attacked the bakers' shops in that city, and plundered them of all their bread. Two of these individuals were arrested and lodged in prison.

A letter from Vienna states that Count de Flahault had handed to the Austrian Government the note relative to the occupation of Cracow. The three Powers proposed to address, during the present month, a second declaration in justification of their conduct, to the French and English Cabinets.

The Augsburg Gazette, of the 17th, contains accounts from Constantinople, which represent Persia to be making warlike preparations on a large scale. The Shah had assembled an army of 25,000 men at Teheran, which he had placed under the command of his eldest son. It is surmised that these preparations are making with a view to an attack on the Turkish provinces, an enterprise rendered apparently easy by the disturbances in Kurdistan, which have caused great embarrassment to the Ottoman Porte

The price of wheat has again risen at Brussels, and this circumstance excites the murmurs of the lower classes. The rise in the price of wheat in Brussels market during the last two weeks was only 20 centimes per half hectolitre ending Friday, December 11, and the following day's bread rose 1 centime per kilogramme. On Friday, the 18th December, there was a rise of 29 centimes per half hectolitre on wheat, and a fall of 17 cents on rye. Bread rose again one centime. The price of bread of the third quality is now 40 centimes per kilogramme at Brussels. This is as dear as in the scarcity of 1816.

We have already mentioned the failure of the house of Schiller and Co., of Breslau. We now learn from Dresden that M. Schiller, the chief of the house, attempted a few days ago to commit suicide in a bath in that city, by opening the veins of his arms. He was found alive, and removed to an hospital, but in such a state of exhaustion that little hope was entertained of his recovery. M. Schiller had a fortune of 2,000,000 francs from his father, which, by long industry, he had tripled; but latterly he had speculated extensively in railroad shares and other securities, and lost so much that the amount to be divided among the creditors of the house is estimated at only about £16,000

The execution of the railway from Konigsburg to Berlin, at the cost of the State, is definitively determined on, and the works are to be commenced early in the spring. What has hastened this decision is the intention of the Russian Government to have a railway line constructed from the interior of Russia to the frontier

OXFORD. Dec. 21.

Christ Church.—The Lord Bishop of Oxford has appointed the Rev. Dacres Adams, vicar of Bampton, to be Rural Dean of the Deanery of Witney.

Third Centenary of the Foundation of Trinity College, Cambridge.—The Third Centenary of the Royal Foundation of Trinity College was celebrated on Tuesday with unusual magnificence. The proceedings commenced at ten o'clock P.M., by the recital of the Prize Essays, in the Dining Hall of the College, and the distribution of prizes to the prizemen. The Master presided, and there were present most of the noble and distinguished guests who had been invited to take part in the festival. The Commemoration Service in the Chapel commenced with the chanting by the choir of three Psalms, selected appropriately for the occasion, viz., Psalms 145, 146, and 147. The 44th Chapter of the Book of Ecclesiastes was next read as the lesson of the day, which being ended, the Rev. James Amiraux Jeremie, M.A., proceeded to deliver the Commemoration Sermon or Oration. The choir then sung Purcell's celebrated anthem, "Oh, give thanks unto the Lord." The rev. the Master and the visitors retired from the Chapel, the Hallelujah Chorus being executed as a voluntary by the organist.

OPENING OF THE LANCASTER AND CARLISLE RAILWAY.

Although, in our Journal of last week, we recorded the opening of this important line of Railway, we are induced, by the picturesque attractions of the country through which it passes, as well as by the very interesting character of the engineering works in its construction, to illustrate further the great event of Tuesday and the scenery of the route.

The new Station, whence the train started, is situated at the northern terminus of the Lancaster and Preston Railway, about half a mile from the old Lancaster Station. It is built of fine white freestone, and is a very neat structure.

The first work of interest upon the Line is the Viaduct over the Lune, which is about a mile and a half from Lancaster. This light and elegant bridge consists of seven land arches of brick at the south end, followed by three beautiful laminated timber arches, of one hundred and twenty feet span each, succeeded by a land arch for the public road on the north. Owing to its great elevation above the river, it forms a prominent object from many points of view in the vicinity of Lancaster, and adds another to the various works of art which previously adorned that town.

From the Lune Bridge, the Line proceeds towards the shore of Morecambe Bay, the Hest Bank Station being the next stopping place. There the lover of scenery is delighted by the magnificent view that presents itself for a considerable distance. The Bay of Morecambe stretches before him like an extensive lake; Black Combe, Coniston Old Man, and other adjacent hills in the distance, forming the background of a most beautiful picture. This fine range of hills was thickly covered with snow, and presented a singularly beautiful appearance, as viewed through the clear atmosphere

Hest Bank was speedily reached; it is a watering-place, to which access has hitherto been afforded by the Lancaster and Kendal Canal.

After crossing the river Keer, the Line crosses the turnpike-road leading from Lancaster to Milnthorpe, by a bridge of very great obliquity.

When opposite Burton, we pass from the county of Lancaster into Westmoreland.

Fourteen miles from Lancaster, the Line crosses the river Beetha, and thence passes on the east side of Milnthorpe, by Rowell, Lower Woodhouse, Greenhead, and east of Hincaster: it crosses the canal at the tunnel, and pursues its course, through a fine and well-wooded country, to the pleasant village of Sedgwick. At this point the magnitude of the Sedgwick embankment is seen to advantage. It is fifty feet high, and contains, in rather more than a quarter of a mile of length, 150,000 cubic yards of earth-work; and it is worthy of remark that the whole of this immense work was completed in little more than twelve months.

The course of the Line is now by Natland to Oxenholme; previous to which it crosses the Burton turnpike-road, about two miles south of Kendal, under a handsome skew bridge.

Twenty miles from Lancaster we reach the Oxenholme Station, where the Line is joined by the Kendal and Windermere Railway. The portion of this Line between Oxenholme and Kendal—a distance of two miles and a half—was opened for public traffic on the 21st of September last. The whole length of eleven miles and a half, terminating at Bowness, will, it is expected, be completed early in the ensuing year, and will afford an easy and delightful means of access to the Lake district. Wordsworth's oft-quoted Sonnet against Railways was written soon after this Line was projected.

From this point, there is a view of Kendal and its venerable Castle, the latter the birthplace of Queen Catherine Parr.

From Oxenholme, the Line proceeds upon heavy embankments and cuttings One of the most formidable of these—the Birkland Cutting—is four miles from Oxenholme, and contains 150,000 cubic yards of earthwork.

Soon after leaving Birklands, the Sedbergh turnpike road is crossed, upon an iron girder bridge. The Line then skirts the base of the lofty Benson Knot, one of the highest hills in this neighbourhood; and, crossing the turnpike road from Kendal to Appleby, runs through a heavy rock cutting of 90,000 cubic yards. Then follows a heavy embankment in the valley of the Mint, containing 121,000 yards; succeeded by a large cutting, from whence 200,000 yards have been taken, and in the course of which we again cross the Appleby turnpike road.

Twenty-five miles from Lancaster we arrive at the Docker Gill Viaduct, one of the most beautiful structures on the line. It consists of six arches of 50 feet span each, stretching across a valley whose lowest point is 75 feet below the rails. The piers in the middle of the valley are about 50 feet high, and from 8 to 10 feet wide. The total length of the viaduct is 370 feet, and the width between the parapets 25 feet.

Half a mile from this splendid viaduct, the Line is carried past Mosedale Hall, the property of Alderman Thompson, M.P.; and half a mile northward, we arrive at the Grayrigg Summit, where the Line passes through a heavy cutting of hard material called samel, containing 152,000 cubic yards.

A mile onward is the Low Gill Embankment, containing about 170,000 cubic yards of earthwork. It is one of the highest in England, the summit being upwards of 95 feet above the bed of the ravine.

We next arrive at a heavy excavation through samel, blue rock, &c., in extent about 120,000 cubic yards.

The Railway now skirts the Dillicar Hills, and the scenery around increases in picturesqueness and grandeur. At various points, the windings of the silvery Lune are discerned from the Line, and soon afterwards the traveller is immersed in the Great Dillicar Cut, containing 70,000 cubic yards of solid blue rock. The Line is carried over the Borrow Water, near its junction with the Lune, upon a neat viaduct, 68 feet high, and composed of three arches of 45 feet span each.

About twenty yards from the Line, stand the remains of the ancient Roman Station of Castle Field, by which the mountain pass was anciently commanded.

The Railway now passes Borrow Bridge, by far the most beautiful nook of scenery on the Line. The traveller seems to be completely hemmed in on all sides by stupendous hills. The village of Borrow Bridge appears on the right, at a short distance from the Line, and near it winds the beautiful stream of the Lune.

The Borrow Bridge Cut, by which the Line now passes, is through hard blue rock, and contains 69,500 cubic yards.

The Lune Embankment, 75,000 cubic yards in extent, is the next great work. It rests on the old bed of the river, which has been diverted from its course.

Passing the Lune excavations, and the two bridges over that river, we arrive at Loup's Fell Cutting, a most arduous undertaking, the greatest part of the material being rock; and the thin beds of which it is composed presenting a serious obstacle to the progress of the work—the blasting being less effective than upon perfectly solid material.

Thirty-four miles from Lancaster, we reach the Birbeck Embankment, containing 200,000 cubic yards of earthwork, and the Birbeck Viaduct, 45 feet in height—the arches being similar to those of the Borrow Viaduct

We have now arrived at the foot of the great incline—a plane of eight miles, rising 1 in 75, till it reaches the Shap Summit, and which, it was foretold, would render the Railway, if ever formed, useless; it was, indeed, considered "an engineering impracticability." At the foot of this incline, an assistant engine will always be in readiness to give aid to trains proceeding northwards. But no assistant-engine was required at the opening on Tuesday. onward the train sped without halt and without delay, and on reaching the summit it was found that the ascent had been made at the rate of twenty-five miles an hour.

Near to Orton and Tebay, a large building, tastefully roofed with zinc, for the reception of the assistant engines, and cottages for the workmen, have been erected.

From Orton Moor to the Shap Wells Embankment, no work of any difficulty occurs, with the exception of the cutting through the Crosby Ravensworth Fells, containing about 65,000 cubic yards of rock and earth

A few miles east of the Line, near this point, lies Black Dub, the source of the river Lyvennet. Here King Charles II., according to Burn, rested and dined, and drank of the stream, when he came in with the Scots in 1651. To commemorate the event, an obelisk has been erected with the following inscription:—

Here, at Black Dub,
The source of the Lyvennet,
CHARLES II
Regaled his army on their march from Scotland,
August 8th, A.D., [illegible]

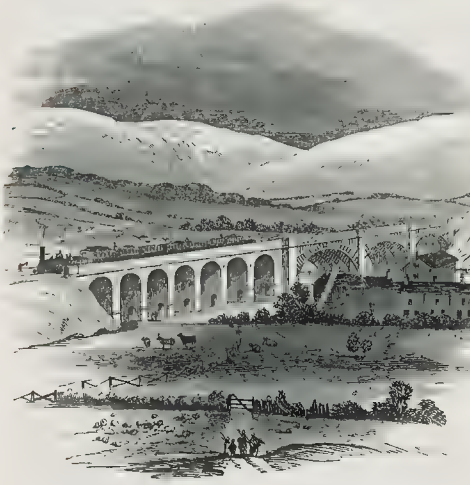
Thirty-seven-and-a-half miles from Lancaster, we arrive at Shap Wells, a watering-place of some note; and, a mile-and-a-half farther we reach the Shap Summit—the highest point of the most stupendous and wonderful work on the Line. We are now 888 feet above the level of the Line at Morecambe Bay, and 1000 feet above the level of the sea! Rising sixty feet overhead, on each side, are rugged walls of hard rock, presenting a strikingly magnificent appearance. This, of course, was the most difficult piece of work on the Line, and, accordingly, 500 men were clustered upon it for many months. Upwards of 23 tons of gunpowder were spent in blasting it.

This is, we believe, the highest elevation to which any Railway has been carried. A thousand feet above the level of the sea! and the train runs as smoothly, as steadily, as speedily, as easily, as if the way lay upon the sea shore, and were as level as rule and campass could make it

There being no houses within a reasonable distance of this wild and bleak region, a colony of mud huts was erected for the use of about 500 "navies," and attached to them were a church and a school—built by the enterprising contractors, who also paid the salaries of the minister and schoolmaster. The various rows were named by the "workies" after the most celebrated streets in London—such as "Regent street," "Hanover-square," &c.

It has been ascertained that the course of the Line over Shap Fells is almost identical with that taken by Prince Charles Stuart and his followers in 1745.

OPENING OF THE LANCASTER AND CARLISLE RAILWAY.



BRIDGE OVER THE LUNE, FROM THE CHURCHYARD, LANCASTER.

PACKHORSE BRIDGE OVER THE LUNE.—BORROW BRIDGE, THE RAILWAY IN THE DISTANCE.

Leaving the summit, we enter a cutting through limestone rock, and before it approaches Shap Village, the Line runs through a circle of large boulder stones, said to be the inner circle of an ancient Druidical Temple.

The Line now proceeds on the east side of the town of Shap, along a heavy cutting through limestone rock, and passing under an elegant skew-bridge, erected at an angle of 45°.

The Line next descends along the flat portion of the Line called Shap Mines; and following the valley of the stream, the Line again runs under the turnpike-road; and thence passing Thrimby, through a thick plantation.

Here the character of the scenery is considerably altered—the bare, rugged, and sterile mountains being succeeded by fertile pastures and picturesque prospects.

The Kendal turnpike-road is crossed for the last time, by a skew-bridge at Clifton, near the entrance to Lowther Park, in which, hidden by a forest of huge oaks, stands Lowther Castle, the seat of the Earl of Lonsdale.

The scenery between Shap and Clifton is very attractive—Cross Fell, Saddleback, Skiddaw, and the other hills in the Lake District, appearing to great advantage.

We are now carried along the Lowther Embankment, and about 50 miles from Lancaster and 20 miles from Carlisle we cross the river Lowther on a magnificent viaduct, 100 feet above the stream. Its arches, six in number, are of 60 feet span each; its total length, 500 feet. It is the largest and one of the most beautiful objects of art on the Line.

A mile and a half from the Lowther Viaduct, the Line crosses the Eamont on a viaduct of great beauty, consisting of Five semi-circular arches of 50 feet span each. Its height is 70 feet, and its extreme length upwards of 300 feet.

Westmoreland is now left in the rear, and we enter "Canny Cumberland,"—the two counties being divided by the stream which we have just crossed. We immediately enter a large cutting, containing 180,000 cubic yards, and the Line then runs nearly level to the town of Penrith: the Station closely adjoining ruins of the ancient Castle.

From Penrith, the Line enters the valley of the Petteril, through which it pursues almost a direct course to Carlisle, joining the Newcastle and Carlisle Railway at the London-road Station, where the line is 36 feet above the level at Morecambe Bay, and 852 feet below the Shap summit.

Besides the principal viaducts enumerated, the works on the Line comprise 15 turnpike-road bridges, 64 occupation-road bridges, 86 occupation bridges, 47 cattle creeps, and 60 level crossings.

We have abridged this outline from the Carlisle Journal. We add a few engineering details:—

Total quantity of gunpowder used upon the works—4133 barrels, of 100 lbs each, or 184 tons. Coils of fuze, 61,044, length of fuze used, about 416 miles.

On the Kendal district alone five miles) the holes drilled for blasting amount to 41 miles.

Number of nights worked, 152,147

Horses night work, 10,500.

Rock, 844,000 cubic yards. Independent of this rock, there has been at least 400,000 cubic yards of sand requiring blasting, making the rock work nearly one-seventh of the whole excavations

Greatest number of men employed upon the works, 9,615

Greatest number of horses employed upon the works, 790.

The number of days' work executed on the Line is equivalent to the work of three millions of men for one day

The excavations average nearly 100,000 yards per mile.

Making deductions for the time lost by the men, and the unusually wet country through which the Line passes, the working time in which the Line has been completed is fifteen months.

THE CONTRACTORS' DINNER.

We have engraved one of the festal commemorations of the Opening of the Railway—viz., the sumptuous Dinner given by the Contractors, Messrs. Stephenson, Mackenzie, and Co. The entertainment took place in the Assembly Room of the Crown and Mitre Inn and Coffee House. This beautiful apartment was elaborately embellished for the occasion. At the upper end of the room, behind the President's chair, was displayed a mantle of white silk, emblazoned with the Royal arms, and arched with laurel and flowers. On each side appeared an illumination, the initials "V A.," and surmounted by the order of the Star and Garter, within wreaths of evergreen. Against the wall, at the lower end of the room, was displayed an elegant flag, emblazoned with the incorporated arms of the towns of Lancaster and Carlisle, typical of the union of these two important towns by railway. Against the walls, on each side, were ranged silk flags bearing the titles of all the Railways for which Messrs. Stephenson, Mackenzie, and Brassey are Contractors, about a dozen in number, and constituting in the aggregate upwards of 800 miles of railway communication. In addition to these decorations, appeared a number of other devices, illuminated by Royal crowns, stars, &c.; wreaths of evergreens gemmed with roses, and inclosing loyal and other mottoes. With the lustre of the illuminations, aided by the light of three chandeliers depending from the ceiling, the room presented a most brilliant appearance. The dinner, supplied by Mr. Jarman and Mrs. Wells, host and hostess of the hotel, was of the most costly description.

The dessert, wines, &c., were excellent. Mr. Scarisbrick, the celebrated organist of Kendal, presided at the pianoforte. The chair was occupied by John Stephenson, Esq.; G. Mould, Esq., officiating as Vice.

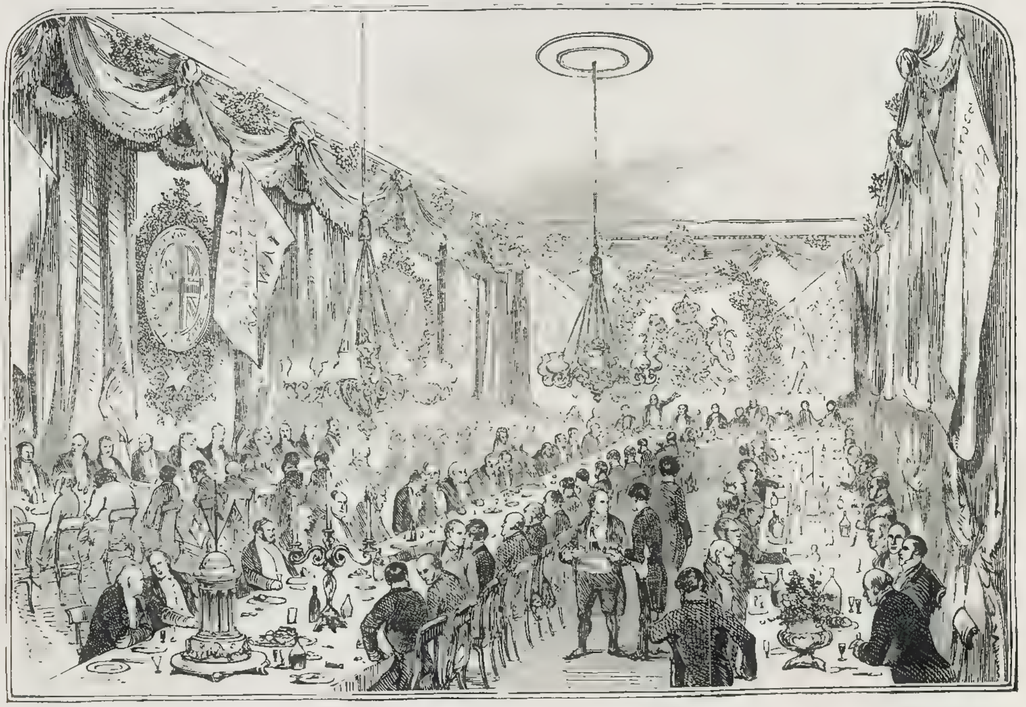
The number of guests exceeded 200, comprising not only the heads of the various departments engaged in the construction of the Railway, from the resident engineers and contractors downwards, but a considerable number of influential strangers interested in other lines, and many representatives of the trade of Carlisle, Kendal, Lancaster, Preston, &c.

At the lower end of the room was an orchestra, occupied by an instrumental band from Cobden's establishment, Cross Hall, near Chorley, and also by a party of glee singers, chiefly from Preston, conducted by Mr. Edward Scarisbrick, of Carlisle.

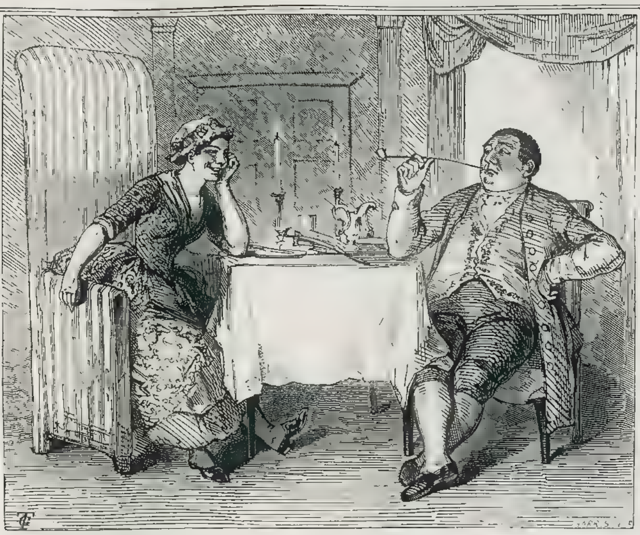
We regret that we have not space to report the very interesting after-dinner proceedings. After the customary loyal toasts had been duly honoured, the healths of the Chairman and Directors, the Engineers-in-Chief, the Secretary, and the Resident Engineers, of the Railway Company were drunk with great applause; and the toast of "Messrs. John Stephenson and Co." was received with immense cheering.

Mr. Stephenson's reply modestly glanced at the difficulties which he had overcome in the construction of the Railway. He concluded by observing it was consoling and satisfactory to mark the progress of science, and he trusted that the time would come, and that ere long, when passengers could travel right through to Forfar. (Cheers.) The communication by iron rails between England and Scotland would be a great benefit to both countries; and, as an humble individual, he felt proud to have been the means of amalgamating both sides of the Sark by the Trunk Line, part of which had yesterday been opened. (Cheers.) He could only say he felt obliged for the kindness of the Company, in speaking of him and his partners as they had done. He only regretted he could not reply adequately to their compliments, for he would repeat that he would rather make a railway than a speech any day. (Loud cheers.)

Mr. Mould, Mr. Horn, and other speakers, in their addresses, entered into the details of the great work; so that the day's proceedings were stored with a vast amount of practical information, instead of the complimentary common-place which usually characterises post-prandial eloquence.



THE RAILWAY CONTRACTORS' DINNER, AT THE CROWN AND MITRE INN, CARLISLE.



CLEMENCY, MRS. KEELEY. BRITAIN, MR. KEELEY.

SCENE FROM "THE BATTLE OF LIFE," AT THE LYCEUM THEATRE.

LYCEUM THEATRE.

This theatre opened for the winter season on Monday evening last, when the version of Mr. Dickens's last Christmas book, "The Battle of Life," dramatised by Mr. Albert Smith, was played for the first time, one clear day only having elapsed between the publication of the story and the production of the drama.

The plot has, without doubt, by this time been made known to many hundreds of our readers; and, as the incidents are closely followed, there is no occasion to repeat them here. Such alterations only were made in the manner of developing the story as were necessary for the exigencies of the stage; and the result was a most unqualified success. For this, however, be it understood, the author and dramatist were mainly indebted to the unequalled acting of Mrs. Keeley as Clemency Newcome, to which we shall allude presently. Otherwise the piece was somewhat wearisome; and once or twice hung in a very dangerous manner between success and condemnation, although the large audience had evidently come predisposed in its favour.

The reason of this dulness was that it was impossible to excite any interest for the two sisters on the stage. As long as Clemency and Britain were in the scene, everything moved fast enough, but no sooner did Marion and Grace commence their sentimentality than the audience got listless and inattentive; and now and then that restless cough was heard, which sometimes preludes sounds a little more unpleasant. The exquisite pathos of Mrs. Keeley in the third act, however, "pulled everything up," to use a theatrical term, and the curtain finally descended amidst an uproar of applause, which continued for several minutes.

The piece was nicely played throughout, Dr. Jeddler being sustained by Mr. Frank Mathews, with extreme care; and Alfred Heathfield by Mr. Leigh Murray, who has been added to the Lyceum company, and whose intelligent, gentlemanly performance deserved all the commendation awarded to it. Messrs. Snitchey and Craggs, the lawyers, found two able representatives in Mr. Meadows and Mr. Turner; and Benjamin Britain was admirably played by Mr. Keeley, for whom the character seems to have been almost written. His bewilderment and confusion, during the signing of the contract, in the first act, was inimitable. Mr. F. Vining was the Michael Warden.

The two sisters, Grace and Marion, were played by Miss Daly and Miss May. The former lady was warmly cheered for her clever acting in the third act, when Marion returns; and the latter—an actress new to these boards—promises to become an acquisition to the company, when she can speak a little louder. At times, on Monday evening, she was almost inaudible. Mrs. Snitchey was properly interpreted by Mrs. Woollidge. But to Mrs. Keeley's Clemency Newcome, all praise, as we have hinted, is due. Never was a character more exquisitely worked out. Her very appearance—awkward, ungainly, but still clean and tidy—was a picture; and her acting has, in our opinion, exceeded anything she has done for years: in the "Nutmeg-Grater Inn" scene, it was certainly beyond her well-recollected explanation of her conduct as Dot Peerybingle, last year; and that is no poor compliment. There is no actress on the stage who will be able to come near her in this part, should the piece be played at any other house.

The piece was very nicely put on the stage. In the absence of any available points in the illustrations of the book, the artists of the theatre were left to their own suggestions; and some effective scenery was the result. A clever change, from the ball-room to the winter landscape, with the snow falling heavily, was an excellent piece of theatrical mechanism, and worked without a "hitch." The dresses were in good taste.

At the fall of the curtain, there were loud calls for the principal performers, who passed, hand in hand, across the stage. Then a cry was set up for Mr. Dickens, who was not in the house; and then another for Mr. Albert Smith, who was led forward by Mrs. Keeley, and left by her at the footlights, to bow his acknowledgments to the audience.

EVERYBODY'S COLUMN.

BY ALBERT SMITH.

mortals are certainly a much faster race than we were in the time of Œdipus. We learn, from clever books on classical subjects, that the Sphynx was sent by Juno to afflict the Thebans by proposing enigmatical questions to them; and that it went badly with those who could not enter fully into their ingenuity. There are a great many Sphynxes who afflict us at the present day by wishing to say smart things, perfectly incomprehensible. But this by the way.

The Sphynx would not have made any great sensation at the present day; for, where he invented one riddle, people now put forth a thousand: and his crack enigma about which the ancients made such a fuss, and thought the aforesaid Œdipus such a card for answering, was a very slow affair at the present day, every pocket-book publisher in Egypt would have refused it. The enigma is universally known. It was, "What animal is that, that goes on four legs in the morning, two at noon, and three at night?" We are informed by Mr. Widdicomb—who was at that time Master of the Horse to Sesostris—that he was very nearly letting himself in for it, by saying that it was a trained horse, who went on four legs in the stable in the morning; two in the rehearsal at noon; and three on the stage, having one wounded by the dragon, at night. Œdipus, however, luckily stepped in before him, and gave the answer; which all the world knows to be "Man." Mr. Widdicomb speaks of Œdipus as an intelligent man an excellent singer of funny songs, and an inordinate lover of pale ale.

We propose to put out the Sphynx for good, by offering several enigmatica diversions to our readers for Christmas. Some of them are our own; some we have borrowed; and the remainder have been stolen wherever we could lay hands on them. We have purposely omitted the answers, which will be given next week.

CHARADE

Attributed to Sir Walter Scott; and to which, it may be as well to state, to save some of our readers from going mad from over-puzzling their brains, there is not supposed to be any answer. If there is, we shall be happy to receive it.

Sir Hylary fought at Agincourt;
Sooth! 'twas an awful day!
And though, in that rude time of sport,
The followers of the camp and court
Had little time to pray
'Tis said Sir Hylary mutter'd there
Two syllables by way of prayer.

My FIRST to all the brave and proud,
Who see to-morrow's sun;
My NEXT, with her cold quiet cloud,
To those who win their dewy shroud
Before the fight is done;
And my WHOLE to her, whose bright blue eyes
Weep when a warrior nobly dies.

By our new arrangements for bringing out THE ILLUSTRATED NEWS, which combine the application of Mr. Little's Improved No end-of-impression-in-a-minute Steam Press, with the electric telegraph, we shall shortly be enabled to anticipate every event of importance. At present, we give a view of the spectacle our office will present on Monday, as soon as this number has been seen, and its attractions made known and appreciated. The crowd also includes many ingenious correspondents bringing their answers to the above riddles.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

FASHIONS FOR THE NEW YEAR.

This is the season, in Paris, the most propitious for the production of novelties of every description, and those of the toilette are never behind hand amongst our tasteful neighbours. The winter gaieties, now beginning in right earnest, give occasion for the display of evening costumes of every description, from the dinner dress to the Toilette de Bal.

The entertainment given by M. Guizot, in honour of the Bey of Tunis, presented a coup d'œil of such brilliancy as might charm even eyes accustomed to Eastern splendour. The costumes of the ladies were many of them truly magnificent. Dresses of moire Gothique, of rich damask, of satiné velvet, of silk, brocaded in gold and silver, or shot, in a thousand different colours, to which the large spreading patterns now in vogue gave a double richness of effect—were to be seen on all sides, and, accompanying these, were head-dresses and tiaras sparkling with diamonds, not unfrequently mixed with flowers.

On the ball-dresses of young ladies, flowers are now employed in abundance while wreaths or bouquets for the head are still in the highest vogue.

For the head-dress of a married lady, or a chaperone, blonde is again much worn, and, certainly, nothing can be more becoming to the face than its light transparent texture. It is often employed without the admixture of any other ornament, and is also much worn in barbes, or combined with gold and silver; sometimes even with velvet and flowers.

Many new ball dresses are now preparing either in crape or in white tarlatane, with two skirts over a white satin slip. These skirts have each a hem; and, above each hem, there is a wreath of flowers, either embroidered on the muslin or artificial; the leaves of the latter are shining, and interspersed with gold net-work. The boddice is made plain, with a point and a double round berthe, which is gracefully looped up at the shoulders with bows (nœuds pages) of white satin ribbon, brocaded in gold, and terminating in long aiguilettes of gold. The sleeves are made very small. A wreath of the same flowers as those on the dress must be worn in the hair.

Another very favourite novelty is a white crape dress, with an underskirt of white moire, having a pointed boddice with folds à la Grecque. This dress may be trimmed with bows and bands of ponceau velvet; this is rather a striking mixture, but one that is much admired. With this, must be worn a headdress of ponceau eglantine flowers, mixed with gold and silver daisies.

We will conclude this review of ball costumes with the description of a pink tulle dress, composed of five skirts, each skirt being bordered by a garland of pink clochettes, with green leaves. The flowers and leaves are graduated, so that on the last skirt they are complete miniatures.

The little caps now worn are charming, from the grace which they impart to the physiognomy. They are made in blond and flowers, and those intended for occasions of more ceremony are ornamented with small feathers; but these must be twisted and placed with much care, and must have the air which the hand of an experienced modiste alone can give them.

A new and successful style of cap is the Bonnet Marron Lescant. The foundation is in point d'Alençon, and a quilling of pink satin ribbon surrounds it like a wreath. Below the quilling is a border of the same lace, fluted. This cap is worn on the top of the head with a large full-blown rose placed on the right side.

As we have before said, the different styles of dresses, as well as of bonnets and head-dresses, are so numerous, and so varied from day to day, above all at the beginning of the season, that it would be useless to attempt to describe them all, the more so as all our fair readers know well that what looks charmingly on a lady with a slight élancée figure, would lose all its attractions did the wearer boast a greater degree of embonpoint; and the same remark may be applied to differences of complexion, of height, and of age. In general, however, morning and visiting dresses are made quite tight, opening at the waist with small basques simply brought into a point; some are made quite high, others again opening en revers, which may be either pointed or round. Cloaks and mantles are still made in velvet, and as the season advances, fur trimmings are more and more in request. Bonnets are frequently ornamented with feathers, and preserve the form we described in our last bulletin of fashions.

The costumes which we now anticipatorily present to our readers, will not appear until to-morrow at Paris, in the beautiful journal Les Modes Parisiennes. They are two exquisite Costumes de Promenade. The first consists of a robe of satin, couleur de bois, with black velvet figuring. The bonnet is worn with a short veil, and a small rose: gloves, straw colour: cachmere shawl, white or bright red. The robe of the other dress is green silk shot with blue, trimmed with imitation lace. The bonnet is of velvet, couleur raisin de Corinthe, with feathers and ribbons of apple-green; gloves, delicate lilac.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

CHRISTMAS HOLIDAY GAMES.

When time comes round, a Christmas box they bear,
And one day makes them rich for all th[illegible] year. [illegible]

All popular ceremonials, most probably, had their origin in those rude rites and superstitions which were the precursors of religious observances, and are still found among those savage tribes upon whom the sun of civilisation has not risen. How our ancestors managed to amuse themselves before the arrival of the Romans is somewhat obscure, indeed; but that they were no "carpet knights" is pretty certain, and it has been fairly assumed that our national athletic exercises, such as hurling and wrestling, may be taken as impressions from early types in favour among those naked cavaliers from whom Prince Vortigern is said to have won his "painted vest." When the Saxons came, they brought with them their games and pastimes, and are believed to have introduced chess, skating, and the use of the oar. Some claim these honours for the Normans; but most likely the attendants of William brought with them the subtleties of woodcraft only. That Monarch was the founder of game-laws, at all events, for whatever other game contrivances we may be his debtors. Then followed justs and tournaments: the former a duello, or performed by two persons; the latter a regular row, in which a crowd was wont to fall to—"pell mell." Martial exercises, of course, were the fashion of this epoch, in which the sons of nobles, gentles, and yeomen all participated. These sports were held in especial esteem by the ladies—

Whose eyes
Rained influence, and adjudged the prize.

At the close of the Middle Ages, chivalry began to decline, and violent exertion to be considered vulgar. The consequence was a taste for gambling—also peculiar to savage life hatching into a state of civilisation. James the First wrote a book, called "A King's Duty towards God," and addressed it to his eldest son, in which he states foot-ball to be heterodox, and all pastimes practised on horseback eminently comme il faut—an opinion with the latter part of which we entirely coincide. In the seventeenth century, play had become excessive, and gentlemen wasted their substance on cock-fights; while the popular character partook unamiably of the spirit of the public recreations of the times—bull-running, bear-baiting, and the like. About this period, we read that the citizens of London took their recreations liberally, at all manner of sports, "besides drinking," including "hunting with the Lord Mayor's pack of dogs when the common hunt goes out." In the reign of Charles the Second, our island appears well to have merited the title of "Merry England." All sorts of pastimes were rife, and the shows of the metropolis were the most gorgeous pageants that can be conceived. Still one is not content with the pictures of these revels drawn by Chaucer and similar faithful historians. The matter, too, often consisted of Heathen mythology and Christian divinity, mixed up very indecently, not to say profanely. Towards the end of the last century, Lord Mayor's Day used to present mummeries of the most unseemly kind; some of them too gross for allusion.

Elizabeth's visit to Kenilworth introduced a new era. Leicester provided a poetical reception for his Sovereign—and no doubt set the fashion for succeeding fêtes of the same description. But Christmas was destined to be the especial feast of holiday games: the occasion for jocund hospitalities—as it remains at this day. Although not without its "Lord of Misrule," this festival of good fellowship, the eternal memorial of "peace and good will among men," seems early to have rescued public revelry and merry-making from objectionable disorder. It was wont to have its "Kings" for the nonce—even the grave inmates of Lincoln's Inn had a monarch so named chosen from among them, whose office it was to lead and promote their gambols. In the present day, as observed in an English family, probably the festival of Christmas is the most rational and gratifying specimen of a social ceremony to be found in the world. It is, to speak figuratively, a scene, whose dramatis personæ are the Christian virtues. Charity, "the greatest of them all," takes the leading part; Love gives it action; Benevolence, properties; Social Union, harmony; Gratitude, its development; Hope, its moral. Then welcome—a thousand welcomes—thou boon Christmas Time! Season of such especial blessings for those who use thee profitably. Reader! wouldst learn the metest toy of all its holiday contrivances? Let us for once play the philanthropist, and whisper the secret in thy ear—The Christmas Box! With this make your game on every 25th of December. Throw liberally and fearlessly. Stand not for a small stake—for self-approval will ensure you sixes——

And one day make you rich for all the year!

TATTERSALL'S.

The Christmas week is generally a barren one at the "Corner," and such we expected it would be on this occasion. On Monday, however, there was a very good attendance, and business to a large amount was transacted, Van Tromp, Epirote, Planet, and Glentilt, being the lions of the day, but without any material effect on their positions. The betting extended over a large field of horses, and furnished the following averages:—

THE MARKETS.

Corn Exchange.—The present week's arrivals of English wheat for our market have been but moderate, yet the show of samples of that article has been fully adequate to meet the wants of the buyers. On the whole the trade has ruled inactive, yet a further slight advance must be noticed in the quotations. In free foreign wheat exceedingly little has been doing, at late rates. All grain in bond has been held at higher figures. Malting barley has produced 2s, other kinds 2s per quarter more money, with a ready sale. The malt trade has ruled steady, at full prices. In oats a good business has been transacted, at an improvement in the currencies of 1s per quarter. Both beans and peas are 2s higher; while the top price of flour has advanced to 60s per 280lb. Barrelled qualities 2s dearer.

English. Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 61s to 70s; ditto white, 65s to 74s; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 61s to 68s; ditto white, 65s to 70s; rye, 44s to 50s; grinding barley, 37s to 40s; distilling, 41s to 43s, malting ditto, 44s to 51s; Lincoln and Norfolk malt, 60s to 66s; brown ditto, 58s to 60s. Kingston and Ware, 72s to 74s, Chevalier, 75s to 76s; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 29s to 31s; potato ditto, 32s to 35s; Youghal and Cork, black, 27s to 28s; ditto [illegible] peas, 46s to 48s; [illegible] town-made flour, 56s [illegible] Foreign. Free [illegible] white, 68s to 74s per quarter. In Bond.—[illegible] —s to —s; oats, new, —s to —s; ditto, feed, —s to —s; and peas, —s to —s per quarter. Flour, American, 35s to 39s; Baltic, 33s to 37s per barrel.

The Seed Market. Linseed cakes are in moderate request, at full prices. Rape cakes are a slow sale. Linseed moves off readily, at 1s per quarter more money. In all other kinds of seeds very little is doing.

Linseed, English, sowing, 55s to 60s; Baltic, crushing, 44s 0d to 50s; Mediterranean and Odessa, 46s to 48s. Hempseed, 36s to 39s per quarter. Coriander, 12s to 15s per cwt. Brown Mustard-seed, 10s to 13s; white ditto, 8s to 9s. Tares, 4s 6d to 5s 6d per bushel. English Rapeseed, new, £27 to £28 per last of ten quarters. Linseed cakes, English, £13 5s to £13 10s; ditto, foreign, £8 10s to £11 0s per 1000, Rapeseed cakes, £5 12s to £5 15s per ton. Canary, 56s to 62s per quarter. English Clover-seed, red, —s to —s; extra, —s to —s; white, —s to —s; extra, up to —s. Foreign, red, —s to —s, extra, —s; white, —s to —s; extra, —s per cwt.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread in the metropolis are from 9d to 9½d; of household ditto, 7½d to 8½d per 4lb loaf.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 59s 10d, barley, 42s 11d; oats, 26s 3d; rye, 42s 1d; beans, 44s 6d, peas, 48s 10d.

The Six Weeks' Average.—Wheat, 59s 11d; barley, 43s 2d; oats, 26s 2d; rye, 42s 11d; beans, 45s 8d, peas, 48s 9d.

Duties on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 4s 0d; barley, 2s 0d; oats, 1s 6d; rye, 2s 0d; beans, 2s 0d; peas, 2s 0d.

Tea.—There is very little business doing in any kind of tea. Fine parcels of green are, however, held at extreme rates.

Sugar. The market is very scantily supplied with West India sugar, owing to which, a further advance of 6d per cwt. has been obtained for most qualities. In other kinds of raw sugar, a good business has been done, at full prices. Refined goods are 6d to 1s per cwt. dearer. Brown lumps, 63s to 64s, and standard do., 64s. 6d to 65s per cwt.

Coffee. Native Ceylon is in good request, at full prices. In other kinds of coffee exceedingly little is doing.

Rice. This article is firm, at extreme currencies.

Tallow.—A large business is doing in this market, at higher rates. P.Y.C. on the spot, 51s 6d to 51s 9d per cwt. Town tallow firm, at 50s 6d net cash.

Oils.—This market is rather inactive, at previous quotations.

Coals.—Adairs, 17s; Original Tanfield, 17s; Tanfield Moor, 19s 6d; Belmont 22s; Hetton, 23s 9d; and Lambton, 22s 9d per ton.

Hay and Straw. Meadow hay, £3 5s to £3 16s; clover ditto, £3 5s to £5; and straw, £1 9s to £1 12s per load.

Wool.—Privately the transactions continue trifling, at barely late rates.

Potatoes. Although the supplies of potatoes are small the demand rules heavy, at from 120s to 180s per ton.

Provisions.—Owing to the change in the weather, the demand for Irish butter is less active, and prices are with difficulty supported. Carlow, landed, 94s to 99s; Clonmel, 94s to 98s; Cork, 92s to 96s; Limerick, 84s to 90s, Waterford, 86s to 88s; and Sligo 82s to 84s per cwt. For forward delivery, we have no transactions to report. English butter is in good request, at fully previous currencies. The best Dorset is selling at 100s to 104s; inferior and middling, 94s to 98s, and Devon, 90s to 96s per cwt.; fresh, 11s to 14s per dozen lbs. Dutch butter moves off briskly, at 108s to 114s for selected parcels. The sale for bacon is active, at a further rise in value of 1s per cwt. Prime Waterford sizeable, 60s to 63s; and heavy, 56s to 58s per cwt. Belfast middles are selling at 59s to 58s per cwt. Lard is a brisk inquiry, at 1s per cwt more money. Prime Waterford bladdered, 68s to 73s per cwt. All other kinds of provisions are quite as dear.

Hops (Friday).—During the present week a moderate business has been transacted in the finest colour parcels of hops, both in pockets and bags, at full prices. In all other kinds so little is doing that prices are almost nominal. Sussex pockets, 74s to 88s; Weald of Kent ditto, 80s to 88s; Mid and East Kent ditto, 86s to 126s.

Smithfield (Friday). This being Christmas Day, the supply of beasts on sale here this morning was very limited, and of middling quality. On the whole the beef trade was firm, and Monday's quotations were readily supported in every instance. The numbers of sheep were unusually small, while the mutton trade was steady, at full prices. There were only three calves on offer, and which were taken at late rates. In pigs scarcely a transaction took place. From abroad we received 70 oxen and [illegible] the whole of which found buyers. Milch cows were heavy, at from £16 to £18 [illegible]

Per 8lb. to sink the offals.—Coarse and inferio[illegible] second quality ditto, 3s 8d to 3s 10d, prime large oxen, 4s 0d to 4s 2d; prime Scots, &c., 4s 2d to 4s 4d; coarse and inferior sheep, 3s 10d to 4s 0d; second quality ditto, 4s 2d to 4s 4d; prime coarse-woolled ditto, 4s 6d to 4s 8d; prime South Down ditto 4s 10d to 5s 2d; large coarse calves, 3s 8d to 4s 2d; prime small ditto, 4s 4d to 4s 8d; large hogs, 3s 8d to 4s 4d; neat small porkers, 4s 6d to 4s 8d. Suckling calves, 20s to 29s; and quarter old store pigs, 16s to 19s each. Beasts, 326; cows, 30, sheep, 320, calves, 3; pigs, 80.

Newgate and Leadenhall (Friday).—A steady business was doing here to-day, at full prices.

Per 8lb. by the carcase:—Inferior beef, 3s 0d to 3s 2d, middling ditto, 3s 2d to 3s 4d; prime large ditto, 3s 4d to 3s 6d; prime small ditto, 3s 6d to 3s 8d; large pork, 3s 6d to 4s 2d; inferior mutton, 3s 6d to 3s 8d; middling ditto, 3s 10d to 4s 2d; prime ditto, 4s 4d to 4s 8d, veal, 3s 8d to 4s 8d; small pork, 4s 4d to 4s 8d.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

During the early part of the week, money was in some demand, but the discount houses were less active towards the close. Rates have not varied materially, but the tendency has been slightly towards a decline. This is, however, no unusual state of things at the end of the year. Business is generally slack, and orders withheld until the beginning of January, when renewed activity gives a slight impetus to the market. As the new year advances, it is considered highly probable that money will gradually improve in price, from the numerous calls falling due on Railway Shares, as well as the demand likely to be required in the shape of debentures, loans, &c.

The English Market opened firmly on Monday, and with the exception of a slight heaviness, from absence of business on Tuesday, has been well supported until the close of the week. The failure of a member of the Stock Exchange, engaged in heavy Bearing operations, has, in some measure, produced this firmness, having afforded new spirits to the Bull party. Exchequer Bills have also slightly advanced, closing at 12 premium. Some money investments on Reduced have given an upward tendency to the price of that Stock; and Bank Stock has improved. The Market closes buoyantly at the following prices:—Bank Stock, 206; Three per Cent. Reduced Annuities, 94⅝; New Three-and-a-Quarter per Cent. Annuities, 95⅞, Long Annuities, to expire Jan., 1869, 9⅞; Consols for Opening, 94; Exchequer Bills, £1000, 1½d, 12 pm.

In the Foreign House, on Monday, Portuguese Stock again improved, the Four per Cents. leaving off at 40, in consequence of the advertisement of a dividend. A reaction, however, occurred on Tuesday, and the price has since receded to 38½ for Account, at which it closes. Mexican opened at 23¾ to 24⅛, and, after a slight advance, closes at 24 for Money, 24¼ for Time. Spanish Actives and Three per [illegible] has been [illegible] Three per Cent. 3[illegible] The Market, with these exceptions, has been inanimate; prices at closing being, for Brazilian, [illegible]; Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cents, 60⅝; Four per Cent. Certificates, 93.

Although the business of the Share Market has not been extensive, yet considerable activity in prices has prevailed. Manchester and Leeds Stock has been in better demand. Birmingham and Oxford Shares have improved considerably, and Caledonians, North Staffordshire, and the East Indian Railways, have all been influenced by operations. There was rather less briskness towards the close of the week, but the subjoined list of actual operations will best display the state of the market:—Aberdeen, 25½; Ambergate, Nottingham, Boston, and Eastern Junction, 2¾. Birmingham and Dudley, 6 pm.; Birmingham and Gloucester, 128; Birmingham and Oxford Junction, 11½; Bristol and Exeter, 75; Caledonian, 29⅞; Cornwall, 1¼; Direct Northern, 2⅛; Eastern Counties, 23½; Ditto, York Extension, 3½; East Lancashire, 17⅞; Ditto New, 8½; Edinburgh and Glasgow, 76½; Great Southern and Western (Ireland), 28½; Great North of England, 238; Great Western, 126; Ditto Half Shares, 73; Ditto Quarter Shares, 17¼; Ditto Fifths, 29½; Ditto New, 6⅞; Hull and Selby Half Shares, 51½; Ditto Quarter Shares, 23¼; Leeds and Bradford, 75½; Leeds and Thirsk, 16½; Ditto New, 4⅝; Ditto, Prefer. 6 per Ct., 4⅞; London and Blackwall New, 4; Ditto Extension, 4½; London, Brighton, and South Coast, 59; Ditto Fifths, 47½; London and North Western, 194½; Ditto ditto New, 15½; Ditto Fifths, 19½; London and South Western, 62½; Ditto Tenths, 5½; Ditto Tenths, 4⅝; London and York Extension, 2¼, Manchester and Leeds, Quarters, 6⅞; Manchester, Buxton, and Matlock, 1½ pm.; Manchester and Southampton, 1½, Midland, 128; Ditto, New, 6½; Newcastle and Berwick, 34⅝; Newmkt. and Chesterford, 5¼; Norfolk, 129; Do. Hf. Sh., 12; Northern Counties Union, 1¼; North British, 36¼, Do Hf. Shares, 15⅝; Do. Qrs., 3⅝; Do. Extension, 1⅛; Do. Thirds, 3⅞, N. and Eastern, 76; N. Staffordsh, 9½; Scottish Midland, 14⅞; Shrewsbury and Birmingham, 5¼; ditto, Class B, 2⅝; Shropshire Union, ½ dis; South Eastern and Dover, 39¾; Ditto, No. 1, 24½; Ditto, No. 4, 2⅞; South Wales, 3⅝; Taw Vale Extension, 2⅝; Vale of Neath, 1⅝; York and Newcastle, 38; Ditto New, 12⅝; Ditto Preference, 7½; York and North Midland, 94; Ditto Half Shares, 46½; Ditto Selby, 80½; Ditto Extension, 39½; Ditto Preference, 14¼; Ditto East and West Riding Extension, 19; Boulogne and Amiens, 15½; Dutch Rhenish, 4¾; East Indian, ½; Northern of France Constituted, 10⅝; Orleans and Bordeaux, 8⅝; Paris and Orleans, 49; Sambre and Meuse, 4⅞.

Saturday Morning.—Yesterday, being Christmas Day, was observed as a strict holiday in the markets, and throughout the City generally.

Fire and Loss of Life in Dublin.—Between six and seven o'clock on Monday morning, a fire broke out upon the premises of Mr. John Cassidy, publican, of No. 77, North King-street, Dublin, which, after a short period, consumed the entire of the concern, together with part of the adjoining house, a provision shop, occupied by a person of the name of O'Reilly. A servant woman in Mr. Cassidy's employment, whose remains were discovered at three o'clock P.M., lost her life; Mr. Cassidy and his wife, however, fortunately escaped. The premises were insured for a sum of £2000.

The proposed objects of the Metropolitan and Suburban Cemeteries Society are as follow:—To provide sites for burials, east, west, north, and south of the Metropolis. To effect considerable reduction in the rate of charges. To adopt a new principle of payment, a single charge being substituted for the customary fees. To provide for the decent and respectful burial of the poorer population, by a system of arrangement perfectly novel, including buildings for the temporary reception as well as for the transit of bodies. Negotiations are now pending for the purchase of several exceedingly eligible sites, and one portion of 150 acres has been already secured. The estimates show a large annual dividend when the Society shall be in full operation, until which period 4 per cent. interest will be paid on the deposits and calls. The Committee of Management are now ready to receive applications for shares, which may be made to Messrs. Bourdillon and Son, solicitors, 30, Great Winchester-street; J H. Stevens, Esq., architect, 6, Clement's-inn, Strand; Messrs Shewell and Son, brokers, 25, Tokenhouse-yard; Messrs Hoggart and Norton, Old Broad-street; Basil J. BRITISH COLLEGE of HEALTH, New-road London.—BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF THE HYGEIST, with the reasons that led him to the discovery of the Hygeian System of Medicine, and the VEGETABLE UNIVERSAL MEDICINES, after thirty-five years' inexpressible suffering under the medical faculty. James Morison, the youngest son of Alexander Morison, Esq, was born at Bognie, in the county of Aberdeen, in the year 1770. The family has been long known as one of great affluence and respectability; and the late Member for Banffshire, John Morison, was the second brother of the subject of this brief sketch. For the remainder of the sketch see the abridged "Morisoniana," to be had of all the honorary members of the British College of Health, New-road, London.

TOAST FOR CHRISTMAS.—Good Old Christmas hath come his round again, and greets all his friends and citizens, telling them not to forget to remember their own annual toast—"All Friends round St. Paul's," not forgetting

MOURNING to any extent at Five Minutes' Notice

Observe.—Any article purchased, Ready Made or Made to Measure, if not approved of will be immediately exchanged, or, if preferred, the money returned. E. MOSES and SONS, Tailors, Woollen-drapers, Clothiers, Hatters, Hosiers, Furriers, Boot and Shoe Manufacturers, and General Outfitters for Ladies and Gentlemen, 154, 155, 156, and 157, Minories, and 83, 84, 85, and 86 Aldgate, City, London

Caution.—E. MOSES and SON regret being obliged to guard the public against imposition; but have learned that the untradesman-like falsehood of "being connected with them," or "it's the same concern," has been resorted to in many instances, and for obvious reasons, they have no connection with any other house in or out of London; and those who desire genuine and cheap clothing, &c., should call at, or send to, the Minories, and Aldgate, City, London.

Notice.—No business transacted at this Establishment from Sunset Friday till Sunset Saturday, when business is resumed till Twelve o'clock.

II.

And far and near, o'er the landscape drear,
From casements brightly streaming,
With cheerful glow on the fallen snow
The ruddy light is gleaming!
The wind may shout as it likes without,
It may bluster, but never can harm us,
For a merrier din shall resound within,
And our Christmas feelings warm us.

Chorus.—Wass heil! wass heil!

III.

The flowers are torpid in their beds,
Till Spring's first sunbeam sleeping;
No, e'en the snowdrops' pointed heads
Above the earth are peeping.
But groves remain on each frosted pane,
Of feathery trees and bowers;
And fairer far, we'll maintain they are,
Than Summer's gaudiest flowers.

Chorus.—Wass heil! wass heil!

IV.

Let us drink to those eyes we most dearly prize,
We can shew how we love them after;
The fire-blaze cleaves to the bright holly-leaves,
And the mistletoe hangs from the rafter.
We care not for fruit whilst we here can see
Their scarlet and pearly berries;
For the girls' soft cheeks shall our peaches be,
And their pouting lips our cherries.

Chorus.—Wass heil! wass heil!
